FIFTEENTH CONGRESS.—FIRST SESSION.

BEGUN AT THE CITY OF WASHINGTON, DECEMBER 1, 1817.

PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES,—JAMES MONROE.

PROCEEDINGS IN THE SENATE.*

MONDAY, December 1, 1817.

The first session of the Fifteenth Congress, conformably to the Constitution of the United States, commenced this day at the city of Washington; and the Senate assembled in their Chamber.

PRESENT.

DAVID L. MORRILL and CLEMENT STORER, from the State of New Hampshire.

JAMES BURRILL, jr., from Rhode Island and Providence Plantations.

ISAAC TICHENOR and JAMES FISK, from Vermont.

DAVID DAGGETT, from Connecticut.

RUFUS KING and NATHAN SANFORD, from New York.

JAMES J. WILSON and MAHLON DICKERSON, from New Jersey.

ABNER LACOCK and JONATHAN ROBERTS, from Pennsylvania.

JAMES BARBOUR and JOHN W. EPPES, from Virginia.

NATHANIEL MACON, from North Carolina.

JOHN GAILLARD and WILLIAM SMITH, from South Carolina.

CHARLES TAIT, from Georgia.

JOHN J. CRITTENDEN, from Kentucky.

JOHN WILLIAMS, from Tennessee.

BENJAMIN RUGGLES, from Ohio.

JAMES NOBLE and WALLER TAYLOR, from Indiana.

JOHN GAILLARD, President pro tempore, resumed the Chair.

CLEMENT STORER, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of New Hampshire, to supply the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Jeremiah Mason; JAMES FISK, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Vermont, to supply the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Dudley Chace; JOHN J. CRITTENDEN, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Kentucky, for the term of six years, commencing on the fourth day of March last; JOHN WILLIAMS, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Tennessee, for the term of six years, commencing on the fourth day of March last, respectively, produced their credentials, which were read; and the oath prescribed by law was administered to them, and they took their seats in the Senate.

JOHN W. EPPES, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Virginia, for the term of six years, commencing on the fourth day of March last, stated that he had received his credentials, but had neglected bringing them with him, expecting that the Executive of Virginia would forward a duplicate thereof to the Senate, and which he still supposed would speedily be done: whereupon, the oath prescribed by law was administered to him, and he took his seat in the Senate.

On motion by Mr. MACON, the Secretary was ordered to acquaint the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate is assembled, and ready to proceed to business.

On motion by Mr. BARBOUR, a committee was appointed to inquire whether any, and if any, what legislative measures may be necessary, for admitting the State of Mississippi into the Union; and Messrs. BARBOUR, KING, and WILLIAMS, of Tennessee, were appointed the committee.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that a quorum of the House of Representatives is assembled, and have elected HENRY CLAY, one of the Representatives for the State of Kentucky, their Speaker, and THOMAS DOUGHERTY their Clerk, and are ready to proceed to business.

The Senate then adjourned.

TUESDAY, December 2.

HARRISON GRAY OTIS, from the State of Massachusetts, arrived on the 1st instant, and attended this day.

Mr. TICHENOR reported, from the joint committee, that they had waited on the President of the United States, and that the President of the United States informed the committee that he would make a communication to the two Houses this day, at twelve o'clock.

President's Annual Message.

The following Message was then received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Fellow-citizens of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

At no period of our political existence had we so much cause to felicitate ourselves at the prosperous and happy condition of our country. The abundant fruits of the earth have filled it with plenty. An extensive and profitable commerce has greatly augmented our revenue. The public credit has attained an extraordinary elevation. Our preparations for defence, in case of future wars, from which, by the experience of all nations, we ought not to expect to be exempted, are advancing, under a well-digested system, with all the despatch which so important a work will admit. Our free Government, founded on the interest and affections of the people, has gained, and is daily gaining, strength. Local jealousies are rapidly yielding to more generous, enlarged, and enlightened views of national policy. For advantages so numerous and highly important, it is our duty to unite in grateful acknowledgments to that Omnipotent Being from whom they are derived, and in unceasing prayer that He will endow us with virtue and strength to maintain and hand them down, in their utmost purity, to our latest posterity.

I have the satisfaction to inform you, that an arrangement which had been commenced by my predecessor, with the British Government, for the reduction of the naval force, by Great Britain and the United States, on the Lakes, has been concluded; by which it is provided, that neither party shall keep in service on Lake Champlain more than one vessel; on Lake Ontario, more than one; and on Lake Erie and the upper lakes, more than two; to be armed, each, with one cannon only; and that all the other armed vessels, of both parties, of which an exact list is interchanged, shall be dismantled. It is also agreed, that the force retained shall be restricted in its duty to the internal purposes of each party; and that the arrangement shall remain in force until six months shall have expired, after notice given by one of the parties to the other of its desire that it should terminate. By this arrangement useless expense on both sides, and what is of still greater importance, the danger of collision between armed vessels in those inland waters, which was great, is prevented. I have the satisfaction also to state, that the Commissioners, under the fourth article of the Treaty of Ghent, to whom it was referred to decide to which party the several islands in the Bay of Passamaquoddy belonged, under the treaty of one thousand seven hundred and eighty-three, have agreed in a report, by which all the islands in the possession of each party before the late war have been decreed to it. The Commissioners, acting under the other articles of the Treaty of Ghent, for the settlement of boundaries, have also been engaged in the discharge of their respective duties, but have not yet completed them. The difference which arose between the two Governments under that treaty, respecting the right of the United States to take and cure fish on the coast of the British provinces, north of our limits, which had been secured by the treaty of one thousand seven hundred and eighty-three, is still in negotiation. The proposition made by this Government to extend to the colonies of Great Britain the principles of the convention of London, by which the commerce between the ports of the United States and British ports in Europe had been placed on a footing of equality, has been declined by the British Government. This subject having been thus amicably discussed between the two Governments, and it appearing that the British Government is unwilling to depart from its present regulations, it remains for Congress to decide whether they will make any other regulations, in consequence thereof, for the protection and improvement of our navigation.

The negotiation with Spain, for spoliations on our commerce, and the settlement of boundaries, remains, essentially, in the state it held, by the communications that were made to Congress by my predecessor. It has been evidently the policy of the Spanish Government to keep the negotiation suspended, and in this the United States have acquiesced, from an amicable disposition towards Spain, and in the expectation that her Government would, from a sense of justice, finally accede to such an arrangement as would be equal between the parties. A disposition has been lately shown by the Spanish Government to move in the negotiation, which has been met by this Government, and should the conciliatory and friendly policy which has invariably guided our councils be reciprocated, a just and satisfactory arrangement may be expected. It is proper, however, to remark, that no proposition has yet been made from which such a result can be presumed.

It was anticipated at an early stage, that the contest between Spain and the colonies would become highly interesting to the United States. It was natural that our citizens should sympathize in events which affected their neighbors. It seemed probable, also, that the prosecution of the conflict along our coast, and in contiguous countries, would occasionally interrupt our commerce, and otherwise affect the persons and property of our citizens. These anticipations have been realized. Such injuries have been received from persons acting under the authority of both the parties, and for which redress has, in most instances, been withheld. Through every stage of the conflict, the United States have maintained an impartial neutrality, giving aid to neither of the parties in men, money, ships, or munitions of war. They have regarded the contest, not in the light of an ordinary insurrection or rebellion, but as a civil war between parties nearly equal, having, as to neutral powers, equal rights. Our ports have been open to both, and every article, the fruit of our soil, or of the industry of our citizens, which either was permitted to take, has been equally free to the other. Should the colonies establish their independence, it is proper now to state, that this Government neither seeks nor would accept from them any advantage, in commerce or otherwise, which will not be equally open to all other nations. The colonies will, in that event, become independent States, free from any obligation to or connection with us, which it may not then be their interest to form on the basis of a fair reciprocity.

In the summer of the present year, an expedition was set on foot against East Florida, by persons claiming to act under the authority of some of the colonies, who took possession of Amelia Island, at the mouth of the St. Mary's River, near the boundary of the State of Georgia. As this province lies eastward of the Mississippi, and is bounded by the United States and the ocean on every side, and has been a subject of negotiation with the Government of Spain, as an indemnity for losses by spoliation, or in exchange for territory of equal value, westward of the Mississippi, a fact well known to the world, it excited surprise that any countenance should be given to this measure by any of the colonies. As it would be difficult to reconcile it with the friendly relations existing between the United States and the colonies, a doubt was entertained whether it had been authorized by them or any of them. This doubt has gained strength by the circumstances which have unfolded themselves in the prosecution of the enterprise, which have marked it as a mere private, unauthorized adventure. Projected and commenced with an incompetent force, reliance seems to have been placed on what might be drawn, in defiance of our laws, from within our limits; and of late, as their resources have failed, it has assumed a more marked character of unfriendliness to us; the island being made a channel for the illicit introduction of slaves from Africa into the United States, an asylum for fugitive slaves from the neighboring States, and a port for smuggling of every kind.

A similar establishment was made, at an earlier period, by persons of the same description, in the Gulf of Mexico, at a place called Galveston, within the limits of the United States, as we contend, under the cession of Louisiana. The enterprise has been marked, in a more signal manner, by all the objectionable circumstances which characterized the other, and more particularly by the equipment of privateers which have annoyed our commerce, and by smuggling. These establishments, if ever sanctioned by any authority whatever, which is not believed, have abused their trust, and forfeited all claim to consideration. A just regard for the rights and interests of the United States required that they should be suppressed, and orders have been accordingly issued to that effect. The imperious considerations which produced this measure will be explained to the parties whom it may, in any degree, concern.

To obtain correct information on every subject in which the United States are interested; to inspire just sentiments in all persons in authority on either side, of our friendly disposition, so far as it may comport with an impartial neutrality; and to secure proper respect to our commerce in every port, and from every flag, it has been thought proper to send a ship of war, with three distinguished citizens, along the southern coast, with instructions to touch at such ports as they may find most expedient for these purposes. With the existing authorities, with those in the possession of, and exercising the sovereignty, must the communication be held; from them alone can redress for past injuries, committed by persons acting under them, be obtained; by them alone can the commission of the like, in future, be prevented.

Our relations with the other powers of Europe have experienced no essential change since the last session. In our intercourse with each, due attention continues to be paid to the protection of our commerce, and to every other object in which the United States are interested. A strong hope is entertained, that by adhering to the maxims of a just, a candid, and friendly policy, we may long preserve amicable relations with all the powers of Europe, on conditions advantageous and honorable to our country.

With the Barbary States, and the Indian tribes, our pacific relations have been preserved.

In calling your attention to the internal concerns of our country, the view which they exhibit is peculiarly gratifying. The payments which have been made into the Treasury show the very productive state of the public revenue. After satisfying the appropriations made by law for the support of the Civil Government, and of the Military and Naval Establishments, embracing suitable provisions for fortifications and for the gradual increase of the Navy, paying the interest of the public debt, and extinguishing more than eighteen millions of the principal, within the present year, it is estimated that a balance of more than six millions of dollars will remain in the Treasury on the first day of January, applicable to the current service of the ensuing year. The payments into the Treasury during the year one thousand eight hundred and eighteen, on account of imposts and tonnage, resulting principally from duties which have accrued in the present year, may be fairly estimated at twenty millions of dollars; the internal revenues, at two millions five hundred thousand; the public lands, at one million five hundred thousand; bank dividends and incidental receipts, at five hundred thousand; making in the whole twenty-four millions five hundred thousand dollars.

The annual permanent expenditure for the support of the Civil Government, and of the Army and Navy, as now established by law, amounts to eleven millions eight hundred thousand dollars; and for the Sinking Fund, to ten millions; making in the whole twenty-one millions eight hundred thousand dollars; leaving an annual excess of revenue beyond the expenditure of two millions seven hundred thousand dollars, exclusive of the balance estimated to be in the Treasury on the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and eighteen.

In the present state of the Treasury, the whole of the Louisiana debt may be redeemed in the year one thousand eight hundred and nineteen; after which, if the public debt continues as it now is, above par, there will be annually about five millions of the Sinking Fund unexpended, until the year one thousand eight hundred and twenty-five, when the loan of one thousand eight hundred and twelve, and the stock created by funding Treasury notes, will be redeemable.

It is also estimated that the Mississippi stock will be discharged during the year one thousand eight hundred and nineteen, from the proceeds of the public lands assigned to that object, after which the receipts from those lands will annually add to the public revenue the sum of one million and a half, making the permanent annual revenue amount to twenty-six millions of dollars; and leaving an annual excess of revenue, after the year one thousand eight hundred and nineteen, beyond the permanent authorized expenditure, of more than four millions of dollars.

By the last returns to the Department of War, the militia force of the several States may be estimated at eight hundred thousand men, infantry, artillery, and cavalry. Great part of this force is armed, and measures are taken to arm the whole. An improvement in the organization and discipline of the militia is one of the great objects which claims the unremitted attention of Congress.

The regular force amounts nearly to the number required by law, and is stationed along the Atlantic and inland frontiers.

Of the naval force it has been necessary to maintain strong squadrons in the Mediterranean and in the Gulf of Mexico.

When we consider the vast extent of territory within the United States; the great amount and value of its productions; the connection of its parts, and other circumstances, on which their prosperity and happiness depend, we cannot fail to entertain a high sense of the advantage to be derived from the facility which may be afforded in the intercourse between them, by means of good roads and canals. Never did a country of such vast extent offer equal inducements to improvements of this kind, nor ever were consequences of such magnitude involved in them. As this subject was acted on by Congress at the last session, and there may be a disposition to revive it at the present, I have brought it into view for the purpose of communicating my sentiments on a very important circumstance connected with it, with that freedom and candor which a regard for the public interest and a proper respect for Congress require. A difference of opinion has existed from the first formation of our constitution to the present time, among our most enlightened and virtuous citizens, respecting the right of Congress to establish such a system of improvement. Taking into view the trust with which I am now honored, it would be improper, after what has passed, that this discussion should be revived, with an uncertainty of my opinion respecting the right. Disregarding early impressions, I have bestowed on the subject all the deliberation which its great importance and a just sense of my duty required, and the result is, a settled conviction in my mind, that Congress do not possess the right. It is not contained in any of the specified powers granted to Congress; nor can I consider it incidental to, or a necessary mean, viewed on the most liberal scale, for carrying into effect any of the powers which are specifically granted. In communicating this result, I cannot resist the obligation which I feel, to suggest to Congress the propriety of recommending to the States the adoption of an amendment to the constitution, which shall give to Congress the right in question. In cases of doubtful construction, especially of such vital interest, it comports with the nature and origin of our institutions, and will contribute much to preserve them, to apply to our constituents for a specific grant of the power. We may confidently rely, that if it appears to their satisfaction that the power is necessary, it will always be granted. In this case I am happy to observe that experience has afforded the most ample proof of its utility, and that the benign spirit of conciliation and harmony, which now manifests itself throughout our Union, promises to such a recommendation the most prompt and favorable result. I think proper to suggest, also, in case this measure is adopted, that it be recommended to the States to include, in the amendment sought, a right in Congress to institute, likewise, seminaries of learning for the all-important purpose of diffusing knowledge among our fellow-citizens throughout the United States.

Our manufactories will require the continued attention of Congress. The capital employed in them is considerable, and the knowledge acquired in the machinery and fabric of all the most useful manufactures is of great value. Their preservation, which depends on due encouragement, is connected with the high interests of the nation.

Although the progress of the public buildings has been as favorable as circumstances have permitted, it is to be regretted that the Capitol is not yet in a state to receive you. There is good cause to presume that the two wings, the only parts as yet commenced, will be prepared for that purpose at the next session. The time seems now to have arrived when this subject may be deemed worthy the attention of Congress, on a scale adequate to national purposes. The completion of the middle building will be necessary to the convenient accommodation of Congress, of the committees, and various offices belonging to it. It is evident that the other public buildings are altogether insufficient for the accommodation of the several Executive Departments, some of whom are much crowded, and even subjected to the necessity of obtaining it in private buildings, at some distance from the head of the department, and with inconvenience to the management of the public business. Most nations have taken an interest and a pride in the improvement and ornament of their Metropolis, and none were more conspicuous in that respect than the ancient Republics. The policy which dictated the establishment of a permanent residence for the National Government, and the spirit in which it was commenced and has been prosecuted, show that such improvement was thought worthy the attention of this nation. Its central position, between the northern and southern extremes of our Union, and its approach to the West, at the head of a great navigable river, which interlocks with the Western waters, proves the wisdom of the councils which established it. Nothing appears to be more reasonable and proper, than that convenient accommodation should be provided, on a well-digested plan, for the heads of the several departments, and of the Attorney-General; and it is believed that the public ground in the city applied to those objects will be found amply sufficient. I submit this subject to the consideration of Congress, that such further provision may be made in it as to them may seem proper.

In contemplating the happy situation of the United States, our attention is drawn, with peculiar interest, to the surviving officers and soldiers of our Revolutionary Army, who so eminently contributed, by their services, to lay its foundation. Most of those very meritorious citizens have paid the debt of nature and gone to repose. It is believed that among the survivors there are some not provided for by existing laws, who are reduced to indigence, and even to real distress. These men have a claim on the gratitude of their country, and it will do honor to their country to provide for them. The lapse of a few years more, and the opportunity will be forever lost; indeed, so long already has been the interval, that the number to be benefited by any provision which may be made will not be great.

It appearing in a satisfactory manner that the revenue arising from imposts and tonnage, and from the sale of the public lands, will be fully adequate to the support of the Civil Government, of the present Military and Naval Establishment, including the annual augmentation of the latter to the extent provided for, to the payment of the interest of the public debt, and to the extinguishment of it at the times authorized, without the aid of the internal taxes, I consider it my duty to recommend to Congress their repeal. To impose taxes, when the public exigencies require them, is an obligation of the most sacred character, especially with a free people. The faithful fulfilment of it is among the highest proofs of their virtue and capacity for self-government. To dispense with taxes, when it may be done with perfect safety, is equally the duty of their representatives. In this instance we have the satisfaction to know that they were imposed when the demand was imperious, and have been sustained with exemplary fidelity. I have to add, that, however gratifying it may be to me, regarding the prosperous and happy condition of our country, to recommend the repeal of these taxes at this time, I shall nevertheless be attentive to events, and, should any future emergency occur, be not less prompt to suggest such measures and burdens as may then be requisite and proper.

JAMES MONROE.

The Message was read, and two thousand copies thereof ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

The Senate then adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, December 3.

ROBERT H. GOLDSBOROUGH, from the State of Maryland, arrived on the 2d instant, and attended this day.

THURSDAY, December 4.

GEORGE W. CAMPBELL, from the State of Tennessee, arrived the 3d, and attended this day.

FRIDAY, December 5.

OUTERBRIDGE HORSEY, from the State of Delaware, arrived the 4th, and attended this day.

MONDAY, December 8.

MONTFORT STOKES, from the State of North Carolina, arrived on the 5th instant, and attended this day.

The PRESIDENT communicated the credentials of JOHN W. EPPES, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Virginia, for the term of six years, commencing on the 4th day of March last; which were read, and laid on file.

TUESDAY, December 9.

The Senate proceeded to the appointment of a Chaplain on their part, and on the ballots having been counted, it appeared that the Reverend WILLIAM HAWLEY had a majority, and was elected.

WEDNESDAY, December 10.

ELI P. ASHMUN, from the State of Massachusetts, and GEORGE M. TROUP, from the State of Georgia, severally arrived on the 9th, and attended this day.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that they have appointed the Reverend BURGESS ALLISON, Chaplain on their part.

THURSDAY, December 11.

JEREMIAH MORROW, from the State of Ohio, arrived on the 10th instant, and attended this day.

WALTER LEAKE and THOMAS H. WILLIAMS, respectively, appointed Senators by the Legislature of the State of Mississippi, produced their credentials, were qualified, and took their seats in the Senate.

TUESDAY, December 16.

ISHAM TALBOT, from the State of Kentucky, arrived on the 15th instant, and attended this day.

Specific and ad valorem Duties—Frauds in the Valuation and Appraisement.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of Mr. SANFORD, of the 8th instant, directing the Committee on Finance to make inquiry relative to the collection of ad valorem duties on importations.

Mr. SANFORD rose and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. President: According to the laws now in force, the duties on merchandise imported are of two classes: those which are usually denominated specific; and those which are imposed on the value. The specific duty is charged upon the article, according to some denomination, or quantity; and is determined by the number, weight, or measure of the article; as cigars, by the thousand, teas and sugars, by the pound; wines and spirits, by the gallon, or salt, by the bushel. The duty on the value is a certain proportion of the value; as ten or twenty per centum. The ad valorem duties are calculated, not upon any value which the merchandise may bear, but upon its actual cost in the foreign country from which it came, with an addition of twenty per centum to the cost, if imported from places beyond the Cape of Good Hope, and ten per centum if imported from any other place.

The foreign cost of merchandise is, therefore, the basis of the ad valorem duties; and that cost must be ascertained, in order to ascertain the duties. This principle having been adopted, the provisions of the existing system for the collection of these duties were devised, in order to carry it into effect.

Where the duty is specific, the quantity of goods is ascertained by a public officer, by actual enumeration; weighing, gauging, or measuring, before the goods are delivered to the owner or consignee. Where the duty is on the value, the foreign cost is determined, for the purpose of charging the duty upon it in ordinary cases, by the owner of the goods, or by his consignee, or agent representing him. This is done by an entry of the goods at the custom-house, by the owner, consignee, or agent, who at the same time produces the invoice and bill of lading attending the importation. The entry and the invoice state the prices or cost of the goods, and the person making the entry swears that they are true. When this has been done, the goods are, in ordinary cases, without any farther investigation, concerning their value or cost, delivered to the owner or his agent; and the foreign cost, thus obtained, is the basis upon which the duties are computed.

From the slightest view it is apparent that this method of determining the cost of goods subject to duty on the value, is exceedingly liable to evasion, by untrue statements of the foreign cost upon which the duty is charged. The cost is determined, in most cases, merely by the person who is to pay the duty. The party required to pay the duty; the party whose profit or loss must always depend wholly, or in part, upon the amount of duty charged and paid on the goods; the party interested to reduce the duty as much as possible, is allowed to make his own statement of the cost: and this cost, so stated, is, in most cases, the sum upon which the duties are calculated and paid. Of all temptations to undervalue merchandise, it does not seem possible to devise one more direct and dangerous than to give to the party who is to state the value all the benefit of an undervaluation.

The provision that, when the collector shall suspect that the merchandise is not invoiced at the price usual at the place of exportation, he may require an appraisement, would also seem to promise a security against the fraud in question. This provision, though useful in practice, to some extent, is also believed to fall very far short of an adequate remedy. It is sufficient to prevent or correct the fraud of false invoices and entries, for many reasons.

Upon the whole of this part of the subject, it is conceived, that the power of the collector to require an appraisement, though it may operate, in some degree, to prevent great and flagrant undervaluations, is a very partial and ineffectual restraint upon the smaller undervaluations of five, ten, fifteen, twenty, twenty-five, thirty, forty, and fifty per centum less than the just value, or cost, of the goods. And there is no doubt that the frauds of this kind, from which the revenue suffers most, are false valuations of the latter class; in which the cost expressed in the invoice is less than the real cost by ten, fifteen, twenty, twenty-five, thirty, or forty per centum. It is in these cases that an actual appraisement seldom takes place. When, in these cases, an appraisement does take place, little or nothing is gained by it; and sometimes the value is reduced by the appraisement below the cost stated in the invoice.

The general result of these facts and views is as follows:

1. An invoice of the foreign cost is no security to the revenue.

2. The foreign cost is determined by the oath of the person who makes the entry, in all cases, excepting those in which there is an appraisement.

3. Where there is an appraisement, that proceeding is subject to abuses, greatly injurious to the revenue; which have been stated.

A very great part, perhaps about one-half, of all the articles subjected to duty on the value, which we import, are manufactures of wool and cotton. In these articles, in which the efforts of art and industry make great and very various additions to the value of the raw material, the fraud of false statements of the foreign cost is facilitated by the difference of fabrics and the variety of values. This fraud is accordingly practised in these articles to a great extent.

It is more particularly since the termination of the late war with Great Britain, that the practice of sending goods to the United States to be sold here, on account of the foreign owner, has been carried to a very great extent. The consignment is made to a person here, who, by whatever name he may be called, is, in truth and effect, a mere agent of the owner of the goods. A suitable person for this agency is sent or selected, who makes the entry, pays the duties, and disposes of the goods for the benefit of his principal. This is the history of many great importations which have been made within the last three years, and which have indeed paid duties to the Treasury, but have paid much less than they should have done. Immense quantities of goods, subject to ad valorem duties, are sent to this country by foreigners, to be entered at the custom-house and pay duties, for account of foreigners, and finally to be sold here, in the first instance, on account of foreigners. The course of proceeding is well understood. The consignee or agent is not supposed to commit his conscience or his character in producing the invoice and making the entry. The principal has only to take care not to grasp too much. If he will content himself with any deduction from the true value of the goods which is not palpably excessive, his invoice, in all probability, passes without objection. If an appraisement is required, the value stated in the invoice is little, or not at all, increased. In either case the foreign owner, who is beyond the reach of our laws, and who has no other object but obtain the most money for his goods, attains his object, and makes a very important saving in the duties. Where the ad valorem duties are considerable, as ours now are, varying from seven and a half to thirty per centum upon the foreign cost; where, upon the greatest part of the articles, the duties are twenty and twenty-five per centum; and where a considerable part of these duties may be saved by a course of proceeding well understood, and free from legal perils; a course of proceeding which is not only practised, but, under the present system, is easily practicable, it is not wonderful that the course should be pursued which will secure the advantage.

It is impossible to ascertain with exactness the extent to which the revenue suffers by false invoices and appraisements of goods subject to ad valorem duties. The records of the Treasury and of the custom-houses would show the difference between the invoices and the appraisements required by the collectors, where there are invoices, and appraisements have been required; but they would show nothing more. This difference would indicate a very inconsiderable part of the loss of the revenue. The difference between the real value or bona fide foreign cost, and the sum upon which the duties are actually charged and received, is the great and important difference from which the loss to the revenue results. Of this difference nothing appears at the Treasury or at the custom-houses. If it extended to the subduction of one-half, or any other proportion of the ad valorem duties, still every thing would be fair upon paper. The records of the Treasury would show the entries and appraisements upon which the duties had been paid; but they would show nothing else to establish the real and bona fide value or cost upon which the duties should have been paid.

But, without including any part of that portion of the ad valorem duties which is lost by frauds, it may justly be assumed, that the net amount of ad valorem duties is now higher, in proportion to the net amount of specific duties, than the gross amount of ad valorem duties is to the gross amount of specific duties, according to former experience, in this respect. Making some little allowance, on this account, in favor of the net ad valorem duties, and proceeding upon the facts and principles already stated, we are led to the conclusion that, of the total net revenue now received from merchandise, about two-thirds arise from the ad valorem duties, and about one-third arises from the specific duties.

Though it is not possible to ascertain, with exactness, the extent of the loss to the revenue in the ad valorem duties, arising from appraisements and false invoices, yet some probable estimate of the amount may be made. I have endeavored to form such an estimate. The amount of the loss I have heard estimated by very intelligent men, at one-sixth, and at one-fifteenth part of the total amount of ad valorem duties which should have been received; and at all rates, between a sixth and a fifteenth part. Taking all the information which I have been able to obtain, and the estimates and opinions of well-informed men, in whose knowledge and judgment I have great confidence, as the basis of my own opinion, I cannot estimate the loss to the revenue, arising from these causes, at less than ten per centum. By this I mean that, taking all the valuations upon which all the ad valorem duties are computed, as well those which are fair and just, as those which are fraudulent, and below the true value in various degrees, including also all the appraisements, and speaking of the years 1815, 1816, and 1817, the aggregate amount of all the entries and appraisements, has been less than it should have been, by at least a tenth part of the true cost or value. Thus, if the total amount of merchandise subject to ad valorem duties imported in a given period, is of the true value or cost of ten millions, the numerous undervaluations which take place in particular instances, reduce the total amount of the whole to nine millions; and thus a tenth part of the duties which should be paid is lost. I certainly do not profess to be accurate in a case where accuracy is unattainable. I can only say, that I have sought information from every source accessible to me; I have stated the facts as they appear to be from all the information which I have been able to collect: and I am obliged to conclude, that at least a tenth part of the ad valorem duties is lost by these frauds.

Estimating, then, that the loss in the ad valorem duties, arising from false statements of the foreign cost and appraisement, amounts to ten per centum, and taking the ad valorem duties for the years 1815, 1816, and 1817, at fifty-two millions, it follows that the loss to the revenue from these causes, during these three years, has exceeded five millions of dollars. The result will of course vary, according to the principles assumed.

It is true that the present mode of determining the value of goods subject to duty ad valorem, has prevailed from the commencement of the present Government to this time. When the present system of collection was first established, the ad valorem duties were low, and the temptation to fraud was comparatively small. Many successive alterations were made in the rates of duty, by which, in most cases, the duties were advanced; but still, our duties, before the late war with Great Britain, were moderate, compared either with those which have since been imposed, or with the duties of other countries. It is probable, that for many years after the commencement of the duties and the system of collection, in 1789, the fraud of false invoices was not often practised; but it is believed that this species of fraud had, before the late war, gradually gained much ground, as the duties were gradually increased, and the methods of accomplishing the object, with impunity, became better understood.

By the act of the first of July, 1812, the duties then existing were doubled, and double duties were to continue for one year after the termination of the war. These duties were continued by a subsequent act, until the 30th of June, 1816, when they ceased, and the present duties took their place.

During all these periods, and notwithstanding the augmentations in the rates, the system for the collection of the duties has remained, in substance, the same.

Consulting experience, the sure test of the past, and the safe monitor for the future, we learn, that, in proportion as the duties are increased, the collection is endangered; and in proportion as the duties are increased the Government must diminish its reliance upon the oaths of parties interested, as securities against fraud. It is therefore, perhaps, not surprising, that the present system should have been found tolerably successful, in the collection of the low and earlier rates of duty; and that the same system should now be, in some respects, no longer adequate to the collection of duties so considerable as those which now are, and for some time have been, in force.

But without attempting to discuss, or even to state, the various projects of reformation, which might be suggested, I shall briefly submit a few ideas upon this subject.

If the evasions and abuses which now occur result, as is believed, from the present system of collection, the remedy must be found in some alteration of the system itself.

A considerable part, perhaps one-fourth or one-fifth in amount of the articles now imported, and now subject to ad valorem duties, may, with entire convenience, be subjected to specific duties. [Mr. SANFORD here went into a statement of the articles to which he alluded, specifying those which he conceived might be very conveniently charged with a duty upon the number, weight, or measure, instead of the value]

The advantages of specific duties over those imposed on the value, in point of security to the revenue, and in their fair and equal operation, are well known. The plan of specific duties is free from those inequalities and uncertainties which must always, in some degree, attend valuations. Such is the excellence of this mode of charging duties, that though our present specific duties, like those ad valorem, are high, compared with the earlier rates, and though the specific duties are in general much higher than those ad valorem in reference to the intrinsic values of the different subjects on which they are respectively imposed, yet it is believed that the specific duties are collected with greater punctuality and certainty, and without any considerable loss to the revenue. This fact likewise shows that the present system of collecting the specific duties is excellent, since it is found to be so by experience; and it also affords a very satisfactory proof that the losses now sustained by the revenue in the ad valorem duties, do not result from any want of vigilance or fidelity on the part of the officers of the customs who collect both the ad valorem and the specific duties.

I am aware that the bulk and weight of many of the articles subject to specific duty afford a very important security to the revenue. But if these articles were subject to ad valorem instead of specific rates, it cannot be doubted, that the same evasions and frauds would take place in respect to them which now occur in all the articles now placed in an ad valorem class.

Still the articles, which will probably remain charged with duty on the value, will be very numerous, and of great amount in the aggregate of our imports: and a proper system for the collection of duties imposed on the value will always be necessary.

The provisions of forfeiture and appraisement, when applied to the real value of the goods, after they reach our own shores, would probably operate with an efficacy which is scarcely felt, when the question in controversy is the foreign cost of the goods.

Or, instead of the provisions of forfeiture and appraisement, the British system may be adopted. According to that system, the importer enters his goods at any value which he chooses to affix to them. If the officers of the customs think, upon examination, that the goods are undervalued by the importer, they take the goods on account of the Government, and forthwith pay to the importer, from the money in their hands arising from the customs, the sum at which he has valued them, with an addition of ten per centum to his valuation, and the duties paid on the importation. The goods are then publicly sold on account of the Government. If the goods produce more than the sum paid to the importer by the officers of the customs, a moiety of the excess is given to those officers as a reward for their vigilance and fidelity. Thus, the interest of the importer, and the interest of the officers of the customs, are constantly arrayed against each other. It is the interest of the importer to enter his merchandise at a just value; for he is constantly exposed to the hazard of receiving for it no more than the amount of his own valuation, with the specified additions. Thus, the steady and active principle of personal interest, is constantly in exercise on both sides, and is at once the inducement to the importer to enter his merchandise at its fair value, and the inducement to the public officers to wrest it from the importer when it is undervalued by him. Perhaps no scheme of human policy has yet been devised for the purpose of securing fair valuations as the basis of duties, which tends so necessarily to that object in practice, as this plan which is now established and pursued in Great Britain. This system is found in the statutes of the 27 George III., chapter 13, section 17; and the 54 George III., chapter 121, section 1. It may also be seen in Pope's custom and excise laws, pages 223, 224, and 225.

When Mr. SANFORD concluded, the resolution was agreed to.

FRIDAY, December 19.

NICHOLAS VANDYKE, from the State of Delaware, arrived the 18th instant, and attended this day.

MONDAY, December 22.

Mr. MORROW, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill to extend the time for locating Virginia military land warrants, and returning surveys thereon to the General Land Office, and for designing the western boundary line of the Virginia military tract; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

TUESDAY, December 23.

Salt Duty and Fishing Bounties and Allowances.

Mr. SMITH submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lay before the Senate a statement of the amount of duties on imported salt, during the years 1815, 1816, and 1817, as far as the returns to the Treasury will permit. Also, a statement, for the same years, of the amount of the allowances and drawbacks paid to vessels employed in the fisheries, and on pickled fish exported.

Ghent Treaty—Restoration of Deported Slaves.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate of the United States:

In compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 16th of this month, requesting information touching the execution of so much of the first article of the Treaty of Ghent, as relates to the restitution of slaves, which has not heretofore been communicated, I now transmit a report of the Secretary of State on that subject. JAMES MONROE.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
December 24, 1817.

The Secretary of State, to whom has been referred the resolution of the Senate of the 16th instant, requesting information touching the execution of so much of the first article of the Treaty of Ghent as relates to the restitution of slaves, which has not heretofore been communicated, has the honor to report to the President, that no answer has been received from the British Government to the proposal made by order of the late President, on the 17th of September, 1816, that the question upon the different construction given by the respective Governments to that article, should be referred to the decision of some friendly sovereign; that the late Minister of the United States in England, before his departure from London, renewed the request for an answer, and that the present Minister at the same Court has been instructed to invite again the attention of the British Government to the subject. All which is respectfully submitted.

JOHN Q. ADAMS.

TUESDAY December 30.

The PRESIDENT communicated a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, showing the amount of duty which accrued on salt imported during the years 1815 and 1816, and from the 1st January to the 30th June, 1817, together with the amount paid for bounty on pickled fish exported, and for allowance to vessels employed in the fisheries during the same period, made in obedience to a resolution of the Senate of the 24th instant; and the report was read. Whereupon, Mr. SMITH submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That "a statement from the Treasury Department, showing the amount of duty which accrued on salt imported during the years 1815 and 1816, and from the 1st of January to the 30th of June, 1817, together with the amount paid for bounty on pickled fish exported, and for allowances to vessels employed in the fisheries during the same period," be referred to the Committee on Finance, with instructions to inquire into the expediency of repealing the law laying that duty.

African Slave Trade.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 31st ultimo, for instructing the committee to whom was referred the petition of the committee of the yearly meeting of the Society of Friends, at Baltimore, on the subject of the African slave trade; and the resolution being read—

Mr. TROUP rose to object to the last clause of the resolution, which contemplated a concert with foreign nations. He thought this a most extraordinary proposition, and asserted that, according to his apprehension, no measure could be adopted more replete with danger to the welfare, to the very existence of this country, than a formal coalition, for any purposes, with any foreign nation whatever. It was a policy, a resort to which ought always to be resisted, and he hoped would be resisted with a firmness not to be overcome. The object of the first part of the proposition, for making our laws against the slave trade more perfect and more effectual, Mr. T. approved, and was willing to co-operate in it. He was ready to go as far as any one, in enforcing, within our own jurisdiction, the abolition of the African slave trade. Within our land line, or water line, even on the high seas, he was willing to enforce our own laws on the subject; but to direct the President to enter into any compact or concert for this subject with any foreign nation or individuals, was a step he would never consent to. He could not separate from foreign alliances the idea of foreign politics and foreign wars; and the proposed measure he should view as the commencement of a system of foreign connections tending to foreign alliances, to which Mr. T. expressed great repugnance. Unless, therefore, the propositions embraced by the resolution were separated, he should be obliged to vote against it.

Mr. BURRILL was pleased, he said, to find that Mr. TROUP had no objection to the main object the resolution had in view, of putting an entire stop to the African slave trade—on this point, he believed, there was no diversity of opinion throughout the country. Mr. B. regretted, however, that such a view had been taken of the concert with other nations proposed to effect the object; because it was only by such concert and co-operation that the slave trade could be abolished. Mr. B. entirely agreed to the impolicy of foreign alliances; and if the general objection to them applied to the proposition he had submitted, he admitted it would be a sound and substantial one; but he could not view the proposed concert in this light, nor could he conceive that any such disastrous consequences would follow it as had been anticipated by the gentleman from Georgia; that apprehension, he thought, was altogether groundless. Nor was the principle of the proposed concert, Mr. B. said, a novelty in this country. By referring to the Treaty of Ghent, it would be found that our Ministers had either made or received overtures on this very subject, and a provision was in consequence inserted in the Treaty. The concert had been considered as indispensable to bring about the entire abolition of the slave trade; and, Mr. B. said, it had been found impossible to put an entire stop to it without a co-operation among the nations prohibiting it; for, no matter how many nations prohibit the trade, if one or two are allowed to carry it on, the evil will still exist.

Mr. KING, in the outset of his remarks, adverted to the delicacy of this question; and said that if, in approaching it, he could discover any danger of the present proposition's leading to that kind of connection which was apprehended by Mr. TROUP, no one would more earnestly deprecate it than himself. But, he said, it was the boast of this nation that it had the reputation of having been the first to begin the abolition of the African slave trade; the constitutional provision having reference to this subject, certainly looked forward to a time when this country would be ready to use its best endeavors to put down this iniquitous traffic; and, he might add, there was no provision in the constitution which had been looked to with more general approbation than that one. The example of this country had excited the emulation of other nations, and all of them having any connection with this trade, except two, had come into the measures for its abolition. Those two had taken time for further consideration, and so long as their decision was suspended, the regulations of other nations would be inefficient; an entire abolition of the traffic in slaves would never be effected until all united to suppress it. It seems to me, said Mr. K., that we are bound by our own principles, and the promise we have held out, to go a little further if we can, to give effect to what we have undertaken. It was not important, he thought, in doing so, whether the necessary measures commenced with us, or were entered into at the invitation of others. So long, however, he said, as Spain or Portugal permitted this trade, and so long as any of our own people, to their disgrace, continue to pursue it under those flags, it was necessary to the honor and the interest of this country to concur in any proper measures for its suppression. He could not perceive, he said, how such a measure as this motion looked to, could lead to any such entangling connection as had been apprehended. What was proposed was an honest and moral concert to put an end to a traffic which is an abomination on the earth. He had no idea of its authorizing the slightest interference with the internal affairs of other nations, or of allowing them to interfere in ours; it could, in his opinion, only redound still more to the honor of our country. An arrangement of the nature suggested, he thought, might be entered into without any great inconvenience, and without any encouragement to that kind of connection of interests which had been very justly deprecated; and it was, he said, if practicable, a measure which was demanded by a regard for the morals of the country, which our religion itself called for. Nor did he think, Mr. K. said, that it was a sound objection, though there was some force in it, that the proposition originated in this branch of the Government, and not with the Executive. Any branch of the Government, he thought, might express an opinion on any national question; the construction of legislative powers was not so strict as to forbid it; in proof of which, he adverted to the practice in England, whence, Mr. K. said, we took many of our political ideas, where the Parliament often expressed its opinion on subjects of public interest.

Mr. CAMPBELL, without being prepared for a discussion of the subject, said he could not at present see the propriety of adopting a resolution from which no good could result; for we, as legislators, said he, cannot enter into any contract with foreign nations. The Executive only, he said, was the proper branch of the Government to form such an arrangement, and if it had been necessary, he presumed the Executive would have done so; but it would be useless, and therefore improper, for the Senate to act on this subject, because they could not act with effect. It had been remarked, however, that the expression of an opinion by the Senate, might be useful, and that this course was a common practice with the British Parliament. It was common, he knew, for Parliament to address humble petitions to the King that he would cause certain measures to be executed; but between that practice and ours there was no analogy. When this Congress acted, Mr. C. said, they acted effectually, and did not and ought not ever to undertake what they have not power to carry into effect. There was, perhaps, but a single instance of a departure from this practice in the Senate, when, on one occasion, they recommended to the Executive to send a Minister to a foreign Government. The measure he always disapproved, and he was, on principle, averse to originating any proposition in the Senate, which their constitutional powers did not enable them to consummate. Besides this, Mr. C. declared his unwillingness to enter into any compact whatever with any foreign power to regulate our own conduct, or to carry our laws into effect. Two nations had thought proper still to permit the trade alluded to. What compact, said Mr. C., are we to form with others, to induce these nations to forbid it? Are we to require Spain and Portugal to give up this trade? Are we to unite with France and England to urge them to give it up? And, should they yet refuse, are we to attempt to force them by arms to do so? Are we, he asked, prepared to risk a war for this object? He confessed he could not see to what other result the proposition tended.

Mr. KING rose to enter his dissent to the construction given by Mr. TROUP, to the article of the Treaty of Ghent which had been quoted. Surely, he said, it would be much more offensive to admit that we would enter into a stipulation with a foreign Government to carry our own statutes into execution within our own territory, where our power is complete, than that we should engage in a concert to suppress a particular trade on the high seas. He would enter into no such stipulation with any power on earth, even if it had been deemed necessary; but in this case it was not. He thought the true intention of the article was, that the parties would use their joint endeavors to put an end to the traffic. [Mr. K. then proceeded to remark on the circumstances of the case, which he presumed Mr. CAMPBELL had referred to, to which the Senate had volunteered its opinion on a certain subject to the Executive; but it afterwards appeared, on explanation, that Mr. K. and Mr. C. had not referred to the same case. Lest, however, injustice should be done to Mr. K.'s views of that subject, they are omitted.]

Mr. CAMPBELL, in conclusion, observed, respecting the stipulation of the Treaty of Ghent, that he did not think the provision was intended to oblige either party to carry its own statutes into execution. He presumed it was introduced merely because the subject was at that time fresh in Great Britain, and that country felt anxious to have it introduced into the treaty, to give to that instrument some popularity. There was nothing additional to be done in pursuance of the provision, and he viewed it simply as an expression of the pre-existing disposition of the parties to put down the trade entirely.

A motion having been made by Mr. CAMPBELL to postpone the resolution for further consideration, it was postponed to Monday without objection.

The Senate adjourned to Monday morning.

MONDAY, January 5.

WILLIAM HUNTER, from the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, arrived the 2d instant, and attended this day.

WEDNESDAY, January 7.

ROBERT H. GOLDSBOROUGH, from the State of Maryland, arrived the 6th instant, and resumed his seat in the Senate this day.

Increase of the Navy.

Mr. TAIT submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before the Senate the proceedings which may have been had under the act, entitled "An act for the gradual increase of the Navy of the United States;" specifying the number of ships put on the stocks, and of what class, and the quantity and kind of materials procured for ship-building. And also, the sums of money which may have been paid out of the fund created by said act, and for what objects; and likewise the contracts which may have been entered into, in execution of the act aforesaid, on which moneys may not yet have been advanced.

FRIDAY, January 9.

ELEGIUS FROMENTIN, from the State of Louisiania, arrived the 8th instant, and attended this day.

MONDAY, January 12.

The African Slave Trade.

The following resolution, offered some days ago by Mr. BURRILL, was taken up:

"Resolved, That the committee, to whom was referred the petition of the committee of the yearly meeting of the Society of Friends at Baltimore, be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the laws of the United States on the subject of the African slave trade, as more effectually to prevent said trade from being carried on by citizens of the United States, under foreign flags; and also into the expediency of the United States taking measures, in concert with other nations, for the entire abolition of said trade."

Mr. BURRILL said, that, at the time he had the honor of moving the resolution, he had not anticipated any objection to it; but, from the debate on the subject on a former day, it appeared that some honorable gentlemen thought it unnecessary to make the inquiry at all, and that any concert with foreign nations, to attain the end proposed, was highly improper and dangerous. The question before the Senate was not upon the adoption of any specified or prescribed line of conduct, for the purpose of putting the finishing hand to the great work of the abolition of the slave trade; it was merely whether it should be referred to a committee to inquire into the expediency of taking measures, in concert with other nations, for this great and benevolent purpose. The committee may inquire, and be of opinion that it is inexpedient to adopt any measures whatever, or at least that it is not proper to take measures in concert with other Governments. If the Senate should refuse an inquiry into the propriety of this course, they might be subjected to the imputation of disregarding the implied obligations of the Treaty of Ghent, by the tenth article of which it is recited, that both the parties are desirous of continuing their efforts to promote the entire abolition of the slave trade, and agree that both shall use their best endeavors to accomplish so desirable an object. If the Senate should refuse the inquiry, it might give rise to unjust surmises and suspicions as to the sincerity of the Government in passing laws for this purpose, and in entering into the stipulations of the Treaty of Ghent. The United States cannot justly be charged with having acted in bad faith, either in making or performing treaties; and, as the United States have the honor of having led the way in the glorious cause of abolishing the slave trade, there can be no doubt that, in making this stipulation at Ghent, our Envoys acted with sincerity, and he hoped were entitled to the merit of having proposed the article. This article, as well as the rest of that treaty, met universal approbation. Ought we, then, to refuse to refer it to a committee, to inquire whether further measures are not necessary, or at least expedient? If any honorable gentleman had moved to go into a Committee of the Whole on this question, would it have been refused? What danger or inconvenience, then, could arise from referring the subject for investigation? This committee, if convinced that further measures are necessary, would report those measures to the House; and, should they recommend a concert with foreign nations for this purpose, the subject then, having some length and breadth, and dimensions, could be examined and considered. But this could not so well be done now, because there was no specific proposition before the House. There was no such danger to be apprehended as some gentlemen imagined, from the generality of the terms of the proposition now under debate. This is the common and ordinary course in commencing the consideration of any subject in the Senate, and the Senate should be cautious not to give ground for the disgraceful suspicion that they are not sincere and hearty in this cause of suffering humanity. Every gentleman in this House wishes for the entire abolition of this abominable traffic, and this is the general voice of the country. The gentlemen here representing the slaveholding States, are as decided as any others on this point, and one of those States (Virginia) was entitled, he believed, to the honor of having been the first State to prohibit it. It was better, as the subject had some connection with others which were of a peculiarly delicate nature, to refer it to a deliberate inquiry in a small committee, than to make it a topic of debate under some general proposition, in which way considerations which did not fairly belong to the subject would insensibly mingle with it.

Mr. BARBOUR said, that, while he was decidedly in favor of the main object of the resolution, that of revising the laws, and remedying every defect for the prevention of the wicked trade in question, there was a part of the resolution of which he did not approve, and, if retained, he should vote against it. And hence, lest his views might be misunderstood, he felt himself compelled to intrude on the attention of the Senate, while he briefly disclosed his reasons. Before he did this, however, he would make a few general remarks. He felt himself obliged to the gentleman from Rhode Island, for doing justice to Virginia, in admitting she had been the first to protest against this trade. But it was no more than an act of justice; for such certainly was the fact. Her zeal in this good cause has undergone no diminution. The United States followed her example; America stands in the relation to the rest of the world, that Virginia does to America. She took the lead in the humane effort to exterminate this horrible traffic. He rejoiced to see that the great nations of Europe had adopted her precepts, and were imitating her enlightened and philanthropic example. Spain and Portugal constitute the only exception; the former, it is said, with what truth he knew not, has received a pecuniary compensation to abandon the traffic. Should this be true, as he cordially hoped it might be, Portugal will then stand alone. It is reasonably to be anticipated, that she will not be able to resist the incumbent load of the civilized world; when their remonstrances are enforced by the united influence of justice, humanity, and philanthropy. Africa, then freed from those disastrous effects which this trade has produced, may, under the benign influence of peace, reason, and religion, indulge a hope, that in the fulness of time she may participate in the blessings of civilization, with all its beneficent effects. Nor was he averse to adopting measures in concert with any nation, which he believed would be calculated to hasten the destruction of this trade. For his part, he feared nothing from an alliance with any nation, whose only object was humanity. No man could more highly appreciate, than he did, the soundness of the political maxim, inculcated by the Father of his Country, in his legacy to the American people—that of avoiding entangling alliances with other nations; yet, with all his reverence for this wise precept and his determination to pursue its suggestions, he felt no apprehension from the concert proposed. A concert like the one proposed is in its character novel; its object is humanity; while alliances denounced by the above wise maxim, have for their object dominion and power, to be acquired by the misery of mankind; to extricate a nation from which, is not unfrequently attended with a violation of honor; or, if executed, it is frequently with the sacrifice of peace, and sometimes with ruin. But what can we fear? Before any such concert can be taken, the terms on which we unite must receive our sanction; a guarantee sufficient to quiet the apprehensions of the most cautious. In so far, then, as the principal project of the resolution is concerned, or the means of effecting it, he would go with the mover; but the part to which he objected, was that proposing that Congress should unite with other nations to produce the object; this he considered to be improper. Congress can act only in its legislative capacity; and, by consequence, can enter into no concert with other nations. That has been assigned to another branch of the Government. It is through the Executive alone that intercourse and arrangements with other nations can be effected. Leave it therefore where the constitution has placed it, without discussing the question how far this body has a right to advise, in its Executive character, the Chief Magistrate upon the propriety of entering into new arrangements with foreign nations; a question on which there is a difference of opinion. He would content himself by remarking, that he believed such an authority had never yet been exercised; but, be the power as it may, it will be readily conceded that this is not one of the cases which would justify it; or, if it were, this is neither the time nor the manner in which it should be performed. It has been urged, indeed, that, by the Treaty of Ghent, America and Britain, having agreed to use their best endeavors to put an end to this traffic, that this course, as now recommended, may find a shelter from criticism in that article; as it is merely in fulfilment of the obligation thereby contracted. Mr. B. conceived that the article in question had no other object, than to furnish to the civilized world an unequivocal testimonial of the sentiments of the contracting powers in regard to this trade. Both nations having, therefore, made use of what they esteemed the best method to suppress it, and entertaining, reciprocally, the most entire confidence that they were sincere in their wishes to effect it, either would repel with scorn an insinuation that an article of this kind was necessary to secure, in future, their zealous perseverance in a course which had been previously adopted, of their own mere will, and which rested upon a much surer foundation than compact, namely, upon their sense of its justice, humanity, and propriety.

Mr. TROUP said he had no intention, when he objected the other day to a part of the resolution, to involve the Senate in a debate upon it; and he very plainly perceived that, at this stage of it, it would be considered premature to discuss at large the merits of the question. But he would submit to the Senate if it were competent to them, in union with the President, to pledge the arms and resources of the country, in a concert with foreign powers, for any object whatsoever. He denied that it could be done in the spirit of the constitution. It would be a pledge of that which we had not. The arms and resources of the country were confided elsewhere; they were deposited, not with the two, but the three branches of the Legislature; and, in fact, were not even to be found there. The people were essentially the depository of them, and their Representatives the organ. Yet it was proposed to pledge, by an act of the Executive power only, the arms and resources of a nation in concert with foreign powers, for the abolition of the slave trade. Gentlemen seemed to entertain very different significations of the term concert; for his part, Mr. T. said, he knew of but one signification, which, in its application to the present subject, could legitimately attach to it; a signification sustained equally by the law of nations, the law of diplomacy, as far as he knew such a law, and the universally received acceptation of the term—concert with foreign nations—Sir, what is it but a term for common councils and common efforts? The gentlemen propose to themselves a great object—no less than the universal abolition of the slave trade; other nations, they acknowledge, hold out against them. Will they be content, then, with a concert of common councils? Assuredly they will not. Between nations common councils mean nothing, unless sustained by common efforts; and common efforts between nations mean nothing less than war, if war be necessary for the object. War must be necessary, so long as other nations assert the right and hold to the practice of the slave trade. It is true that you may begin with negotiation, but it is certain that, if negotiation fail, you must resort to war. What would avail a treaty stipulation which would pledge the United States to exert, in concert with Great Britain, their advice and persuasion to induce Spain and Portugal to abolish the slave trade? Spain and Portugal would care nothing about your advice and persuasion, especially when you told them that you intended nothing more. Rhetoric and eloquence are not the instruments of nations for the execution of grand projects. He was well persuaded that the gentleman from Rhode Island meant to deal in something more substantial; idle and insignificant verbiage could not suit his purpose, for, if it did, he already found it in a treaty. This word concert, therefore, Mr. President, means something—it means connection, combination, alliance, for a given object; it means entangling alliance. You are admonished against entangling alliances; for what reason? Because our Government is one of its own kind, insulated, the only Republic in the world, between which and other Governments there is no common principle, no common feeling, no common sympathy; they may combine for their own interests; they may enter into concert for your destruction; they will not be so ready to combine with you either to promote your interests, or interests common to you and them. You propose a concert with crowned heads! They never concert with themselves, but broils, and quarrels, and wars, follow in the train. History is full of them; and, if entangling connections, sir, between monarchs, who wield the sword and the purse, who make peace and war at their will, be fruitful of these mischiefs, what may we not expect when you enter the lists without the means of doing what you engage to do?

Mr. MORRILL said, that with peculiar emotions, he asked the attention of the Senate to a few remarks on this subject. It was with extreme diffidence he rose to address the Senate on this occasion. I am not insensible, said he, of the extent of the field on which I enter, nor of my inability to explore it. A subject, sir, coextensive with the world, in which this extensive Republic have an interest, and on which, by their delegated Representatives, they may express an opinion—whether they will "use their best endeavors" to effect a complete abolition of the slave trade. Sir, upon this it seems there can be but one opinion.

Coming from New England, where slavery is unknown, my prejudices may be strong, my views enthusiastic; but, sir, allow me to be honest, believe me sincere, permit me to be plain. In New England we believe "all men are born equally free and independent"—thus commences our "Bill of Rights." Whatever their color, powers of mind, property, or rank in society, they are freemen—citizens, not slaves. They have a claim to that freedom in this asylum of liberty. These sentiments, sir, commenced with my existence; advanced with my youth; were strengthened with my manhood; and are confirmed with my age. They are not only mine, but universally the sentiments of those whose confidence and affection have exalted me to this honorable station. Shall I not speak their sentiments on this occasion? Shall I not desire the termination of slavery? It is a duty, sir, I owe to myself, my country, and my God. That respectable section of the nation which I have the honor to represent, has a right to demand it at my hand.

When I examine this resolution, sir, I am unable to discover why any objection should be made. In passing it, we do not say we believe it is expedient to amend "the laws of the United States on the subject of the African slave trade;" nor that we will enter into any "concert with other nations for its entire abolition." But, sir, we say, we are willing to instruct a respectable committee to examine those objects, in all their parts and bearings, as to the expediency of the objects suggested, and report to the Senate, which report will then be under the perfect control of this body. The Senate may then approve or disapprove, as its wisdom may dictate. Where then is the difficulty? For myself, sir, I am in favor of the resolution. Permit me to assign a few reasons. It is founded, in part, on an article of the Treaty of Ghent. The words are as follows: "Whereas, the traffic in slaves is inconsistent with the principles of humanity and justice; and whereas, both His Majesty and the United States are desirous of continuing their efforts to promote its entire abolition, it is hereby agreed, that both the contracting parties shall use their best endeavors to accomplish so desirable an object." In this, sir, there is nothing very specific, as to the manner in which their desires shall be manifested. But the contracting parties view "the traffic in slaves inconsistent with the principles of humanity and justice," and, therefore, agree to use "their best endeavors," to effect its abolition. How this is to be accomplished, is another point. They may have different views, and, consequently, each may pursue a different course. Therefore, sir, I am perfectly willing to submit the subject to the investigation of the committee, that they may report thereon.

The abolition of slavery was contemplated by the framers of our constitution. Sec. 9—"The migration or importation of such persons as any of the States now existing shall think proper to admit, shall not be prohibited by the Congress prior to the year 1808." Here, sir, we see those venerable sages prospectively viewed the period in which we live, when Congress should manifest a disposition to abolish the slave trade. Wise provision! a duty negatively expressed. A provision, sir, which has given rise to a disposition that pervades the United States, to pursue and accomplish the benevolent object. Nay, sir, it is not confined to the United States; it extends to almost every civilized nation on the globe. A spirit of philanthropy glows in the human breast. Spain and Portugal are the only nations now averse to the object. The views of Spain, in all probability, will soon accord with those of other nations. Then Portugal will be the solitary kingdom whose voice and arm are not raised against this inhuman traffic. Let us proclaim, sir, that these sable mortals have a claim upon our philanthropy and our benevolence.

I am in favor of the resolution, sir, because its object comports with the dictates of reason and humanity. Though black, they are human beings, in human shape. That is not their crime, but their misfortune. We then ought to commiserate, not enslave them. Let exertions be made to raise them from their present state of degradation; assist in the mighty work. Every human affection recoils at their bondage. May every benevolent heart beat high for their freedom, and every human arm be extended for their emancipation. It is a cause, sir, in which the world is engaged. As it was commenced by the United States, let them continue their efforts; let Congress say, with all civilized nations, they will joyfully bear a part to accomplish an object so desirable, so humane.

But, sir, I am in favor of the resolution in a political point of view. Carry the great design into effect, and you place those forlorn objects within the reach of political and moral instruction. The basis on which every good Government most firmly stands, is knowledge and virtue. Diffuse and extend these sacred principles, and you enlarge the basis on which your Government is built; and, in the same proportion, you carry the principles of liberty and the rights of man to those who grope in darkness, and aid in the emancipation of those who are bound in the chains of despotism. Virtue and knowledge, sir, are the firm foundation on which this mighty Republic is erected; on which it rises, and on which it will continue to rise, so long as those divine principles are nourished, universally diffused, and practised. This is what astonishes foreigners when they tread American ground. All classes of society can read and write, can name and give the characters of our rulers, the principles of our constitution, the genius of our Government, and the nature of our laws. This was the reason, sir, France could not maintain a Republican Government. Knowledge and Virtue were not sufficiently diffused through the nation. It was not on account of the extent of her territory, nor the number of her citizens. Monarchy and general ignorance go hand in hand. Despotism and slavery are always companions. This, sir, accounts for the protracted struggle in South America. They have physical strength and the means, but not knowledge and skill, to concentrate their exertions to the best advantage. Did they possess the general information enjoyed in the United States, their independence would be as certain as the rising sun.

Mr. President, I am in favor of the resolution in a moral point of view. We, sir, are a Christian nation. The Bible is our moral guide. Are not its principles sacred, its precepts salutary, and its commands obligatory? Have not the frowns of indignant Heaven, and the threatenings of Jehovah, rested on nations and cities for their ingratitude to their fellow mortals? Babylon—Babylon the great has fallen! What has brought her down? The scene is viewed in prospect. "The merchants of the earth shall weep and mourn over her." In what did her commerce consist? "In gold, and silver, and precious stones, and pearls, and chariots, and slaves, and the souls of men." Ah, Mr. President, this was the climax of their abominations! They had a traffic in slaves and the souls of men. This brought down the judgments of Heaven. That they may be averted from the world, let the inhuman traffic be abolished to the end of the earth.

Mr. KING observed that the motion was to instruct a committee to inquire whether further measures can be devised, in concert with other powers, to put an end to the traffic in slaves on the coast of Africa. The debate, said Mr. K., has taken a wider range than from the definite object of the motion could have been anticipated. The advantages or disadvantages of alliances offensive and defensive, and the policy or impolicy of such treaties, as, with the view of acquiring some complicated though important political advantage, pledge the wealth and strength of the United States, are questions of most weighty importance; the discussion of which, however, is not requisite in debating the motion before the Senate. The concert which is alluded to in the motion, is not the union of arms, but of opinion, of example, and of influence, for the purpose of prevailing on Spain and Portugal to accede to the compact already formed among the nations, to put an end to the African slave trade. Equally uncalled for on this occasion, and more to be regretted, is a discussion of the justice and policy of permitting the existence of slavery. This topic is one, said Mr. K., that, from obvious considerations, has at all times been alluded to, even in the Senate, with great reserve; and, at this time, is without application to the motion under consideration, since not only no Senator approves of the traffic, the abolition of which is desired, but the whole Senate condemn it, and the United States were the first among the nations who restrained their people from engaging in it.

By the Treaty of Ghent, the United States stipulated with Great Britain to use their best endeavors to effect the complete abolition of the traffic in slaves on the coast of Africa. If a committee be appointed, they will inquire what has been done in pursuance of this engagement; they will moreover consider what remains to be done, and whether any measures of concert with other powers, or otherwise, may be calculated to promote the laudable object of this stipulation. The United States have Ministers not only in England, Spain, and the Brazils, but likewise in Russia, France, the Netherlands, and Sweden. These Ministers may be reminded of the very great interest which the United States take in the universal abolition of the African slave trade; they may be instructed, if they are not so already, to avail themselves, on every occasion, to promote this object; and the concurring representations and influence of many may accomplish what their separate endeavors have hitherto failed to effect. A long depending negotiation with Spain still exists. If we could prevail on Spain to add to the treaty settling our just claims, an article whereby she should engage herself to abolish the African slave trade, and to co-operate with us in endeavoring to prevail on Portugal also to abolish the same, such an article would enhance the value of the treaty in the opinion of the American people, and would not fail to obtain the applause of foreign nations. The object of the motion being of such great importance, the Senate should neglect no opportunity of manifesting their solicitude for its accomplishment; and the inquiry which is proposed may fortunately discover that there are means still in our power, which have not yet been employed in this meritorious service.

But it is objected, that this business belongs exclusively to the President; and, admitting its importance, and the expediency of further exertions, that the Senate have nothing to do or say respecting the same. This objection appears to be of most serious import, as it goes to restrain and limit what is deemed to be the constitutional power of the Senate. There is some embarrassment in the examination of this objection, and it cannot be fully and satisfactorily done, without adverting to the proceedings of the Senate, in its executive capacity; proceedings which take place with closed doors, and the journal whereof is not published. The observations on this head will, therefore, be of a general nature, Without adverting to the several branches of the executive power, for the purpose of distinguishing the cases in which it is exclusively vested in the President, from those in which it is vested in him jointly with the Senate, it will suffice on this occasion to observe that, in respect to foreign affairs, the President has no exclusive binding power, except that of receiving the Ambassadors and other foreign Ministers, which, as it involves the decision of the competence of the power which sends them, may be an act of this character; to the validity of all other definitive proceedings in the management of the foreign affairs, the constitutional advice and consent of the Senate are indispensable.

In these concerns the Senate are the constitutional and the only responsible counsellors of the President. And in this capacity the Senate may, and ought to, look into and watch over every branch of the foreign affairs of the nation; they may, therefore, at any time call for full and exact information respecting the foreign affairs, and express their opinion and advice to the President respecting the same, when, and under whatever other circumstances, they may think such advice expedient.

There is a peculiar jealousy manifested in the constitution concerning the power which shall manage the foreign affairs, and make treaties with foreign nations. Hence the provision which requires the consent of two-thirds of the Senators to confirm any compact with a foreign nation that shall bind the United States; thus putting it in the power of a minority of the Senators, or States, to control the President and a majority of the Senate: a check on the Executive power to be found in no other case.

To make a treaty includes all the proceedings by which it is made; and the advice and consent of the Senate being necessary in the making of treaties, must necessarily be so, touching the measures employed in making the same. The constitution does not say that treaties shall be concluded, but that they shall be made, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate: none therefore can be made without such advice and consent; and the objections against the agency of the Senate in making treaties, or in advising the President to make the same, cannot be sustained but by giving to the constitution an interpretation different from its obvious and most salutary meaning.

To support the objection, this gloss must be given to the constitution, "that the President shall make treaties, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate ratify the same." That this is, or could have been intended to be the interpretation of the constitution, one observation will disprove. If the President alone has power to make a treaty, and the same be made pursuant to the powers and instructions given to his Minister, its ratification follows as a matter of course, and to refuse the same would be a violation of good faith; to call in the Senate to deliberate, to advise, and to consent to an act which it would be binding on them to approve and ratify, will, it is presumed, be deemed too trivial to satisfy the extraordinary provision of the constitution that has been cited. On the whole, there appearing to be no sufficient impediment in the way of the proposed inquiry, either as respects its expediency or the authority of the Senate to institute the same, I am in hopes that the motion to refer the subject to a committee will prevail.

Mr. LACOCK said the resolution before the Senate contained two separate and distinct propositions; the first was the amendment of the laws that prohibited the introduction of slaves into the United States: on this subject there existed no difference of opinion—all agreed an end should be put to this abominable traffic. If the present statutory provisions were not so formed as to effect this object, they certainly required amendment; and no objection could be made to the inquiry, as this was a legitimate object of legislation. But, said Mr. L., the other branch of the inquiry is of a very different character; it proposes to inquire into the best manner of executing an article of the treaty of Ghent. The stipulations of this article are, that the contracting parties, the United States and Great Britain, should use their endeavors to put an end to the slave trade. But could this agreement be carried into effect by law? Did it furnish a subject of legislation? Laws were made to operate on the people of the United States, and within their jurisdiction, not to effect an arrangement with foreign Governments. This could only be done by treaty; and surely, said Mr. L., the initiatory steps in making treaties should be left with the Executive. But it has been urged by gentlemen in favor of this proposition, that the Senate can act on this subject by virtue of the constitutional power of this body to interpose their advice and consent in making treaties. This argument cannot avail them; for, if we claim the power, and exercise it, as a part of our executive duties, why is this discussion, on the subject of a treaty, had with open doors? Has this ever been the practice of the Government? The Ministers of those Governments who admit and carry on the slave trade, are accredited by our Government—are on the spot, for aught I know, in the lobby or gallery, while we are discussing the propriety of putting a stop to their traffic in slaves. That this branch of the subject is improper for public discussion, is admitted by the gentleman from New York, (Mr. KING,) who has told you he felt embarrassed by this public discussion; that he is restrained by his situation from making observations that he otherwise would feel authorized to make. This concession on his part should convince every one that the proceedings are irregular. While we are thus openly debating the subject, for aught we know, the President is negotiating with other powers to effectuate the object we have in view. He is bound, by the constitution, to see the laws faithfully executed. The Treaty of Ghent has become the supreme law of the land, and it is unfair to presume that the President has neglected his duty. In short, said Mr. L., if we are anxious to have this subject pressed on the Executive, let us close our doors, as in other cases, and make a call on him for information; we shall then be put in possession of the facts officially; we shall know what steps, if any, have been taken, in concert with Great Britain, to put an end to the traffic we all abhor.

The question was then taken on the motion to strike out the latter clause of the resolution, and decided, yeas 16, nays 17, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barbour, Campbell, Eppes, Fromentin, Gaillard, Lacock, Macon, Sanford, Smith, Stokes, Storer, Tait, Talbot, Taylor, Troup, and Wilson.

NAYS.—Messrs. Ashmun, Burrill, Crittenden, Daggett, Dickerson, Fisk, Goldsborough, Horsey, Hunter, King, Leake, Morrill, Morrow, Noble, Ruggles, Tichenor, and Van Dyke.

And on the question to agree to the motion as originally submitted, it was determined in the affirmative.

So it was Resolved, That the committee to whom was referred the petition of the committee of the yearly meeting of the Society of Friends at Baltimore, be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the laws of the United States on the subject of the African slave trade, as more effectually to prevent said trade from being carried on by citizens of the United States under foreign flags, and also into the expediency of the United States taking measures, in concert with other nations, for the entire abolition of said trade.

WEDNESDAY, January 4.

Amelia Island.

The following Message was received yesterday, from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I have the satisfaction to inform Congress, that the establishment at Amelia Island has been suppressed, and without the effusion of blood. The papers which explain this transaction, I now lay before Congress.

By the suppression of this establishment and of that at Galveztown, which will soon follow, if it has not already ceased to exist, there is good cause to believe that the consummation of a project fraught with much injury to the United States has been prevented. When we consider the persons engaged in it, being adventurers from different countries, with very few, if any, of the native inhabitants of the Spanish colonies, the territory on which the establishments were made; one on a portion of that claimed by the United States, westward of the Mississippi, the other on a part of East Florida, a province in negotiation between the United States and Spain—the claim of their leader as announced by his proclamation on taking possession of Amelia Island; comprising the whole of both the Floridas, without excepting that part of West Florida which is incorporated into the State of Louisiana—their conduct while in the possession of the island, making it instrumental to every species of contraband, and in regard to slaves of the most odious and dangerous character, it may fairly be concluded, that if the enterprise had succeeded on the scale on which it was formed, much annoyance and injury would have resulted from it to the United States.

Other circumstances were thought to be no less deserving of attention. The institution of a Government by foreign adventurers in the island, distinct from the colonial government of Buenos Ayres, Venezuela, or Mexico, pretending to sovereignty, and exercising its highest offices, particularly in granting commissions to privateers, were acts which could not fail to draw after them the most serious consequences. It was the duty of the Executive either to extend to this establishment all the advantages of that neutrality which the United States had proclaimed, and have observed in favor of the colonies of Spain, who by the strength of their own population and resources, had declared their independence, and were affording strong proof of their ability to maintain it, or of making the discrimination which circumstances required. Had the first course been pursued, we should not only have sanctioned all the unlawful claims and practices of this pretended government in regard to the United States, but have countenanced a system of privateering in the Gulf of Mexico, and elsewhere, the ill effects of which might, and probably would have been deeply and very extensively felt. The path of duty was plain from the commencement, but it was painful to enter upon it while the obligation could be resisted. The law of 1811, lately published, and which it is therefore proper now to mention, was considered applicable to the case, from the moment that the proclamation of the chief of the enterprise was seen, and its obligation was daily increased by other considerations of high importance already mentioned, which were deemed sufficiently strong in themselves to dictate the course which has been pursued.

Early intimation having been received of the dangerous purposes of these adventurers, timely precautions were taken by the establishment of a force near the St. Mary's to prevent their effect, or it is probable that it would have been more sensibly felt.

To such establishments, made so near to our settlements, in the expectation of deriving aid from them, it is particularly gratifying to find that very little encouragement was given.

The example so conspicuously displayed by our fellow-citizens, that their sympathies cannot be perverted to improper purposes, but that a love of country, the influence of moral principles, and a respect for the laws, are predominant with them, is a sure pledge, that all the very flattering anticipations which have been formed of the success of our institutions will be realized. This example has proved, that if our relations with foreign powers are to be changed, it must be done by the constituted authorities, who, alone, acting on a high responsibility, are competent to the purpose; and until such change is thus made, that our fellow-citizens will respect the existing relations by a faithful adherence to the laws which secure them.

Believing that this enterprise, though undertaken by persons, some of whom may have held commissions from some of the colonies, was unauthorized by, and unknown to, the colonial governments, full confidence is entertained, that it will be disclaimed by them, and that effectual measures will be taken to prevent the abuse of their authority in all cases to the injury of the United States.

For these injuries, especially those proceeding from Amelia Island, Spain would be responsible, if it was not manifest that, though committed in the latter instance through her territory, she was utterly unable to prevent them. Her territory, however, ought not to be made instrumental, through her inability to defend it, to purposes so injurious to the United States. To a country over which she fails to maintain her authority, and which she permits to be converted to the annoyance of her neighbors, her jurisdiction for the time necessarily ceases to exist. The territory of Spain will nevertheless be respected, so far as it may be done consistently with the essential interests and safety of the United States. In expelling these adventurers from these posts, it was not intended to make any conquest from Spain, or to injure in any degree the cause of the colonies. Care will be taken that no part of the territory contemplated by the law of 1811 shall be occupied by a foreign government of any kind, or that injuries of the nature of those complained of, shall be repeated, but this, it is expected, will be provided for, with every other interest, in a spirit of amity, in the negotiation now depending with the Government of Spain JAMES MONROE.

The Message and accompanying documents were read.

THURSDAY, January 29.

Surviving Officers of the Revolution.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act to provide for certain officers and soldiers of the Revolutionary army," together with the amendments reported thereto by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. KING took a comprehensive view of the principal features of the bill, stated his objections to the provision it proposed for seamen, militia, &c., and concluded by moving that the bill be recommitted, and the committee instructed to amend the same, so as to confine its provisions to a grant of half pay for life to the surviving officers of the Revolutionary army on the continental establishment, who served for three years, or until the end of the war, including those who were entitled, under any resolve of Congress, to half pay for life; the half pay so to be granted, to be ascertained by the rank according to which the accounts of the respective officers were finally settled.

Mr. BARBOUR followed, and, after arguing at some length to show the impossibility of providing for all included in the bill, and the impracticability of discriminating between the different classes provided for, moved an indefinite postponement of the bill.

Mr. SMITH said, that, during the discussion of this question, the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. BARBOUR,) and the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. OTIS,) had contended for the first honors of the Revolution, in the acts of the rival compatriots, Mr. Henry and Mr. Adams. Mr. S. said, if South Carolina could not boast of having been first in the Revolution, he could confidently say she was not the least, nor yet the last. She had performed her ample share. But, if he was to decide to whom the first honor was due, he would say to that band of patriots, who, regardless of the consequences, entered the British ships in Boston harbor and threw the tea overboard. This was the first efficient operation, and posterity would look back upon it with grateful recollection.

Mr. S. said he was well aware of the disadvantages under which he should address the Senate, on the merits of the bill, and the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, (Mr. KING;) as what he should urge, he plainly perceived, would be in direct opposition to the general sentiment that prevailed in the House, as he was decidedly opposed to the general principles of the bill, as well as to the amendment. If either ought to prevail, he would prefer the bill. The amendment, he thought, was entirely inadmissible. It had for its object a special provision for the officers of the Revolutionary army, in the continental line, to the utter exclusion, not only of the soldiers of the army, but of the militia of every description; many of whom bore a distinguished part in the contest for the independence of this nation. The bill, as it came from the House of Representatives, was more liberal; it makes provision for the soldiers as well as officers; although it makes no provision for the militia, the bulwark of the nation. It also provides for the distressed seamen and marines of the Revolution. But, says the gentleman who offers this amendment, the seamen and marines, as well as their officers, were well provided for; they were entitled to the prize money. The naval force of the United States, at that time, was very inconsiderable. It consisted of two or three frigates, a few sloops, and a few privateers, which had to contend with one of the greatest maritime powers in the world. The consequence of which was, instead of enriching themselves, most of them fell into the hands of the enemy, who threw them into prison-ships and dungeons, where many of them lingered out a miserable life, and perished. And such as did survive, with a few accidental exceptions, were left poor.

We are told we cannot provide for all, as the state of the Treasury will not admit of it; and the officers are to be selected as the only objects of the public bounty. And we are told as a reason for this preference, that something is due to the rank they hold in society, and that some distinction must be made between men. This is a language not known to our constitution. It may do in private life, if a man is disposed to select his society; but, when we are called upon to legislate on the subject, we ought to know of no distinction. It is repugnant to the principles of our Government, and at war with good sense and public justice.

What is the object of this provision? Why, it is said, to relieve the indigent and necessitous; and our benevolence, our sympathies, and our gratitude, are called upon to prompt us to this duty. This is a strange sort of reasoning. Benevolence, sympathy, and gratitude, can draw no line between the officer and the soldier, when both have served their country, and both are indigent. The tide of pity swells as high for the sufferings of the indigent and necessitous soldier, as it can do for the indigent and necessitous officer, if we are really governed by pity. The morsel you intend to bestow will be as sweet to the one as it is to the other. Several gentlemen have told us we must wait, and feel our way; and if, in future, we should find we are able, then the soldiers might be provided for. If the principle is correct, and the claim is a just one, why not provide for both at the same time? This procrastinating, timid policy, which so lately brought this country to the brink of ruin, and from which you were roused by the people, is not so well suited to their genius. They are more magnanimous; and if there exists a debt of justice, or even a debt of gratitude, which their country is bound to discharge, they will submit to be taxed to enable the Government to pay it. The Government is now one hundred millions in debt, and because there is a little money in the Treasury not immediately wanted, we are endeavoring to establish a pension system to get rid of it, and pave the way, when our debts become due, for laying another tax in the place of the one you have just repealed. Mr. S. was in favor of repealing the internal taxes. It was right to do so. But can we believe the public mind is prepared to pay a tax to maintain a pension system, because it is said that those officers cannot submit to any industrious pursuits for a living? There are thousands of poor who are unable to work, that demand your attention in an equal degree. And are you prepared to put all your poor on the pension list?

It is said this is a just debt; that, under the confederated Government, Congress had engaged to make these officers half-pay for life; which they were induced to commute for five years' full pay; and that this five years' full pay was discharged in certificates, which fell a prey to speculation; and the Government ought to pay them over again. As respects those Revolutionary officers, the Government has acted with perfect good faith. It performed with fidelity all its engagements, as far as it had ever promised, or as far as any hope or expectation had been raised or excited, and that at the earliest possible period within its power, after the conclusion of peace. It is well known that the United States had not the means of paying its army immediately at the close of a seven years' war, in gold or silver. But it is as well known that they did not pay that army in depreciated Continental money. That had gone to oblivion in the hands of those who had given support to the army. Their full pay for real service performed, as well as for five years' full pay after their service terminated, was liquidated and settled at the specie standard; and Government certificates given, which bore interest from the date; and the faith of the nation was most solemnly pledged to redeem them.

With this view the Government, among its earliest acts after the adoption of the Federal Constitution, established the funding system; and these very certificates were worth twenty-six shillings in the pound, and at that price this nation redeemed them. If there was a speculation, the Government had no hand in it. On the contrary, whilst it suffered every other species of public security to perish in the hands of the meritorious holder, it gave a distinguished sanction to these claims, and paid them with scrupulous punctuality. No speculations took place as regarded these certificates until after the funding system was established. These officers were then apprised of their rights, and if they did not think fit to protect them, the Government could not be blamed. Speculations did run high at that time, but the officers were not the victims of it; the soldiers were the persons who fell a sacrifice to its ravages. Many of these officers are honorable men, and stand superior to any such charge; yet it is a fact not to be denied, that many of them enriched themselves by speculating, in their turn, on the poor soldiers, in buying their certificates and land warrants at very reduced prices. It was not in the power of the Government, nor was it the duty of Government, to guard against the speculations that succeeded. It is a monster that pervades every quarter, and almost every department, and if it was the duty of Government to repair its ravages, the treasures of Peru would not be adequate to the demand.

But, Mr. S. said, upon the most mature consideration, he was opposed to both the bill and amendment in any form in which they could be presented. Because he believed no particular merit could be ascribed to any particular portion of the people of the United States, for services rendered during the Revolutionary war, in exclusion of any other portion who espoused that cause. It was as essential, and as indispensable, to the support and maintenance of that war, that many of your citizens should have been engaged in other spheres, and employed in other occupations, as it was that you should have had an army to fight your battles. And one could have been as well dispensed with as the other. This was not a war carried on in your enemy's country, nor were those officers and soldiers sent from home into a foreign country, where they alone were forced to fight your battles, and undergo the toils of war, without any regard. But this was a war of a very different character. This was a war brought by the enemy into your own country; a war brought to every man's door, and in which every man was obliged to take an active part in some shape or other. Yet every man could not be in the army. This was a war of a different character from all other wars. It was a war for liberty and independence, in which every soul was engaged, and in which every one contributed, by every means in his power, or your independence would have failed, even if your army had been five times as strong as it was.

This was not a mercenary army; not one officer was there for the sake of money; but to do his duty. And it is to be recollected, on this occasion, as in the late war, there was a great solicitude for commissions. It was not only the post of honor, but often a place of safety. Other portions of your citizens were active in the public councils, without whose bold and high-toned measures, taken at the hazard of their lives and fortunes, your army would have sunk into insignificance. Whilst others, from a pure love for their country, fed and clothed your armies, supplied them with wagons and horses, and every thing else which they could furnish for its use, without any compensation. By their means, and by their means alone, you were enabled to carry on a seven years' war, without money or credit; a thing unparalleled in the history of any other nation upon earth. They had the ostentatious show of being paid for it in Continental money; which fell dead in their hands, without a single effort on the part of the Government to redeem it. By your Continental money, thousands of the most devoted friends of the Revolution, who lived in affluence and comfort, sunk their whole fortunes in its cause, and are now living in penury and want, with no other consolation than that of dying poor in the cause of their country. They yielded to their misfortunes without a murmur, believing that all were bound to give their aid, and satisfied they had given their full portion. And, because they were not in the Continental army, they have no credit for all those sacrifices. Of what use could an army have been, if this aid had not been afforded, and in this particular way? for you had no other possible means of subsisting it. This was the very life and soul of the army, and the very life and soul of the cause in which they were employed. Without it your army could have done nothing, and you would yet have been under the British Government. It is a maxim brought from another science, which applies as well to governments as to individuals, that you ought to be just before you are liberal. Before you speak of liberality to the Continental officers, redeem your Continental money, and relieve that numerous class of men, widows, and orphans, on whom it has entailed so much misery and poverty. They have a strong claim upon your liberality, your gratitude, and your justice, although they do not assemble around you, in this Hall, as Belisarius, who is presented in your lobby, leaning on his staff, at the moment this subject is called up, as if your cool and impartial judgment stood in need of this artificial aid.

Several gentlemen have, with much confidence, asserted that we are exclusively indebted to the Continental army; that the civil and religious liberty we so pre-eminently enjoy, are the fruits of their toils. Mr. S. said he was sensible of the great merit of that army, and believed they had done a great deal in the cause of liberty; yet, he had no hesitation in declaring, that they had not done more than they ought to have done; nor had they done more than fell to the lot of every American devoted to his country. That army did not meet the common foe, and repel him from your borders with its single arm, and leave all the rest of the community at ease and security under its protecting banners. Gentlemen who believe so, if there are any such, know but little of the character of the Revolutionary war, or the manner in which it was carried on, in the three Southern States of North and South Carolina, and Georgia. They are perfect strangers to the sufferings and privations, as well as the exertions and patriotism of the people of those States; not of such as belonged to the Continental army—during their worst times there was no such army there—but of the volunteers and patriots, who, inspired with an invincible love of liberty, were determined not to yield. All the Continental army was in the Northern States, even to the troops which had been raised in the Southern States, except a few who were occasionally sent, and who were defeated as soon as they came, and which gave no sort of security to the property, the persons, or the lives of the inhabitants.

Mr. S. said it was impossible for gentlemen to know the character of that war in the South, unless they had been there to witness it, and he saw but one gentleman in the Senate (Mr. MACON of North Carolina) besides himself, who had. All the rest were remote from the scene of action, or had since grown up. So it was in the House of Representatives, where this bill originated. Though much distinguished for their talents and worth, yet most of them also were remote, or have been born since that war commenced. Its true character can never be learned from history. The historian never has, nor never will, record many of the most striking events, which so much distinguish it from all other wars, and which so distinguished it as carried on in that section. The historian acquires his knowledge from sources, in most cases, as uninformed as himself, and often bestows the laurels on heroes who never fought the battles. He was not himself far enough advanced in life to bear an active part in the operations of the war, but was old enough to observe all the passing events, and had a perfect recollection of them.

All the Continental troops sent to the southward, previous to 1781, were totally defeated. General Lincoln lost several successive battles, and never gained one, and was, with his whole force, finally taken prisoner. General Gates, who succeeded him, shamefully fled at the fire of the first gun, and left the citizens to the mercy of the enemy. These successive defeats left the country entirely exposed. The British not only supported their whole army for two years, by plundering indiscriminately from all who refused to take protection, their cattle, their hogs, their sheep, their corn, rice, and forage of every kind, but they turned loose the savage Indians upon the defenceless frontiers, who butchered them without regard to age or sex. By these disasters, the Tory parties, that everywhere infested the country, became increased, and, with a fury more unrelenting, and no less savage than the Indians, plundered, burned, and murdered wherever they went; and the whole country became a perfect scene of internal warfare. They not only stole and plundered to supply the enemy, but wantonly burned and destroyed to distress the country; they waylaid and murdered the Whigs wherever they found them; sometimes murdered them amidst their families, with their wives and children around them, begging in vain for mercy. They burned up their houses and plantations, and with them every thing that could give comfort or support to the distressed women and children, who were reduced to a morsel of bread, and very often could not get that. The British army pervaded the whole country, and, wherever they went, left destruction in their train. That whole country was a wide waste; nothing presented itself but ruins, poverty, and distress. The cultivation of the fields, in many places, was left entirely to the women and children. Plundered of every hog, horse, cow, and every thing else for their support, many mothers and daughters, who had seen better times, were obliged to lay down their domestic employments, and go to the fields and work like slaves, without the aid of a horse to plough, to raise a little corn to subsist themselves and their little children; and very often even this hard-earned morsel was plundered from them, or destroyed by the enemy. This picture may appear to be exaggerated, but there are many who know it to be correct, and who remember it with bitter regret.

Whilst their women and children were left in this forlorn situation, the men sought their safety by imbodying in such parties as circumstances would allow. If they could not collect a hundred, they could collect fifty; if not fifty, twenty, or ten, or five. Armed with their rifles, with more than veteran bravery, they hung upon the borders of the British army wherever they went; sometimes firing upon the whole army, or cutting off their foraging parties, and circumscribing their ravages, to their great annoyance; and they became the scourge of the Tories in all quarters. This was the foundation of that military force which proved so formidable to the British arms, and gave them the first check in the Southern States. After losing all hopes of any relief from the Continental army, they threw themselves under Campbell, Cleveland, Shelby, Hill, and others, without one Continental officer or soldier among them, and totally defeated Colonel Ferguson, the best partisan officer in the British army, at the battle of King's Mountain. It was this character of men, who, under Colonel Pickens, as their commander, composed two-thirds of that inferior force, General Morgan's detachment, which completely defeated the British legions and infantry, under Colonel Tarleton, at the Cowpens; and this officer never had been defeated before.

Can it be said these men owe their independence to the Continental army, for whom you are now about to provide? Whether you consider them as patriots, or soldiers, or as sufferers, or conquerors, they are entitled to as distinguished a rank as any portion of the Continental army during the Revolution. When these transactions were fresh, and their importance and worth well understood, there was a public opinion, competent to decide, that did them justice. But, when thirty-six years have elapsed, like every thing else, not performed by great men, they are forgotten.

Gentlemen have spoken of the militia service as of very little importance during the war; and seem to exclude entirely from any merit all but the Continental army and its officers; and one gentleman has intimated they could not be trusted as regards their veracity and honor. Who fought your battles, sir, before you had a Continental army? Who fought your battles at Lexington, at Concord, and at Bunker's Hill, at the first dawn of the Revolution, that, like the electric spark, pervaded every rank, and gave a tone to the war that only ended with it? These warriors were your militia, collected upon the spur of the occasion, from their shops, and their domestic and rural pursuits; and, roused by the eloquent and immortal Warren, and his compatriots, they displayed an intrepidity not surpassed by your Continental army. Who fought and dispersed that numerous and formidable body of Tories, on Cape Fear, in North Carolina, who were corrupting the minds of all around them? It was the militia, collected upon a single day's notice, who, with their provisions and their blankets on their backs, marched to the scene of action, under General Caswell, with a promptness unknown in any but freemen, and defeated their enemy without the loss of a man, or without costing the Government a single farthing, and restored peace and order to that country for a long time after.

Who defended Charleston on the memorable 28th of June, 1775, before you had any Continental army there? Where the whole British fleet, consisting of two fifty-gun ships, several frigates, and a number of smaller armed vessels, were repelled, and some of them burned. The enemy, after a battle of ten hours, were obliged to retire with great loss on their part, and very little on the part of the Americans. The inhabitants of that city contributed much to this defence, and, but for General Moultrie, the whole garrison would have been surrendered by General Lee, who was the superior officer, and who, it is to be recollected, was a Continental officer. Who composed the active corps under Sumter, Hampton, and Middleton. Those gallant men were inferior to none, and did more good than all the Continental soldiers you ever had there. Yet there was not a Continental soldier among them; nor does one of them come within the provisions of this bill. Marion raised his men within the British lines; their food was what they could catch, the earth was their bed, and the heavens their covering, and the swamps and marshes were their stronghold. These men were in this service for more than a year; they fought more battles, gained more victories, killed more British and Tories, in proportion to their own number, than any other class of men upon the continent; and gave more relief to the Americans, and more annoyance to the enemy. These brave fellows never cost their country so much as a single charge of powder; they furnished even their own arms, and they used them like heroes. "These were times that tried men's souls." The Government gave them no pay, and they are excluded from its bounty by the bill before you. These men are not indebted to the Continental army for their independence.

In the two celebrated battles of Guilford and Eutaw Springs, under General Greene, a considerable part of his men were militia. Although there were Continental troops among them that distinguished themselves with great bravery, yet the number was very small; and the militia, and especially at Eutaw Springs, were not inferior to the Continental troops, and did more service. These were said to be the best fought battles during the war. While these scenes were going on in the Carolinas, Georgia, under Clarke, Williamson, and others, was a perfect scene of bloodshed. Notwithstanding all this, they are called ephemeral, and we are told the militia cannot be relied on either as respects their bravery or their honor. Sir, among these militia, there were men as honorable as ever breathed, and as brave as ever drew a sword. And the Government is as much indebted to them for their bravery, perseverance, and sufferings, and owes them as much protection and support, as any portion of the Continental army.

The principle of gratitude has been strongly pressed. It is said we are reproached with ingratitude by the European nations. And what is it they have not said to reproach us? They have said we are barbarous, savage, and ignorant; incapable of governing ourselves; that all Republican Governments have fallen; and that we have been ungrateful to our armies. And it was only since the late war, the common people of Europe knew we were white men. But, they have at last found out that we are not only white, but that our Government has some energy. And if they will compare what we have done for our army, with the condition of their own, they will find also that we are grateful. The Kings and Princes of Europe sometimes sell their armies to one another to fight their battles abroad—or they hire them for a job; and all that are not returned, are paid for at a stipulated price. The Hessian troops, attached to the British army during our Revolutionary war, were hired on these terms. However, if any are returned, that are worn out in service, they are stowed into a hospital for the remainder of their days, but they get nothing else. If there is a favorite officer, he is converted into a lord, and a large pension is settled upon him, and his heirs; and the people are taxed to support them. It is the pensioner who complains of our ingratitude, and not the farmer and mechanic who pay the tax.

This Government gave to each Continental soldier, at the close of the war, his pay for services, and a valuable tract of land, which was giving him the best means in the world to enable him to live happy. It paid the Continental officers for all their services rendered, and five years' full pay after the war had ended; and gave each a large tract of land, which has been a fortune to all who took care of it, and their children after them. In addition to this, there has not been an office of honor or profit in the gift of the United States, or any individual State, which has not been filled by a Continental officer, if he asked for it. And the Government has given to every officer and soldier who has applied, a pension for life, if he had been wounded or disabled in the public service. Let the two be compared, and see on which side the gratitude preponderates, and then let us be told what the despots of Europe say.

All the despotisms of Europe have had their foundations in a claim to military merit. All their pensions and places originated in it. All the orders of knighthood and other distinctions now so oppressive; the feudal system, which so completely prostrated the civil liberty of all Europe, against which the wisdom of ages has not been able to prevail, originated in it. All their usurpations, and all their changes of empire, were commenced and supported by it. It was military fame that enabled Cromwell to turn out of doors a British Parliament, and assume the reins of Government. It was military distinction that prompted Bonaparte, at the head of his army, to supersede the French Convention, and put himself upon the imperial throne, and devastate almost the whole of Europe. Your own Revolutionary officers, for some of whom you are now providing, at the close of the war associated themselves into a military order, and called it the Cincinnati Society, after the celebrated Roman General, Cincinnatus, who left his plough with regret, when called by his country to the head of the army; and after he conquered the enemy and returned in triumph, he laid down his office, and retired back to plough his fields at the age of eighty years. This society, too, made an early effort to perpetuate itself, and ordained that the son should succeed to the military honors of his father. However, it was frowned upon; and they soon found it too much of an exotic to flourish upon this soil, and the hereditary clause was abolished. This hereditary quality was not in conformity to their great prototype, Washington. He, with true Roman virtue, returned to perform the duties of a citizen, and maintained himself by the sweat of his brow, after he laid down the pursuits of a soldier. It is difficult to imagine why our American officers and soldiers did not do so too. Many of them did, and are rich from their own industry. No country upon the globe ever presented more facilities than this. But the Roman virtue has lost its charms, and we are imitating nations nearer our own times. It is not the amount which this measure will cost the nation that is the most objectionable, but the abominable perpetual pension system that is to grow out of it. It may not be immediate; it is to come on gradually, as all other systems of oppression have done. And when we are gone to rest posterity will writhe beneath the yoke, borne down by hearth money, excises, and taxes, to support pensions and places—the curse of a nation.

Mr. MORRILL said he should not, at this late hour, and advanced period of the debate at which he rose, detain the Senate with many remarks on the subject now under discussion.

The object suggested in the President's Message, said he, and that which is also contemplated in the bill from the House, is to afford relief, by pecuniary assistance, to surviving officers and soldiers of the Revolution, who are now in indigent circumstances. It is intimated that it is impossible to frame a bill which shall equitably meet the wants, relieve the necessities, and satisfy the expectations of this meritorious class of our fellow-citizens. I do believe, Mr. President, that the wisdom of Congress is competent to form a bill, the details of which shall meet all reasonable expectations on this subject. But as the merits of the bill are not immediately under discussion, I pass them to the motion which is directly before the Senate, that the further consideration of this subject be indefinitely postponed. To this motion, sir, I am opposed, and shall assign some reasons. To pass this resolution, would be, in effect, to put this subject at rest; if I may use the expression, to wink it out of sight. To this, Mr. President, I cannot give my assent. If we take a concise view of our country previous to the declaration of independence, and the trying scenes through which our fathers passed to gain and establish this independence, I presume we shall be fully satisfied, that the few remaining veterans of the Revolution, bowed down with infirmity and age, deserve the interposing hand of the National Government for their relief, for the mitigation of their wants in their declining years.

What, sir, was our situation antecedent to the bold assertion of our independence? We were an oppressed, insulted, degraded people. We were burdened with unjust acts and duties, too offensive and unreasonable to be endured by a people sensible of their rights and privileges. We were invaded by an armed force. The same power who we had reason to expect would, as a parent, protect our privileges, entered our harbors, blockaded our ports, landed an army on our shores, demolished and burnt our towns, and fought and killed our citizens. These events roused the spirit, called forth the energy, and marshalled the strength of the nation. This was a time that tried men's souls; this was the day in which the patriot and the hero distinguished himself from the sycophant of a deluded monarch. Independence was declared by a new Government, imperfectly organized. Now, sir, it needed the co-operation of the whole strength, patriotism, and energy of the nation. The heroes of the country flew to arms; they ran to the field of battle; they met the invading foe, and repelled him with undaunted determination.

And what were the sacrifices of those who fought our battles, and achieved the numerous blessings which we enjoy? Many of us, Mr. President, who have seats in this House, who are participating the favors purchased by their toils, and basking in the beams of national glory, were too young minutely to recollect the distresses of that day. Those who were of age, and were active on that memorable era, have informed us. History has not been silent on a subject so momentous.

Were I to endeavor, sir, to paint to you the sacrifices of those times, I should fail in the attempt. I will only say, they forsook every domestic accommodation; they left their homes and their families, and submitted the cultivation of their farms, in numerous instances, to their wives, their little sons, and their daughters, who were under the necessity of laboring in the field to procure subsistence; while they endured the noisome camp, the fatigues of an army, and the dangers of battle. But, sir, their efforts were not unsuccessful; they disputed the ground at the cannon's mouth; they survived the mighty conflict; they obtained the ultimate object—national independence; and some of them now live to enjoy the fruit of their labor, though in indigence and want. These are the characters, Mr. President, whose necessities I wish to relieve. Providence has protracted their years; they are declining under the pressure of poverty and age; they are now petitioning you for assistance. Will you suffer the gray hairs of these veterans of the Revolution to come down with sorrow to the grave? They, sir, have a claim upon your benevolence and humanity—nay, more, your justice. Though some honorable gentlemen suggest that these Revolutionary patriots, having been well paid, have no claim upon the justice of Congress, I am inclined to think otherwise, because I conceive many of the infirmities under which they are now groaning, are in consequence of the privations and exposures endured while in the service of their country. In the camp and the field, their constitutions were broken down; the natural effects of which are infirmity and distress in advanced years.

Permit me, Mr. President, to ask the honorable members of this Senate, if they are willing to see the warworn soldiers of the Revolution hovering round their dwellings, round this Capitol, asking for a pittance, and not manifest a disposition to afford them that pecuniary assistance necessary to supply the cravings of nature, and repair their tattered garments? This is the only tribunal to which they can apply. Shall they seek in vain? Shall those who met the foe at Lexington, Bunker's Hill, Monmouth, and Bennington, supplicate your aid without success? No, sir; we, who possess the blessings procured by their sufferings, have too much magnanimity, too much humanity! They need assistance; they merit assistance. It is to the indigent that I would extend the hand of liberality. And, sir, so long as I have the honor of a seat in this House, I will exert my feeble powers for the mitigation of the necessities of those who, by their valor, toils, and blood, achieved the civil and religious privileges which we now enjoy.

Mr. MACON, of North Carolina, said, when he came to the Senate this morning, he had no intention or expectation of saying a word on this question, which had excited so much feeling. It seemed to him that the friends of the bill founded their arguments entirely on feeling—a feeling, he was ready to acknowlege, of the most honorable kind; but he was not perfectly satisfied that it was proper to legislate on feeling alone. The constitution certainly never intended it, or it would not have required a certain age for any appointment; nor did he believe the motion to postpone liable to the objection which had been made; that the friends of the bill were forced to defend it as it was, when they wished to amend it. The motion was agreed by all to be perfectly in order, and it only brought the principle of the bill into debate, which gave both sides the fairest opportunity to urge whatever they thought proper; and this he conceived ought to be the nature of every first discussion, especially when a great and important change was about to be made in the character of a long-established law; the principles of which were settled by the Revolutionary Congress, and not attempted, he believed, to be changed before the present session. A debate like the present ought always to take place in every legislature, when motions which only contain first principles are under consideration, and cannot with propriety be omitted.

Mr. M. said he felt more than usual embarrassment in attempting to speak at this time, because there was reason to suppose that a great and decided majority was opposed to him, and it was not agreeable to speak to those who were prepared to vote, but it was all that a minority could do to state their opinions, and because, contrary to the practice of the Senate, two motions, distinct from each other, had been debated at the same time; that of the gentleman from New York (Mr. KING) to recommit the bill to the Military Committee, with instructions so to amend it, as only to include the officers who were in service at the end of the war, and that of the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BARBOUR) to postpone the bill and motion to a day beyond the session. He would here say, that the observations of the gentleman from New York, in support of his motion, had not convinced him, that a discrimination such as he desired, or any other, could with justice or propriety be made. To discriminate in a satisfactory manner, at any time, or in any country, between those who were equally worthy, was a task not easily performed; that gentleman having failed to show that it could be done, as he with great deference verily believed, it might now be considered as utterly impossible, and would not, in his opinion, be attempted by any other.

Mr. President, when the character, numbers, and wealth of the British nation, to which may be added its constant preparation for war, are compared with the situation of the United States at the commencement of the Revolution, it must prove to all, that every whig in the country had as much as he could do to maintain the independence which the Congress of 1776 had manfully declared, to the joy of the nation, and which the whigs boldly determined to defend at the risk of their lives and their fortunes. It was the day that tried men's souls. The immortals words "Liberty or Death," on the hunting shirt of every friend of the Revolution, contained nothing but the truth. The practice was according to the motto; but now, no matter what services may have been rendered, unless the persons who rendered them were in the regular army, they are not to receive a cent under the bill, though they may have paid many. The bill does not provide for one-half who have equal merit; as to claim, there is none; and the motion of the gentleman from New York will leave a much greater number not provided for. No man can estimate higher than I do the worth and service of the Continental troops, but the fall of Charleston left none in the Southern States, and it is certainly true, that after that event the men commanded by Sumter, Marion, and Jackson, rendered as much service as any in the nation; in fact, they had no superiors; they left their wives, their children, their homes and their all, to the rage of a victorious enemy, who was in pursuit of those he declared rebels, and enraged neighbors, in the most gloomy and disastrous period of the great struggle, to fight for their country, its liberty and independence. Nor is there any provision for that man, with his small band of warriors, who started with their parched corn on their backs, into the country, or rather wilderness, mostly inhabited by savages, and gained by their victories a country to the nation, out of which five large States will be added to the Union; indeed, two are already added, and a third soon will be. It is scarcely necessary to state that General George R. Clark and his warriors are meant. Can justice, honor, generosity, or feeling, require that all these, together with the widows and children of those who were slain in battle, as well as the deranged officers mentioned by the gentleman from New York, should be taxed to support their fellow patriots, who were at that time, as far as respects the officers, in a more enviable situation? It is well known, that the deranged officers constantly complained of their being deranged, and that they preferred to have been continued in the service; many of them, not willing to stay at home, obtained commands in the militia, and in that way served the country. Nor ought it to be forgotten, that tents and all camp utensils were never plenty, and often scarce, and that the regulars were always first supplied with whatever could be furnished, and that too with the best there was; whatever was left, after furnishing the regulars, was divided among the militia, who were frequently without tents or camp utensils, unless they carried them from their homes, and in many parts of the Southern States these necessary articles were not abundant. In wet and stormy days it was not uncommon to see tents formed by two or three or more men putting together not their blankets, for but very few had them, but bed covers, which had been spun and wove at home; those who were not fortunate enough to carry any thing of this kind, stood by trees with bark or whatever they could get to cover their heads to keep the rain off. The character the war then assumed, forbade any article necessary or convenient to the soldier to be in plenty; there was nothing like it in any other part of the nation, if in the world. In calamity and fury it so far surpassed a common civil war, that the name is improper for it. He knew not by what name to call it, perhaps a domestic war would come nearer to it than any other. In the parts of the country where the Whigs and Tories were mixed, it was neighbor against neghbor, house against house, and neighborhood against neighborhood; destruction and death were the orders of the day; each party hunted the other, either alone or in numbers, as circumstances would permit—neither trouble nor pains were spared to destroy and kill. In many places, houses, fences, and every thing necessary to support life, were burnt, leaving the women and children only with the clothes they had on, to depend on a more fortunate neighbor for sustenance and shelter. In some cases this was done, when the husband or son, or perhaps both, were confined in jail, because they were Whigs; many plantations were left without stock of any kind, not a horse nor cow, in this forlorn condition to be cultivated by the women and children, who, if they were fortunate enough to gather a part of the corn they had labored to produce, were compelled to beat it in a mortar into meal, or carry it themselves to a mill to be ground, if one was left in the neighborhood. Places may yet be seen where houses were burnt, which yet remain not built on. The rich and the poor who survived, and who would not agree on any terms to remain neutral at home, when parts of the country were overrun by the enemy, shared nearly the same fate, left with nothing but life and liberty.

Many gallant actions were performed in this neighborhood war, which history will never record, and many gallant and patriotic men fell, whose names will in a little time be forgotten in this their beloved country, for which they freely shed their blood and lost their lifes. Mebane and Kulp are of the number who were slain in these terrible conflicts, and are now almost forgotten. These engagements were generally fatal and sanguinary in proportion to the few that fought. With permission he would repeat that it could not be just or right to tax these people to give a pension to any, because they were in the regular army; it seemed like taxing the bones of the brave and the ashes of distress; the officers of the army, at the end of the war, received five years' full pay, and both officers and soldiers land from the United States; besides, every State which had back land unsettled, gave land to the same officers and soldiers, which were raised in the State. But it is said that the Continental troops were paid in depreciated certificates, not worth more than one-eighth of their value. This is undoubtedly true; yet they were considered to be more valuable than the State certificates, in which the others were paid. Certificates were then the only currency of the governments; they made all their payments in them. After the fall of the paper money, provisions for the army were frequently taken from families which could not well spare them. Whenever necessity compelled this, Whig and Tory fared alike; but a certificate was the only payment. The depreciation was a national calamity, from which no one was exempt; it was as general as the liberty we now enjoy, and, though equally free, we are not now equally rich.

We have been frequently told that some of the officers and soldiers of the Continental army are poor. This no doubt was true. He also believed it was equally true that some of the troops which he had mentioned were equally so. This will be the case among every class of men; some will get rich while others do not; there is a time to get and a time to spend; the industrious and careful will either get rich or comfortable, while those who are not so, will neither be rich nor comfortable. To undertake to provide for those who will not provide for themselves, will, on experiment, be found an endless task; it may suit other countries, but it does not this; it will drain any treasury no matter how full, and, instead of repealing taxes, new ones ought to be imposed. Pass the bill, and the pension will not do those who do not provide for themselves as much good as it will others, who know their failings, and will take care to be with them when it shall be received. The gentleman from Maryland (Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH) wishes the bill to pass, to do away an opinion which had been entertained, that Republics were ungrateful; he did not state it to be his opinion. It was a pleasing fact that the history of the United States did, in the most satisfactory manner, prove that it was not true, as it regarded them, nor did he believe it, as it regarded others. It has been promulgated by the flatterers and sycophants of kings and despots, to become their favorites and pensioners, to live sumptuously on their folly or wickedness, or both, on the profits of the labor of those who were more virtuous and better than themselves. The opinion is founded in idleness and hatred to free Governments, where every man ought to live by the sweat of his own brow—where no man ought to be paid to do nothing. But, do as you will, the same class of people will entertain and promulgate the same opinion; and he was unwilling to attempt to do away the opinion by passing that which he conceived to be an improper and unjust act. He would add, that, in despotic Governments, to complain would be deemed a crime, and that the only liberty enjoyed was that of abusing Republics.

It has been said that the officers of the Revolutionary army would have been severely punished if the United States had been conquered. This, he believed, was not thought of at the time, because no Whig ever calculated on being conquered, and every one had determined not to be. But whether they would have been punished more severely than others, he did not know; all had committed openly what, in that case, would have been deemed treason. He, however, was of opinion that the most severe punishment would not have been inflicted on the army. The history of the times warranted the opinion. He rather thought it would have been inflicted on those daring patriots who were members of the first Congress, those who declared independence with the halter about their necks, and those who ordered an army to be raised. These are the men, he thought, on whom vengeance would have been taken. Permit me here, said Mr. M., to state what was certainly true, and that too in praise of a class of men who rarely received praise—that no class of men in the nation had more merit for the Revolution than the lawyers. Where he was acquainted, they were all Whigs; he did not at this moment recollect a single exception. They understood better than most others the rights and privileges of the then colonies, and exerted themselves, with advantage to the country and honor to themselves, to persuade others to examine and understand them; they succeeded, and we now enjoy the benefit. He hoped this digression would be pardoned; he had only given the well-merited praise. He would return to the subject. If the pensions are to be given, because the army deserved well of the country, and some of them are now poor, would it not follow that all who deserved well, and are now poor, ought to receive a pension? Would it not follow that if any members of the Congress he had mentioned, were now alive and poor, that they, too, for the same cause, ought to have a pension? It would, he thought, be difficult to give a reason for one, which would not apply as forcibly to the other. The deserving well and being poor, would apply equally to both. He repeated that he wished it to be distinctly understood that he was not denying the worth or merit of the Revolutionary army. God forbid that he should; he never for a moment entertained a single sentiment that even tended toward its dishonor; but he was opposing the principles of the bill, and the motion to recommit, both of which he fully believed were against the principles which carried it into the field. Nor did he mean to class them with the seventeen hundred applicants for office in the late war, which had been mentioned. He, however, felt no hesitation to acknowledge that he approved their conduct; they did what at all times they ought to do—show a willingness to aid their country in defence of its just rights, and to take part in a war which had been emphatically called a second war for independence. Pass the bill, and it makes a precedent for the army engaged in that war and in every other. Precedent is now almost equal to the constitution, and will probably, in a few years, be quite so. It does not require the gift of prophecy to foretell that thirty or forty years hence, as much may be said in favor of the army engaged in the second war for independence, as we have now heard about the first, though as much may not be said about the state of the country and of the sufferings of the people, because the facts will not warrant it. The troops, however, in the late war, in the uninhabited parts of the country, suffered greatly, and bore their sufferings manfully. The victories obtained by them have not been surpassed in any age or any country; they were fully equal to those of Lexington and King's Mountain; but the men who fought these two glorious battles are not provided for in the bill, because they were militia.

It is not improper to observe, that pensions in all countries begin on a small scale, and are at first generally granted on proper considerations, and that they increase till at last they are granted as often on whim or caprice as for proper considerations. The bill is an entire departure from any principle heretofore established in this country; it requires little or no proof to get the pension, and it gives to all alike, without regard to disability or meritorious services. The history of the half-pay for life, and the commutation for it of five years' full pay, show as clear as daylight the opinion then entertained by the nation on the subject of pensions, and the bill as clearly shows how much that opinion has changed since, and that the opinion in favor of pensions is fast gaining ground. It seemed to him that it must operate on the mind like sweet poison does on the taste; it pleases at first, but kills at last. The objects to whom they are granted are only thought of at the time, without reflecting that a part of the money to pay them is to be taken from those who are not in a situation to spare it conveniently; the few rich are not apt to complain of taxes, especially if they believe they are intended to promote what they deem the glory and splendor of the country; they take a full share of that to themselves, and they can live well and pay the tax; but it is not so with the poor; every cent taken from him diminishes his comfort and lessens his independence. It is quite probable that some of the poor, who may contribute their mite to pay the pensions given by the bill, may have been reduced to poverty, by the enemy's burning and destroying their property, for fighting on the same side, and probably in the same battles with those who are to receive them. He would just remark, that he did not think this a proper place to speak of our charity at home. Charity is commendable in all men, it is enjoined on all men, but it ought to be so given as not to let one hand know what the other does. Besides, our private worth, whether for charity or any other virtue, is best known to our neighbors, who always duly appreciate it. He had heard so much said of the feelings of gentlemen on this interesting and important question, that he was almost induced to doubt whether he had as fine feelings as others. He, however, hoped he had, but others must judge, not himself; but, whether he had or not, he could not consent to gratify them at the expense of his judgment.

The old Congress is often praised and always deservedly; on the present occasion it would seem proper that their decision should have great weight, as they conducted the Revolution, raised the Army, and settled with it, and gave to each individual whatever was his due, under all the circumstances of his case. It may not be improper to state that that Congress only paid the Continental troops; the militia and State troops were paid by the States to which they belonged, and the States granted and paid them pensions till within a few years past, when the General Government assumed the pension list of each State, placing all the pensions granted for Revolutionary services on the same ground; and this policy, if the bill is to pass, ought now to be followed—that is, to place all having equal merit on the same ground.

The recommendation of this subject to the consideration of Congress by the President, who was a Revolutionary character, had been mentioned. This recommendation, like every other from the Executive, he felt it his duty to examine with deliberation, and treat with respect; he had, however, to regret that he could not agree to pass an act in conformity to it; the reasons for this he had endeavored to state; his regret, however, would be much greater, if all the preceding Presidents had not also have been Revolutionary characters; and he did not recollect at this time that any one of them had made a similar recommendation, though he had not examined their Messages to ascertain the fact, he spoke only from a momentary recollection of a memory not now very good; if the fact was, as he believed, no one could doubt but that one of them, General WASHINGTON, was as much attached to the Army as any man in the nation. He had thought proper to say this much to enable all to decide whether the national opinion was tending towards pensions or not.

As much had been said about our rich Treasury, and but few to provide for, he thought proper to state that neither of these facts had any weight with him; if justice required that the bill should pass, neither the condition of the Treasury nor the number to be provided for ought to be taken into consideration. As to the Treasury being rich, it had been more so some years past, but was emptied without the aid of such a bill as this.

He hoped the gentleman from New York would pardon him for saying, that, whether the national opinion was changing or not, he thought the vote on this motion, and that for passing the bill, would prove that the gentleman and himself were both a little out of fashion. He, however, believed that they would bear it as it became them, without grieving or complaining; each generation would govern itself, and they had had their day.

On the exertions of the Whigs in the Southern States, after the fall of Charleston and the sufferings of the people, he could, he was sure, speak a month, and not exhaust the subject. He had, however tired himself, and, he feared, fatigued the Senate. He would, therefore, take his seat.

MONDAY, February 2.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate of the United States:

In compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 8th of last month, requesting me to cause to be laid before it, the proceedings which may have been had under "An act, entitled 'An act for the gradual increase of the Navy of the United States,'" specifying the number of ships put on the stocks, and of what class; the quantity of materials procured for ship building, and also the sums of money which may have been paid out of the fund created by said act, and for what objects; and likewise, the contracts, which may have been entered into, in execution of the act aforesaid, on which moneys may not yet have been advanced; I now transmit a report of the Secretary of the Navy, accompanied by a report from the Board of Commissioners of the Navy, with documents which contain the information desired.

JAMES MONROE.

The Message and accompanying reports and documents were read.

THURSDAY, February 3.

Surviving Officers of the Revolution.

Agreeably to the special order of the day, the Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill entitled "An act to provide for certain surviving officers and soldiers of the Revolutionary Army," together with the amendments reported thereto by the Committee on Military Affairs; and the question recurring on the motion to postpone the further consideration of the bill until the first Monday in July next—

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. President, as it appeared to be the disposition of the Senate, when this subject was under discussion some days past, to go into the merits of the bill now before you, upon the question of postponement, submitted by the honorable gentleman from Virginia, I must conform to that wish, although I had much rather that the discussion could have been deferred until the bill had been so modelled as to have approached more nearly to the wishes of all.

I hope the motion for a postponement of this bill to a day beyond the session will not be carried, as I consider it a high and solemn duty incumbent upon us to make some remuneration to the worthy and indigent men who are now presented to our attention. The feelings of all who have delivered their opinions upon this subject seem to be in accordance with the object of this bill; but difficulties arise on every side that appear to be insurmountable, the greatest of which is, to what class of men we shall direct our benevolence. The merits of all have been exhibited to view, and we are told, if we discriminate we shall do injustice; and if we include all, that the finances of the country will be exhausted in the undertaking. It is not my purpose, sir, to detract from the merits of any; but surely, Mr. President, if there is any one definite class of men more meritorious than another; if there are any men in this country, who, by their services and sufferings, have rendered themselves most dear to our recollections, and most worthy of our gratitude, they are the officers and soldiers of the Revolutionary Army. If they are infirm, we ought to sustain them; if they are indigent, we ought first to help them.

The objections which have been offered to the question now before us are formidable, from their number and variety. It will be proper for me in the first place to examine these objections, not with the arrogant pretension of effectually doing them away, but of endeavoring to place them in such a point of view as in some degree to impair their force, and to render them less imposing than they have been considered.

It is objected, that the Revolutionary officers and soldiers have no claim against the Government; that all that was ever promised them has been given, and all that was ever stipulated has been complied with. It is not pretended by any of the advocates of this measure that these men have any strict claim in law, but the expectation is most ardently and sincerely entertained that a case can be made out that will authorize (and we hope induce) a grateful country to make them the objects of generous munificence.

By various resolutions of the old Congress, certain officers of the Revolutionary Army were to be placed on half-pay for life. This half-pay was afterwards commuted for five years' full-pay. From whom the proposition of commutation came, is a disputed point; and as I do not know that it has any material bearing upon this question, I will forbear to inquire into it. The origin of the commutation is to be traced to those murmurings and discontents which were exhibited in many parts of the country against the half-pay establishment; and those who were to receive it, notwithstanding the pledges of devotion to their country which they had given in the field, were met with the opprobrious epithets of hireling, mercenary, and pensioner! It is to the prejudice which existed everywhere amongst us, against the country from which we had been separated, and against every establishment similar to hers, that we are to look for the cause of this sensation. It is allowable to call it a prejudice, sir; for, what we term a prejudice now, was a virtue then. The superior officers in the Army, who were the oldest, first agreed to this commutation. At their time of life, the bargain was a pretty good one, if they had been paid in good money; but not so with the young officers, who constituted by far the greater portion. Yet these, under the influence of their superior officers, to whom, from habits of discipline and long-tried confidence, they had ever looked with a veneration that knew no change, and with an affection that found no limit, at length consented, and accepted the commutation. It seemed to be the last chance—the only hope. No sooner had they accepted the terms, and received the final settlement certificate, as the evidence of the debt due them from the Government, than their necessities forced them into the hands of the remorseless speculator, and they sold the reward of their toils—some for eighteen pence, some for two shillings, and some (more fortunate than the rest) for half a crown in the pound.

A captain's pay is always taken as a fair average in the Army, on which to found calculation. The pay of a captain was forty dollars a month—four hundred and eighty dollars a year. The commutation of five years' full-pay would amount to twenty-four hundred dollars. There was due at the time of disbanding the Army about two years' and a half pay, or fifty per cent. upon the amount of commutation. This added to the commutation would be twelve hundred dollars more; making in all thirty-six hundred dollars. A final settlement for thirty-six hundred dollars, with a captain, sold by him then at two-and-sixpence in the pound, or thirty-three and a third cents in the two dollars, and sixty-six and two-thirds of a cent, would give him about four hundred and fifty dollars—a sum less than the pay for one year for his whole commutation and arrearages. If it is remarked that the act of selling was his own, I reply, that it was his necessity, and not his will, consented—a necessity produced by the incapacity of the country to pay him in money of value.

The certificate of final settlement for thirty-six hundred dollars purported upon its face to bear an interest of six per cent. until paid. It was passed in 1783. Six years afterwards, Congress, unable to pay off these claims, had recourse to the plan of funding them, and instead of paying the six years' six per cent. interest upon the certificate of thirty-six hundred dollars, (which would have been twelve hundred and ninety-six dollars,) they converted that interest into a stock bearing three per cent. interest. Thus, by the very act of conversion, saving to the Government and taking from the captain half the amount of his interest, (equal to six hundred and forty-eight dollars;) for, if any interest was due, it was six per cent. Again: The amount of principal, being thirty-six hundred dollars, was also converted into a stock bearing six per cent. interest, two-thirds of which was to bear a present interest of six per cent. and the interest upon the remaining third was deferred for ten years, saving again to the Government the interest of six per cent. upon twelve hundred dollars for ten years, which is equal to seven hundred and twenty dollars; thus, the Government saved to itself, out of the money due a captain, by the mode of payment which it adopted, six hundred and forty-eight dollars of the interest due him, and seven hundred and twenty dollars by withholding the interest upon one-third of his principal for ten years, making, in the whole, the sum of thirteen hundred and sixty-eight dollars. Instead, then, of paying the captain the amount of principal and interest due him by the evidence of his certificate from under the hand of the Government, their necessities compelled them to have recourse to a system of payment to which the creditor was not a party, that saved to the Government the sum of thirteen hundred and sixty-eight dollars, and took it from him to whom it was justly due. I do not pretend to say, sir, that this constitutes a debt at this time of day, according to, and recoverable by law; but to my mind it creates an obligation to make some remuneration, against which neither time nor circumstances can avail.

I know full well, Mr. President, that it was the depressed condition of the finances of the country at that time, that produced this calamitous state of things. I am aware of it, and I regret it. The condition of the nation, then, was that of an unfortunate debtor, who had stopped payment with a prospect of more ample resources at a future day, and called upon her creditors, who were her benefactors, and made the most equitable and fair composition with them that she could. It is now, sir, when this debtor, our country, is opulent, and powerful, and prosperous, that we desire her to do, what every honorable member in this Senate, I am persuaded, would do in his own private capacity, I mean to remunerate those who had sustained losses in consequence of her former disability to discharge her just debts.

Other objections to this bill are derived from the various classes of men who served and suffered in the Revolution. We are told of those who served in the councils of the country at that time—of those who suffered from the ravages of the enemy, and from the destructive neighborhood wars, which existed in some of the States, in consequence of a difference of sentiment—and lastly, of the militia. And, as a strengthener to all, we are told, that the States individually have done much for the officers and soldiers of the Revolution. Mr. President, towards those illustrious men who filled the councils of this country, during the great Revolutionary struggle, I can feel nothing but the most exalted reverence, and respect, and admiration. It was to their steady perseverance and unshaken fortitude, that we owe the success of that contest which gave independence to this country. Their wisdom, their constancy, and their fidelity, will ever be remembered. But what they planned in council, your army sustained in the field. If they toiled and watched over your destinies, they had some periods of time that they could devote to their families and their private concerns—they had it in their power to pay some attention to domestic cares—and, in the midst of their faithful labors, their health was taken care of; they were plentifully fed, and comfortably lodged at night. Not so with your army: half-starved, half-naked, tracked on their course by the blood from their unshod feet, they followed their Heaven-directed leader with heroic constancy and courage—defying the elements—exposed to every vicissitude of season and of weather—bearing up against the multiplied calamities of the most ill-provided warfare, they sunk from their toils to catch a moment of repose upon the frozen field, uncovered, except by the skies. Sir, there is no comparison between the sufferings of these men; and as little between their present condition, arising from the difference of that service.

Whatever may have been the misfortunes of those who were injured by the fury of the enemy, or of their neighborhood wars, it is impossible at this time of day to estimate. The case is remediless with all its horrors. We have seen the difficulty, for some years past, of providing for the destruction committed in the late war. Two years have been consumed in establishing the principles which shall govern in those cases, and yet every day a memorial is laid upon our table, asking redress for cases not included in the law. If such difficulties are felt on account of losses of such recent date, how can we hope to redress those where time has swallowed up both the parties and the evidence; and gentlemen must excuse me, sir, for saying, that I do not consider it altogether fair to introduce an impracticable case against us, and then deny that we ought to do that which is feasible, because we don't do that which is impossible.

As for the militia, sir, their services were often useful, often admirable—but their employment was very different from that of the Continental army. The militia were generally employed for short periods, and not taken far from home; their services were mostly performed in defence of their own neighborhood, and their fatigues and exposure were comparatively small when contrasted with that of the regular army. As to the rewards which the States have benevolently bestowed upon such of the officers and soldiers as were within their respective limits, it does them much honor, but we cannot shelter ourselves under the charity of others. It was for the nation at large that these men fought and bled; it was for the country they encountered all their hardships, and it is from the national Treasury they ought to be reimbursed.

But the greatest objection of all, is the supposed exorbitancy of the sum necessary for the object. This is the point at which I fear we shall falter. Perhaps a little examination into this point may diminish the obstacles that our alarms have created. There is no certain evidence to which we can have recourse at this time to ascertain, with exactness, the number of surviving officers and soldiers of the Continental army. Various calculations have been made by those who may be supposed to have the most accurate means of information, and these have proved unsatisfactory. The only document we can find upon the subject, is the number of men discharged at the time the army was disbanded, which was about thirteen thousand five hundred—if to this is added one-fourth of that amount, to include those who have been discharged after one, two, or three years' service, we shall have in the whole the number of 16,875 men. A better computation can be made of the officers, who are more known in the community, and who are generally recorded in the society of the Cincinnati. They are estimated at rather more than two hundred survivors, being one-tenth of the whole. If we calculate the men by this mode, and it will be an extravagant calculation—for in all the estimates of human life the most precarious hold, the greatest mortality, is always found to be among that class of men who, from their condition, are most exposed, least attended to, and most destitute of essential comforts. If, I remark, we adopt this mode of calculation, we shall have 1,614 survivors of the non-commissioned officers and privates of the Continental army—a number, one-third if not one-half exceeding what any intelligent Revolutionary officer now alive believes to be the true one. Taking then the estimate, at this large calculation, of two hundred officers and sixteen hundred and eighty-seven privates, the whole amount of half-pay per annum to each, (estimating a captain's half-pay as the measure of that of the officers,) would not exceed one hundred and fifteen thousand four hundred and eighty dollars, a sum inconsiderable in itself when compared with the object, and a sum that will diminish in an accelerated ratio every year, until, in ten years from this, there will not be a tenth remaining to be paid. If there is an error in this statement, it unquestionably is by making the estimate too large, and when we come to reflect upon the object to be accomplished, and the means necessary for the purpose, I trust that we shall neither feel hesitation nor reluctance.

Encouragement to Emigrants.

Mr. SANFORD presented the memorial of the New York Irish Emigrant Association, praying that a portion of unsold lands (in the Illinois Territory) may be set apart, or granted to trustees, for the purpose of being settled by emigrants from Ireland, on an extended term of credit, as stated in the memorial; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The memorial is as follows:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled.

The memorial of the New York Irish Emigrant Association respectfully showeth: That your memorialists, while they presume most respectfully to solicit your attention to the helpless and suffering condition of the numerous foreigners who, flying from a complicated mass of want and misery, daily seek an asylum in the bosom of the United States, are emboldened by the recollection that a liberal encouragement to the settlement of meritorious strangers has always characterized the Government and constituted authorities of the Union. The wise and brave founders of its independence held out to the oppressed and suffering of every nation the consoling assurance, that in this country, at least, they should find a refuge and a home. The successors of these illustrious men have continued to redeem, in calmer and happier times, the pledge made to philosophy and benevolence amidst perilous scenes of distress and difficulty. From this humane and beneficent policy America has reaped a rich and happy harvest. She has added to the national resources the moral and physical strength to be derived from so many thousands and tens of thousands, who, actuated by attachment to her free constitution, have adopted the nation where liberty has made, and is making, her most glorious stand, as the country of their choice.

Your memorialists, in addressing your honorable body, need not seek to enforce by argument the generally received maxim of political economy, that the wealth and solidity of a nation consist in the number, the social comforts, and the productive industry of its people. In the dense and crowded States, and under the existing Governments of Europe, these sources of wealth and stability are not always found well combined. It frequently does not happen that the social comforts, or even the productive industry, are proportioned to the number of the people. In the extended territory and scattered population of the United States, however, and under their free and blessed institutions, it is an unquestionable and important truth, that every increase of inhabitants, when wisely and judiciously distributed and settled, adds to the social comforts and productive industry of the whole, and that the excess of population, which cannot be considered as giving stability to the various Governments of Europe, if suffered or encouraged to settle here, would incalculably increase our wealth and strength. But that accession is doubly valuable which also brings to the common fund, with a mass of laborious industry, unalterable attachment to the laws and constitution of the country. And, surely, to give a wise direction to that industry, and to secure by well-placed kindness that attachment, are among the noblest exercises of legislative authority.

Your memorialists beg leave respectfully to represent that at no period since the establishment of American independence have the people of Europe, particularly the laboring classes, discovered so great a disposition as at present to emigrate to the United States. But the people of Ireland, from the peculiar pressures under which that country has so long been placed, have flocked thither in the greatest number, and perhaps under the most trying and necessitous circumstances. They come, indeed, not to return and carry back the profits of casual speculations, but to dedicate to the land of their hopes their persons, their families, their posterity, their affections, their all.

It is, however, a truth, regretted by those who have the best means of observation, that, for want of guides to their steps, and congenial homes, where all their honest energies might be called at once into activity, and their hardy enterprise turned to their own advantage, as well as to the general good, they remain perplexed, undecided, and dismayed, by the novelty and difficulty of their situations. They have fled from want and oppression— they touch the soil of freedom and abundance; but the manna of the wilderness melts in their sight. Before they can taste the fruits of happy industry, the tempter too often presents to their lips the cup that turns man to brute, and the very energies which would have made the fields to blossom make the cities groan. Individual benevolence cannot reach this evil. Individuals may indeed solicit, but it belongs to the chosen guardians of the public weal to administer the cure. Nor is the misdirection or the destruction of the capabilities and industry of these emigrants to be regretted only on its own account. The story of their blessed hopes and fortunes is transmitted back, and retailed with malicious exaggeration. Others, possessing more abundant means and more prudent habits, who have been accustomed to look with longing eyes to this free country, and contrast its happiness with the present state of Europe, are discouraged and deterred by their sufferings and misfortunes; and thus a large current of active population and wealth, inclined to flow into and enrich the United States, is dammed up at the fountain-head. A serious consideration of these circumstances induce your memorialists to hope, and most earnestly but respectfully to request, on behalf of those whose interests they urge, that a portion of unsold lands may be set apart or granted to trustees, for the purpose of being settled by emigrants from Ireland, on an extended term of credit. The conditions of this grant your memorialists wish to be such as may give to the settlers its entire benefit, and may exclude all private speculation in others. They also beg leave to suggest, after contemplating the various uncultivated tracts which invite the labor of man, that a situation adapted for a settlement of that description might be found among the lands lately purchased in the Illinois Territory.

Your memorialists are fully sensible that many of the most persuasive arguments in favor of their application must be addressed, and will not be addressed in vain, to the benevolence and sympathies of the Legislature; but they also confidently appeal to its wisdom and patriotism. The lands to which they have alluded, being frontier and remote, are neither likely to be speedily exposed to sale, to be rendered by cultivation subservient to the general prosperity, nor by settlement conducive to the general strength. The portion which might be granted on extended credit would probably be paid for almost as soon as if it had not been brought into the market before its regular turn. During that time, in which it would otherwise remain unproductive, (and therefore unprofitable,) thousands of families would have acquired opulence, would have benefited the country by its cultivation, by the establishing of schools, the opening of roads, and the other improvements of social and civilized life. They would form a nucleus round which a more abundant population would rapidly accumulate, and all the contiguous lands would be largely increased in value. The small loss which might appear to be sustained by the suspension of interest on the credit (if it should have any existence) will be abundantly compensated by the money and labor that must be almost immediately expended on works of general utility, which the convenience and necessities of the settlers will naturally induce them to accomplish. But who can calculate the physical or moral, or even the pecuniary advantages in time of war, of having such a strong and embattled frontier?

The Irish emigant, cherished and protected by the Government of the United States, will find his attachment to their interest increase in proportion to the benefits he has received. He will love with enthusiasm the country that affords him the means of honorable and successful enterprise, and permits him to enjoy unmolested and undiminished the fruits of his honest industry. Ingratitude is not the vice of Irishmen. Fully appreciating his comparative comforts, and the source from whence they flow, he will himself cherish, and will inculcate on his children, an unalterable devotion to his adopted and their native country. Should hostilities approach her in that quarter, whether in the savage forms of the tomahawk and scalping-knife, or with the deadlier weapon of civilized warfare, the Irish settlers, with their hardy sons, will promptly repel the invasion, drive back the war upon the enemy, and give to our extended frontier security and repose.

Your memorialists therefore humbly pray your honorable body to receive and listen favorably to their application. And, as in duty bound, they will ever pray, &c.

Great Britain—Extra Dues.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I lay before the House of Representative copies of two communications received at the Department of State from the Minister of Great Britain, and submit to their consideration the propriety of making such legislative provisions as may be necessary for a compliance with the representations contained in them.

By the express terms of that compact it was, when ratified by the two Governments, to be in force for the term of four years from the day of its signature. The revocation of all the discriminating duties became, therefore, the obligation of both Governments from that day, and it is conceived that every individual who has been required to pay, and who has paid, any of the extra dutics revoked by the Convention, has a just and lawful claim upon the respective Governments for its return. From various accidents it has happened that, both here and in Great Britain, the cessation of the extra duties has been fixed to commence at different times. It is desirable that Congress shall pass an act, providing for the return of all the extra duties, incompatible with the terms of the Convention, which have been levied upon British vessels or merchandise, after the 3d of July, 1815. The British Parliament have already set the example of fixing that day for the cessation of the extra duties of export, by their act of. 30th June last, and the Minister of the United States in London is instructed to require the extension of the same principle to all the extra duties levied on vessels and merchandise of the United States in the ports of Great Britain since that day. It is not doubted that the British Government will comply with this requisition, and that the act suggested may be passed by Congress, with full confidence that the reciprocal measure will receive the sanction of the British Parliament.

MONDAY, March 2.

Fugitive Slaves.

Agreeably to the special order of the day, the Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill respecting the transportation of persons of color for sale, or to be held to labor, and the bill having been amended, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House accordingly; and on the question to agree to the amendment made, as in Committee of the Whole, to strike out the 6th section of the bill, amended as follows:

"SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That no person shall transport or convey by land, from one State to another, or from one State or Territory to another, any negroes, mulattoes, or persons of color, for the purpose of sale, without first recording the name, age, sex, color, and stature of every such negro, mulatto, or person of color in the office of the court of the county where such negro, mulatto, or person of color last resided, together with his own name and place of residence. And any person who shall attempt, or be engaged in the transportation or conveyance by land of any negro, mulatto, or person of color, as aforesaid, without first making the record as aforesaid, a copy of which, under seal and duly attested by the clerk of the court in which such record is made, shall be the only evidence, shall forfeit and pay one thousand dollars for each and every negro, mulatto, or person of color thus attempted to be transported or conveyed by land, one moiety thereof to the use of the United States, the other to any person or persons who shall sue for, and prosecute the same to effect, in any court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof."

It was determined in the affirmative—yeas 23, nays 6, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barbour, Crittenden, Eppes, Fromentin, Gaillard, Hunter, Johnson, King, Leake, Macon, Morrill, Otis, Sanford, Smith, Stokes, Storer, Tait, Talbot, Taylor, Tichenor, Van Dyke, Williams of Mississippi, and Williams of Tennessee.

NAYS.—Messrs. Burrill, Goldsborough, Horsey, Noble, Roberts, and Ruggles.

On motion by Mr. TALBOT, the further consideration of the bill was postponed until Friday.

FRIDAY, March 6.

Fugitive Slaves.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act to provide for delivering up persons held to labor or service in any of the States or Territories, who shall escape into any other State or Territory."

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, said, when this subject was first brought before the Senate, he had determined to take no part in the debate. But, as it had assumed such a complexion, both as it respects the constitutionality of the provisions of the bill itself, and the subject-matter upon which it is founded, as well as the severity of the remarks used by gentlemen opposed to its passage, he considered it his duty to make some reply. The gentleman from Rhode Island (Mr. BURRILL) insists that the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, secured by the ninth section of the first article of the constitution, will be infringed by this bill, because a person of color taken under it cannot have the right to his freedom tried by the judge before whom the return of the writ of habeas corpus is made. Mr. S. said he pretended to no law knowledge beyond that of other gentlemen, yet he did most unequivocally deny the construction of the constitution as given by that gentleman. The writ of habeas corpus was never intended to give a right of trial. It merely gives the right to the person confined to demand an inquiry whether he is held in custody upon a ground warranted by law; and if the judge before whom he is brought finds he is detained by legal authority and upon legal grounds, he cannot discharge him, but is obliged to remand him. If the authority by which he is held appears to be legal, it is perfectly immaterial whether the cause is a just one or not. And when a fugitive from labor has been taken under this law, the cause of his detention will be fully set forth in the certificate by the judge before whom he is to be taken, whose duty it is specially made to do so. Then can it be pretended, after you pass a law prescribing expressly under what proofs a fugitive shall be taken, and that the fugitive shall be specially described by the judge in the order he is to give for his removal, and that the proofs have been satisfactorily made before him the person therein described is a fugitive slave, and belongs to the person who holds him in custody, that another judge has a right to question all this, and take upon himself alone to try his right to freedom, and discharge him? It is impossible. The writ of habeas corpus was never intended to give any such right.

This would give a judge the sole power of deciding the right of property the master claims in his slave, instead of trying that right by a jury, as prescribed by the constitution. He would be judge of matters of law and matters of fact; clothed with all the powers of a jury as well as the powers of a court. Such a principle is unknown in your system of jurisprudence. Your constitution has forbid it. It preserves the right of trial by jury in all cases where the value in controversy exceeds twenty dollars. The gentleman has said, if this bill should pass it will enable the Southern planters to take and carry away, not only their own fugitive slaves, but any other person of color, whether he be a free man or a slave. It would enable them to carry off a free white man, and even one of the members of this Senate. Sir, the gentleman from Rhode Island may consider himself as perfectly safe from any such hazard; for, however much we may respect our Northern friends as gentlemen, as lawyers, and as statesmen, we should have no sort of use for them in our cotton fields. Nor should we admire their political instructions to our slaves if they should carry with them their present impressions.

The honorable gentleman has spoken of the practice of the Southern people in kidnapping their free negroes, and calls them man-stealers. And the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. ROBERTS) has called them kidnappers, men-stealers, and soul drivers; and he asks, in a very emphatic manner, who drew this bill, and upon what authority? Or if it was brought in upon the application of any of the abolition societies? And then he answers these questions himself, and says it was not, but that it had been drawn by a cunning lawyer, and was supported by lawyers. Sir, this language does not comport with the moderation which that gentlemen expressed a desire should prevail in this discussion when he addressed the Senate on the subject early in this debate. Is this the language we are to meet when we are suing for our constitutional rights? The Constitution of the United States has guaranteed to the master a right to pursue his fugitive slave, and has enjoined upon the State to which he shall fly to deliver him up. It has not left it optional with the State to which he flies, but has made it imperative that he shall be delivered up. And has it come to this, that we must wait for the permission of the abolition societies before a law can be offered to secure the recovery of just rights? This was not more novel than strange.

Mr. S. said, it had been a practice in monarchical governments to discredit lawyers, where they had often been foremost in checking a high-handed tyranny; but he had not expected to hear it practised in the Senate of the United States. The lawyers of this country had nothing to fear upon an investigation of their general character. They had been wanting in no public duty. During the Revolutionary war, as well as the late war, many of them had displayed as much gallantry in the field, and as much ability in the councils, as any men in the nation, whilst these abolition societies were in ease and security at home, following their domestic pursuits, and leaving it to others to fight their battles. Mr. S. said he was sorry to make these remarks, but they were just, and were forced from him. He admired the moderation and virtue of these people; he thought them worthy of imitation in many respects, but he did not admire their constant efforts to alienate the affections of the people of color from their masters, with whom they lived happy, and by whom they were better provided for than the peasantry of any other country upon earth; or, indeed, in some portions of this country, if the facts given by their writers be correct. Mr. Melish, of Philadelphia, in an essay published only a few days ago, states, that there are in the city and county of Philadelphia at least fifteen thousand people, all able and willing to work, who are either idle or occupied in unproductive labor, and says, that melancholy picture pervades the country throughout. This place is the very centre of emancipation; and if unable to furnish employment for their own population, is there any reason why they should add to this picture of growing distress, by an accumulation of free negroes?

Notwithstanding all that has been said by our northern brethren against us for keeping slaves, they employ their free blacks in all their drudgery, and obtain their labor on better terms than masters do. And although it does not apply to that body generally, yet it is a fact, susceptible of proof, that some who profess to promote this principle of abolition, have seduced the slaves from the neighboring States under promises to secure their emancipation, instead of which they put them to work, and treat them with so much more severity and injustice than their masters, that the slaves either made it known where they were, or run away from these new tyrants and went back to their former state of slavery, as a better and more desirable condition.

With all this boast about freedom and emancipation, there are only four States that have no slaves. Even the magnificent State of Pennsylvania is a slaveholding State; so is the State of Rhode Island. Those which are non-slaveholding States, with the exception of Ohio, have not long since got rid of them. Rhode Island, New York, and Pennsylvania, previous to taking steps to abolish slavery, furnished the Southern markets with considerable numbers. And the very moment the African trade was opened in South Carolina, in the year 1803, these very States furnished their full proportion of shipping to carry it on. Even our friends in Boston, and other New England States, were willing to help with their shipping; besides, it furnished a market for their surplus rum. So we perceive, whenever interest is concerned, and a little profit is to be made, all this delicacy about slavery is laid aside.

Whilst it was their interest to hold slaves, so long they kept them. Whenever the interest coupled with it ceased, slavery ceased, but not before. After the war, trade revived, especially in the Eastern States; it was found that a negro capital must give way to a commercial capital; which was infinitely more profitable. So it is now with banking capital. Even in the States where slavery exists to the greatest extent, we find many selling off their negroes and vesting the proceeds in bank stock; and especially those who live in the towns and cities. This capital, being so much more profitable than the other, it is constantly increasing. And there are no persons more apt to remonstrate against that crying sin slavery, than such as have just sold off their stock of negroes, and vested the price in bank stock. Slavery, then, becomes very odious. They wish to see it abolished—they do not like to see this traffic in human flesh. But it is because they have got its precious price in a stock that will yield them a three or four-fold profit; not till then can they see its enormity. It is a very convenient thing to be receiving a large profit upon his stock, which is going on under the fostering hand of bank directors, whilst the owner is asleep or taking his pleasure. We have lately seen it published, that some banks have divided as much as thirty per cent. upon their capital, whilst the most successful planter will not receive more than ten, and, very many years, not half that amount. This banking system is what will form the groundwork for overthrowing this species of property, by gradually diminishing the number of its holders, and increasing the bank stock influence. Look how slavery has diminished in the public estimation, as the other system has grown. The States which have taken measures to abolish slavery, have become perfectly bank mad. New York has abolished slavery after ten years, and she is convulsed with banks, and not yet satisfied. There was a late attempt to establish one with a capital of six millions, but it was checked by the Executive. The State of Pennsylvania, already abounding in banks, incorporated forty-seven by one law—they climbed over the Executive veto to do so; two-thirds of the Senate, and about three-fourths of the House of Representatives supporting it. Many of these banks, without a farthing of capital, drawing a large income from the hard earnings of the honest and unwary part of the community, and absolutely refusing to redeem their paper, without one compunction for the misery and ruin it brings with it. When these very frauds were practising to an enormous degree, without a murmur, except from those who were sinking under it, the feelings of that country were bleeding for the supposed distress of the slaves of the South.

The famous article in the Treaty of Ghent, by which we have guaranteed to England our co-operation in abolishing the African slave trade, is worth notice. Our Commissioners, friendly to banks and opposed to slavery, had no instructions to enter into any such stipulation. Great Britain had not long before abolished that trade; and our Government had done so forty years before, by an ordinance of the First Congress, in 1774, and which had been rendered more complete by a law of 1807. It was totally unconnected with the subject of negotiation. We were at war upon other grounds entirely. Not even a question of commerce had ever arisen between the two nations upon it; yet it found its way, an isolated article, into a Treaty of Peace!

The Colonizing Society is another step in this grand scheme. This society intends to send the free negroes, and other persons of color, into the wilds of Africa; by which they are to be torn from the land of their nativity, and every thing to which they are attached by friendship and habit, and the advantages of civilized life, and left to sink again into all the miserable barbarity of their ancestors. But it is said it will pave the way to a general emancipation.

We do by no means suppose that any honorable member of Congress would think of such a thing as a general emancipation; because, independently of interfering with private rights, they know too well that such a measure could not take place without involving the whole of the United States in an awful situation. But, that a general emancipation is intended there can be no doubt, by the Eastern and Northern States, if they can find means to effect it. The abolition societies are avowedly for it; what else can the very name itself indicate? Although their numerous petitions, now before Congress, purport to extend no further than to prevent kidnapping, yet, look at the language of the petitions. If they had applied directly for emancipation, they could not speak plainer. Connected with these petitions, now in the possession and under the consideration of Congress, is the resolution of the gentleman from Rhode Island, (Mr. BURRILL,) to inquire "into the expediency of the United States taking measures, in concert with other nations, for the entire abolition of said trade." As this resolution had been once before the Senate, and had been referred by a majority to a committee to report with what nations, and under what regulations we should connect ourselves to effect this project, Mr. S. said it would not be out of the way to advert to it, and inquire what hopes we had of a fortunate result. With whom is this Government to connect itself in this desirable work? It would seem that it ought to be with nations whose general policy is favorable to emancipation, and whose subjects enjoy the blessings of civil liberty at home, before we could expect much beneficial aid from their co-operation. We are not to hope for this from Russia, Prussia, and Austria, whose subjects are borne down by the iron hand of tyranny. Their peasantry are bought and sold at home like slaves, and are suffered to be sent to this country and sold in our markets. Nor is it to be hoped for from England, if her policy should dictate to her a different course. She is now riding foremost in this career, because it promises to extend and promote her commercial interest, whilst her millions of paupers at home are dying in garrets, or falling by the wayside, and if they assemble, to raise their cry to their rulers for bread, the riot act is read, and then the military is ordered to fire on them. Three of these nations, assisted by the ships of the other, have spread their sceptre over the destinies of Europe, and formed a holy league against its dawning liberties. These are the nations with whom you are to associate to abolish slavery. It is not to be wondered at, under all this influence, with a total want of knowledge of the comfortable condition of the slaves, that our northern neighbors should feel unfavorable to slavery. But most of the northern gentlemen, when they remove to the southward, and when they can see and judge for themselves, have no hesitation in buying slaves. General Greene, to whom the State of Georgia gave a plantation that cost five thousand guineas, and South Carolina ten thousand pounds sterling, for his services during the Revolutionary war, had no hesitation in purchasing a large gang of negroes to cultivate this plantation, notwithstanding he had been raised to the northward, and had been brought up a Quaker.

But, there is another perpetual source of misrepresentation, which serves to place it in an odious light to straugers: it is the number of catch-penny prints and pamphlets that are published by persons who know no more of the condition of the slaves than they do of the man in the moon. Go to a bookstore, and you meet prints hung up in some conspicuous place, in large capital letters, "Portraiture of Domestic Slavery," published in Philadelphia; or the "Horrors of Slavery," published in Cambridge, and sold in Boston. These pamphlets contain all the extraordinary cases collected on the high seas, in the West Indies, or United States, together with such inflammatory speeches of travellers, who have no other means of giving to their writings interests, than by dealing in the marvellous; or of fanatic preachers, or speeches in the British Parliament, calculated to inflame without being able to instruct, and suited more to promote a particular policy than to promote the rights of humanity.

At the time the memorials of the several abolition societies were presented to the Senate, some unknown hand had laid on the desk of each Senator a pamphlet entitled "The Horrors of Slavery, in two parts, by John Kenrick; sold in Boston, price twenty cents." This twenty-cent pamphlet gives many horrible pictures of slavery; and no doubt the author knew this great moving cause, the twenty cents, would multiply in proportion to the extravagance of his descriptions. This twenty-cent pamphleteer, amongst his other good offices, has pointed out Louisiana as a very fit place to colonize all the slaves, after they are emancipated, (which he seems to think a certain event,) and takes care not to lose sight of the fine market it would afford for their manufactures. Mr. S. said, if an emancipation should take place he would rather see them settled in the Northern States among their friends, where they could be better superintended. The people of the Southern States would by no means thank Mr. Kenrick for such neighbors; and more especially if they are to be educated like the free negroes in the Northern and Eastern States, if the account given by the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. DAGGETT) be correct, of which we have no doubt. He says they have fifty white inhabitants for one black, and that there are three public crimes committed by the blacks where there is one committed by a white person. This will make the proportion one hundred and fifty to one. And, if we are to judge from the registers of their penitentiaries, we should believe they have their full share of crimes, even amongst their whites.

This same pamphleteer, after giving us the pious effusions of English travellers, Northern pamphleteers, American map-makers, and British members of Parliament, gives us a pathetic extract from the speech of the late Mr. Pitt, in the British House of Commons, upon the question for abolishing the African slave trade, which, sir, is worth reading. It is in the following words: "The present was not a mere question of feeling. The argument which ought, in his opinion, to determine the committee, was, that the slave trade was unjust. It was therefore such a trade as it was impossible for him to support, unless it could first be proved to him that there were no laws of morality binding on nations, and that it was not the duty of a Legislature to restrain its subjects from invading the happiness of other countries, and from violating the fundamental principles of justice." This, sir, was the language of Mr. Pitt, the celebrated orator and accomplished statesman, who decries the traffic, after his country has filled her colonial possessions with slaves, whilst there was yet an inch of ground for them to cultivate, and to check the growth of the colonies of other rival nations, and under whose policy every nation in Europe has been drenched in blood for twenty years; and who, at the very moment he was remonstrating so strongly against invading the happiness of other countries, and violating the fundamental principles of justice, was planning and carrying on a most cruel and desolating war in the distant regions of Asia—a war, not of defence, but a war purely for conquest—a war carried on by corrupting and exciting rival chiefs, and then holding out terms of friendship to the conqueror, who is made the tool of further treachery, and who falls in his turn, a victim to the same perfidy; until England has reduced under her dominions more than seventy millions of people, who pay them tribute, and have no liberty left, but that of worshipping Juggernaut! At no time since the days of civilization has the happiness of other nations been more disturbed or injustice more practised towards them than during the administration of Mr. Pitt. When the sources of our admonitions shall become more pure, we shall no doubt allow them more weight.

But we are told by these pamphlet writers, that slavery is "a violation of the Divine laws." And the gentleman from New York, (Mr. KING,) in discussing this subject, has told us, "it is contrary to our holy religion." And the gentleman from New Hampshire (Mr. MORRILL) has told us, that in New England, they believe "all men are born equally free and independent;" that "every human affection recoils at their bondage." The gentleman has said, "the Bible is our moral guide;" and says it was for dealing "in gold and silver, and precious stones, and pearls, and chariots, and slaves, and souls of men, that produced the downfall of the great Babylon." And he seems to think, that, unless we abolish slavery, we shall provoke the wrath of Heaven, and that we shall go next. The gentleman has forgot one of the great offences of that people; it was for taking of usury. The same Bible which he has adopted for his moral guide says: "Take thou no usury of him, or increase; but fear thy God." This part of the Bible must have become obsolete in New England since the introduction of banks. It must now be pleasing in the sight of Heaven to see a dividend as large as twenty per cent. to each bank share. There are as many chariots, as many pearls, as much gold and silver, perhaps, in New England, as there was in Babylon, at the time of its fall; yet they are in no danger till the vengeance of Heaven has fallen on the slaveholding States first, the gentleman seems to think.

Upon this great question, sir, notwithstanding the opinion of honorable gentlemen to the contrary, there have been some very respectable opinions as to the Divine authority in favor of slavery. We all know that Ham sinned against his God and against his father, for which Noah the inspired patriarch cursed Canaan the son of Ham, and said, "A servant of servants shall he be unto his brethren." Newton, who was perhaps as great a divine as any in New England, and as profound a scholar, in a book of great celebrity, called his Prophecies, in which he endeavors to prove the divinity of the Bible by the many prophecies that are now fulfilling, says that this very African race are the descendants of Canaan, and have been the slaves of many nations, and are still expiating in bondage the curse upon themselves and their progenitors. But it may be said that this is only an opinion of Mr. Newton, and that we can see no reason in it. Mr. S. said, if the gentleman was unwilling to believe Mr. Newton, he would surely believe Moses and the prophets. And if the Senate would indulge him, he would show from the Bible itself, that slavery was permitted by Divine authority; and for that purpose he would open to the xxvth chapter of Leviticus, and read as follows: "And the Lord spake unto Moses in Mount Sinai, saying, Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them," &c. 39. "And if thy brother that dwelleth by thee be waxen poor, and be sold unto thee; thou shalt not compel him to serve as a bond-servant: 40. But as an hired servant, and as a sojourner, he shall be with thee, and shall serve thee unto the year of jubilee." 44. "Both thy bond-men and thy bond-maids, which thou shalt have, shall be of the heathen that are round about you: and of them shall ye buy bond-men and bond-maids. 45. Moreover, of the children of the strangers that do sojourn among you, of them shall ye buy, and of their families that are with you, which they begat in your land: and they shall be your possession: 46. And ye shall take them as an inheritance for your children after you, to inherit them for a possession; they shall be your bond-men forever," &c.

This, Mr. President, is the word of God, as given to us in the Holy Bible, delivered by the Lord himself to his chosen servant Moses. It might be hoped this would satisfy the scruples of all who believe in the divinity of the Bible; as the honorable gentleman from New Hampshire certainly does, as he has referred to that sacred volume for his creed. It might satisfy the scruples of Mr. Kenrick, and the divines who appear so shocked at seeing a father dispose of his slaves to his children by his last will and testament, as they will perceive the Scriptures direct them to go as an inheritance. The honorable gentleman says, he speaks not only his own, but the universal sentiments of all those he represents. If he and his friends of New Hampshire have not turned aside after strange gods, it is hoped the authority I have quoted might satisfy them.

The Senate adjourned to Monday morning.

MONDAY, March 9.

Fugitive Slaves.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act for delivering up persons held to labor or service in any of the States or Territories, who shall escape into any other State or Territory."

Mr. MORRILL addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. President, I think it correct and proper for any gentleman who is not in favor of the bill, to present his objections on the second reading, that its friends may have a fair opportunity to amend it. Under these impressions, I make a motion for a recommitment, that any imperfections may be properly laid before the Senate.

I am not insensible, sir, of the peculiar disadvantages under which I address you on the bill upon your table. I am extremely depressed with an apprehension of unfavorable impressions, which may have been erroneously made, on the minds of honorable gentlemen from the South, in consequence of remarks which fell from me on another occasion, upon a subject not altogether foreign from this. Sentiments which originated in the purest motives, and, in my opinion, in perfect coincidence with the spirit of our constitution; I may, therefore, be allowed this opportunity peremptorily to disclaim any hostility to the provisions of the constitution respecting slavery; or to any law founded upon the principles and in accordance with such provisions. Sir, I wish it to be distinctly understood, that I have no disposition to deprive slaveholders of that species of property; to aid their slaves in escaping; to detain them when they have escaped; or to impede their exertions in recovering them in a constitutional and legal manner, without endangering the rights, or infringing the privileges of free citizens.

I very readily acknowledge, that there are provisions in the constitution which recognize slavery—which I consider a kind of compact by compromise, into which the States mutually entered when they adopted that instrument, about which I have neither a right nor disposition to complain. I hold it, sir, as sacredly binding as any part of this palladium of our rights, and to prevent its due operation is not the wish of my heart; at the same time, I am far from being the advocate or friend of slavery. If I were to be governed by my own personal feelings, independent of any other control, or were I to be guided by my views of the principles of the common law, I should assuredly say, no slavery. But, sir, in my present situation, I deem it my duty to divest myself of all prepossessions and partialities, and, as a legislator, to be directed by the express provisions of the constitution—the glory of our country, and the admiration of the world.

Previous to my adverting to the provisions and details of this bill, it was my intention to make a few observations upon the law now in force upon this subject; the existence of which, in my view, renders the passing of this altogether unnecessary. But, as my remarks have been anticipated by the honorable gentleman from Rhode Island, (Mr. BURRILL,) I shall very consisely observe, that law provides "that when any person held to labor in any of the States or Territories, under the laws thereof, shall escape into any other State or Territory, the person to whom such labor or service may be due, his agent or attorney, is empowered to seize or arrest such fugitive from labor, and to take him or her before any judge of the circuit or district courts of the United States, residing or being within the State, or before any magistrate of a county, city, or town corporate, wherein such seizure or arrest shall be made; and upon proof, to the satisfaction of such judge or magistrate, either by oral testimony or affidavit, taken before and certified by a magistrate of any such State or Territory, that the person arrested doth, under the laws of the State or Territory from which he or she fled, owe service or labor to the person claiming him or her, it shall be the duty of such judge or magistrate to give a certificate thereof to such claimant, his agent or attorney, which shall be a sufficient warrant for removing the said fugitive from labor to the State or Territory from which he or she fled."

In this section of the law, sir, I conceive every provision is made for the speedy recovery of fugitive slaves, that gentlemen can rationally expect or reasonably desire. They have nothing more to do than seize the fugitive, and apply, by themselves or agent, to a judge or magistrate, and prove, to his satisfaction, by oral testimony or affidavit, that the person so seized has fled, and does owe labor or service to the claimant, and the judge or magistrate shall issue his certificate, which shall be sufficient for removing such fugitive to the place from which he or she absconded. This is a consise, plain, and easy course. But, sir, permit me now to examine the bill under our immediate consideration.

The provisions and details of this bill, in my humble opinion, are very deficient, imperfect, and improper. The first section provides "that when any person held to labor, &c., shall escape, &c., the person to whom such labor may be due, or his agent, may apply to any judge of the district or circuit court, &c., or to any judge, or two justices of a court of record, of the State or Territory from whence such fugitive shall have escaped; and upon proof to the satisfaction of such judge or magistrates that such fugitive is a slave, &c., and does owe labor to the person claiming him, and shall become bound in a recognizance, &c., to perform certain acts, then, and in that case, it shall be the duty of such judge of the district or circuit court, or such judge or magistrates of the State or Territory from whence such fugitive shall have escaped, to award a certificate, stating the place of abode of such claimant, and setting forth the name, age, and sex of such fugitive. This certificate shall be verified by the signature of the judge or justice awarding the same, and by the certificate of the clerk, under the seal of his court, (if there be a seal,) that the person signing the certificate first mentioned is a judge or justice of the description required by this act." The second section provides "that on producing such certificate as aforesaid, to any judge of the circuit or district court, or judge or justice of a court of record in the State or Territory to which such fugitive shall have escaped, it shall be the duty of such judge or magistrate to grant a warrant, authorizing any marshal, sheriff, sergeant, constable, or public bailiff of the State or Territory last aforesaid, to apprehend such fugitive, and bring him before such judge or justice. And if it shall thereupon appear to the satisfaction of such judge or magistrate, by the oath of one or more credible witnesses, who shall, upon their own knowledge, swear to the identity of such fugitive, (the owner or claimant being, for this purpose, deemed a competent witness,) or by the voluntary confession of such fugitive, that the person so apprehended hath escaped from the State wherein the said certificate was granted, and is the same person named in the said certificate, the said judge or justice shall deliver such person to the owner or his agent, with his certificate thereof, or, at the request of such owner or agent, shall issue his warrant, requiring any marshal, sheriff, sergeant, constable, or public bailiff, of such State or Territory, to take charge of such fugitive, and deliver him to the said claimant, &c., on the confines of the State or Territory last aforesaid;" and, by the same process, he shall be conducted to the place from which he absconded.

The most prominent exception which I shall note in the first section, respects the character of the officers to be employed to take cognizance of a crime, and aid in carrying into effect the provisions of this bill. In this case, it is made the duty of two magistrates to take the testimony, that such fugitive, being very imperfectly described, is a slave, to award a certificate of this fact, to be verified and certified as therein directed. Here, sir, you call upon a State officer, under the State government, to perform a judicial act authorized by a law of the United States. Upon the services of this officer you have no claim; to demand them you have no power. This certificate, which is the foundation of a warrant, is granted without oath or affirmation, on a mere representation of the case.

By the second section, on producing this certificate, you make it the imperative duty of a justice of the peace to grant a warrant, authorizing a sheriff or constable (as he may please) to apprehend such fugitive, as therein imperfectly described, and bring him before such justice for examination. In this instance, you give as much validity to this certificate of a justice, granted in a distant State or Territory, as is given to a judgment obtained by a solemn decision of the Supreme Court of any State in the Union in any other State. In obtaining judgments or judicial decisions in civil actions, you require witnesses upon oath; but here, where the liberty and rights of the citizen may be depending, you require none. Judgments out of the State where they are obtained, are considered no more than prima facie evidence of a debt; but in this respect the certificate is made stronger evidence of a fact. Here, contrary to all the ordinary rules in criminal prosecutions, you oblige a justice of the peace to issue his warrant to apprehend a person, without requiring the applicant to give oath or affirmation of the existence of a crime, or of the ground of suspicion. You require him to perform a judicial act, which may seriously and very materially affect the rights of the citizen, whose jurisdiction in civil actions is restricted to thirteen dollars thirty-three cents, and in criminal to six dollars sixty-six cents, by the constitution and laws of the State which gave him judicial existence. These remarks, however, particularly apply to the State of New Hampshire. By the same section, you require and oblige (or subject to a fine) a constable or sheriff to perform an act under a law of the United States, which exposes and puts in jeopardy the freedom of the citizen, the most valuable privilege he can enjoy or possess here on earth.

The constable, under the laws of the State which are to direct his conduct, is not empowered to serve a precept where the sum demanded exceeds thirteen dollars thirty-three cents. He is chosen by a town, without a commission or responsibility, many times little informed, and generally unacquainted with your laws and the duties required under them. If a sheriff is employed, he is a county officer, appointed by the Governor and Council for five years, and knows no other duties than such as are pointed out to him by the laws of the State in which he lives, and particularly relate to his official conduct, within the limits of the county in which he resides.

What is this officer directed to do? To arrest a fugitive upon a warrant, founded upon a certificate illegal in its origin, and imperfect in its structure. The only description given of the fugitive by which the officer is to identify and be governed in making the arrest, is, "name, age, and sex," which, in fact, is no description. There is neither color, size, nor any other marks required to be given, by which the officer can identify the person, or safely make an arrest.

Here, Mr. President, is a simple statement of facts, as they arise in examining this bill. I shall venture to say, the course here directed is improper. Nay, more: the United States cannot constitutionally demand, or employ, the agency of any other power than its own, to discharge duties and perform services, under criminal laws emanating from Congress. The Constitution of the United States expressly says, "The judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising under this constitution, the laws of the United States, and the treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority."

By this process of the constitution, we may distinctly see where the judicial power of the United States is deposited—that the laws of the United States are to be explained and enforced only by officers created by the constituted authorities of the United States. Are State and county judges, and justices of the peace, officers made under the Government of the United States? If they are, they are so made by a law of Congress. Will it be pretended that Congress have authority, by a legislative act, to prescribe the duty, create the office and the officer, ordain and establish the court and the judge? The doctrine is preposterous; it is too absurd to be admitted for a moment; it would be an assumption of power inconsistent in its nature and dangerous in its consequences. A part of this duty is confided to another branch of the Government by the express provision of the constitution and immemorial usage. The Government of the United States is composed of three distinct branches—each of which has duties to perform—the Legislative, Executive, and Judicial. They are designed to be kept as distinct and independent of each other, as the nature of a free Government will admit. It is the province of the Legislature to make laws, not judges. You have lately passed a law dividing the State of Pennsylvania into two districts, by which a new court is created, but you have not created the judges. To do this by law, would have been too manifest a violation of legislative power to be countenanced in this House. These State and county officers are not officers of this Government, and Congress have no claims upon their services as such. It is the duty of the Executive department to appoint officers. For this important feature in the structure of our Government, there are many cogent reasons. The law, and the execution of the law, should always emanate from different sources. This is a fundamental principle in a republican government. And when this principle is abandoned, one of the great barriers to the encroachments of power is annihilated—usurpation is the natural result, and collision must be the unavoidable consequence. It is the business of the judicial power to expound and execute the laws. For these duties the courts are qualified by their previous education and application to the general and particular principles of jurisprudence.

The extent of the several powers and duties of these respective branches of the Government, are distinctly prescribed by the constitution. Each has an orbit in which it may safely revolve, and, while it keeps within its own sphere, no danger will result from its legitimate action; but, when permitted to diverge, collision, confusion, and destruction, are the inevitable consequences. It is not sufficient that an agent, who performs an act for the United States, be an officer of the United States; it must also appear that his authority to perform that act is derived from a legitimate source, otherwise the act is void. For an officer, in the District of Columbia, to apprehend a person, by virtue of a law of Virginia, would be an illegal arrest, and, of course, void. We may reverse the position. It is not competent for an officer, who executes a law of the General Government, to show that there is such a law; but, that he derived his office from the constituted authority of the United States. Apply this to the State or county officer whom you employ. A warrant, an arrest, a commitment, or trial, pre-supposes authority, power, and jurisdiction. The granting of a warrant, pre-supposes authority.

To arrest, pre-supposes power. To commit or try, pre-supposes jurisdiction.

From what source does the county justice receive authority to arrest a person under a law of the United States? Surely not from the State, from the United States. You give him no authority—you cannot. The laws of the General Government do not make him a judicial officer, nor invest him with judicial power. He possesses powers for certain purposes, to be exercised according to the constitution and laws of that independent sovereignty from whom he derived all his authority.

On this view of the subject, sir, I am led to the conclusion that Congress has no constitutional power to authorize an officer, under a State government, to perform a judicial act. As false premises give rise to incorrect conclusions, it may be proper for me distinctly to state and define my view of judicial power and a judicial act. Sound premises render sophistical reasoning unnecessary, and present the force of an argument in a convincing point of view. By judicial power, I understand constitutional and "legal authority and discretion to adjudicate on any matter, which is, in some form or way, the subject of litigation and controversy; and he who exercises such authority and discretion, performs a judicial act." To declare what shall be a rule, or make a law, is an act of legislation; but to apply the law to the case, is a judicial act. Judicial discretion extends only to the application of the rules of law to the facts and circumstances of each case. And this discretionary power of applying the rules of law to the variety of cases which may be presented for adjudication, carries with it other incidental powers, as the right to judge of the competency, pertinency, and credibility of evidence. If these positions are correct, it needs no argument to show, that, under the provisions of this bill, the judge or justice exercises judicial power in every instance in which he is authorized to act. On the application of the owner of a fugitive, or his agent, the judge or justice is to decide, in view of the testimony presented, whether he is a slave, and does owe service or labor to the claimant, according to the laws of the State or Territory from which such fugitive may have escaped. This being decided in the affirmative, the claimant, or his agent, enters into a recognizance, on certain conditions, to perform certain acts. In consequence of which, the judge or justice grants his certificate, setting forth the name, age, and sex, of such fugitive, which certificate shall be verified by the signature of the person who grants it, and shall be certified by a clerk of a court that such officer is a judge or justice of the description required by this act.

This, sir, I consider a judicial act—not because giving a certificate of a fact is a judicial act, but because the certificate has, in its ultimate operation, the very nature of a warrant. The efficacy given to it, by the provisions of this bill, entirely changes it from the original character of a simple certificate, and makes it a sufficient warrant for a specific, judicial act. On presenting this certificate to a judge or justice, in a State or Territory to which the fugitive may have escaped, it is made ample authority for him, nay, you declare it is his "duty to grant a warrant, authorizing a sheriff or constable to apprehend such fugitive and bring him before such magistrate; and if it shall thereupon appear to the satisfaction of such judge or magistrate," by the testimony then produced, "that the person so apprehended has escaped, &c., the said judge or justice shall deliver such person to the owner, or his agent, with his certificate thereof, or at the request of such owner, or agent, shall issue his warrant requiring any sheriff, &c., to take charge and custody of such fugitive, and deliver him," &c. If it shall here appear, on examination, by the testimony offered, that the person named in the certificate, and arrested, is a fugitive, the justice shall deliver him to the claimant, or issue his warrant, and commit him to the custody of an officer. In these instances, I presume, no one will contend that the justice does not perform judicial acts. If it is possible for a magistrate to exercise judicial power, it must be in the performance of the duties above enjoined.

It is not only in granting a warrant, but in determining on the competency of the testimony, and the legality of the duty performed, that this judicial power is exercised; it is the province of a judicial officer to judge of the propriety and exercise the power of issuing a warrant to arrest a person. This, I presume, is a principle universally admitted. "To judge of the grounds of an accusation, on which a warrant to arrest may or may not be issued, is as really a judicial act as the process of trial and condemnation." Neither names of office, forms of evidence, nor degree of criminality, have any essential weight in determining the abstract nature and character of judicial power. This capacity to exercise the judgment, in view of testimony, for the purpose of removing doubts, obviating objections, and deciding on matters which are affirmed on the one part and presumed to be denied on the other, is always accompanied with a confidence of trust, the exercise of which, even in the incipient act of a justice of the peace, in granting a warrant to arrest a person, is an exercise of judicial power.

But, sir, permit me to take another view of the subject. It is not expedient for the United States to call on State and county officers, under State governments, to perform any duty under the criminal laws of Congress. It is much more suitable, correct, and proper, to empower only the officers of the General Government to execute its laws. It may justly be considered a perversion of the Constitution of the United States, and extremely dangerous, to commit power into the hands of those who are no way officially responsible; and, also, very unjust to exact service without compensation; especially, in many instances, where the State constitution and laws peremptorily prohibit the performance of such official acts with the informalities allowed by the provisions of this bill. With the officers of the United States it is otherwise. They derive their appointment and official existence from your Government, to be employed in your service in the execution of your laws; they are compensated by the General Government, responsible to it, removable and punishable by it, and upon their services you have just claims. But this connection and mutual obligation between the Government of the United States and individual State and county officers does not, and cannot, exist. They derive their official existence and power from the Government of the State in which they reside. The constitution and laws of their State define and regulate their power and duties; the extent of their jurisdiction in civil and criminal causes, and the tenure of their offices. They are commissioned to perform services for the State; they are compensated by the State; they are amenable to the State; they are removable and punishable by the State, and by that only.

Fugitive Slaves.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act for delivering up persons held to labor or service in any of the States or Territories, who shall escape into any other State or Territory;" and the bill having been further amended, on motion by Mr. RUGGLES, that the further consideration thereof be postponed until the first Monday in July next, it was determined in the negative—yeas 11, nays 18, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Burrill, Daggett, Horsey, Hunter, King, Morrow, Noble, Roberts, Ruggles, Tichenor, and Van Dyke.

NAYS.—Messrs. Campbell, Crittenden, Dickerson, Eppes, Fromentin, Gaillard, Goldsborough, Johnson, Leake, Macon, Otis, Sanford, Smith, Tait, Talbot, Taylor, Williams of Mississippi, and Williams of Tennessee.

On motion by Mr. DAGGETT to strike out the following section of the bill:

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That whenever the Executive authority of any State in the Union, or of either of the Territories thereof, shall, for or in behalf of any citizen or inhabitant of such State or Territory, demand any fugitive slave of the Executive authority of any State or Territory, to which such slave shall have fled, and shall moreover produce a certificate, issued pursuant to the first section of this act, it shall be the duty of the Executive authority of the State or Territory to which such fugitive shall have fled, to cause him or her to be arrested and secured, and notice of the arrest to be given to the Executive authority making such demand, or to the agent of such authority appointed to receive the fugitive, and to cause such fugitive to be delivered to the said agent, on the confine or boundary of the State or Territory in which said arrest shall be, and in the most usual and direct route to the place from whence the said fugitive shall have escaped; and the reasonable expense of such arrest, detention, and delivery of such fugitive, shall be paid by the said agent.

It was determined in the negative—yeas 13, nays 16, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Burrill, Daggett, Dickerson, Horsey, Hunter, King, Lacock, Morrill, Noble, Roberts, Ruggles, Tichenor, and Van Dyke.

NAYS.—Messrs. Campbell, Crittenden, Eppes, Fromentin, Gaillard, Goldsborough, Leake, Macon, Otis, Smith, Stokes, Tait, Talbot, Taylor, Williams of Mississippi, and Williams of Tennessee.

On motion by Mr. VAN DYKE, to insert in section 2, line 13, after "certificate," "and doth, under the laws of the State or Territory from which he or she fled owe service or labor to the person claiming him or her;" it was determined in the negative—yeas 11, nays 18, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Burrill, Daggett, Horsey, Hunter, Lacock, Morrill, Noble, Roberts, Ruggles, Storer, and Van Dyke.

NAYS.—Messrs. Campbell, Crittenden, Eppes, Fromentin, Gaillard, Goldsborough, Johnson, King, Leake, Macon, Otis, Sanford, Smith, Stokes, Tait, Talbot, Williams of Mississippi, and Williams of Tennessee.

The bill having been further amended, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House accordingly; and the amendments having been concurred in, on motion by Mr. LACOCK, to add the following section to the bill:

"SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That this law shall be and remain in force for the term of four years, and no longer."

The Senate being equally divided, the PRESIDENT determined the question in the affirmative; and, on the question, "Shall the amendments be engrossed and the bill be read a third time, as amended?" it was determined in the affirmative.

THURSDAY, March 12.

Fugitive Slaves.

The amendments to the bill, entitled "An act to provide for delivering up persons held to labor or service in any of the States or Territories, who shall escape into any other State or Territory," having been reported by the committee correctly engrossed, the bill was read a third time as amended; and, on the question, "Shall this bill pass as amended?" it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 17, nays 13, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Campbell, Crittenden, Eppes, Fromentin, Gaillard, Goldsborough, Johnson, Macon, Otis, Sanford, Smith, Stokes, Tait, Talbot, Taylor, Williams of Mississippi, and Williams of Tennessee.

NAYS.—Messrs. Burrill, Daggett, Dickerson, Horsey, Hunter, King, Lacock, Morrow, Noble, Roberts, Ruggles, Tichenor, and Van Dyke.

So it was Resolved, That this bill pass with amendments.

Case of R. W. Meade.

Mr. BARBOUR, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the petition of sundry citizens of Philadelphia, asking the interposition of Congress in behalf of Richard W. Meade, an American citizen, unjustly and wantonly confined in a dungeon in Spain, by the authority of that Government, made a report; which was read, as follows:

The Committee of the Senate on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the petition of sundry citizens of Philadelphia, asking the interposition of Congress in behalf of Richard W. Meade, an American citizen, unjustly and wantonly confined in a dungeon in Spain, by the authority of that Government, have given to the subject the deliberation its importance deserved, and beg leave to submit the following report: It appears from the documents, R. W. Meade is an American citizen, who went to Spain in the year 1803 on lawful business; that in the year 1806, such was the confidence of the Government in his integrity, that he was appointed Navy Agent for the United States at the port of Cadiz; a station which he held until the time of his confinement. Such was the correctness of his deportment, as to have been appointed by the tribunal of commerce at Cadiz, with the consent of all the parties concerned, assignee of a bankrupt, the amount of whose estate involved a high responsibility. He performed the duties thus devolved upon him, honestly; and, having collected for distribution fifty thousand dollars, he several times petitioned the tribunal to permit him to remit this sum to the creditors of the bankrupt resident in England; the only proper course left him to pursue, inasmuch as he had, when appointed agent of the bankrupt, given his bond to that tribunal conditioned to take charge of the effects of the bankrupt, and to be responsible solely to the tribunal for the proceeds, being prohibited under the penalty of the bonds from disposing of the funds without the sanction of the tribunal. A controversy having arisen between the creditors and bankrupt about the distribution, Meade offered the money to either, if they would give bond, with sureties, to the satisfaction of the tribunal of commerce, by which his own might be cancelled. This they were unable to do. The tribunal, of its own accord, and unexpectedly, decided that Meade should, on the following morning, place the money in the King's treasury, until the parties litigant should give the security required; it being declared that all Meade's property should be sequestered in the case of non-payment at the time limited. The money was forthwith paid by Meade into the treasury, in treasury notes equal to specie, and hence acknowledged by the Treasurer, that the deposit had been made in due form, under his inspection, in effective specie, and that whenever the tribunal should order its payment, His Majesty would pay it in the same coin.

Notwithstanding this judgment, and the discharge thereof, by the payment aforesaid, Mr. Dermot, the agent for the British creditors, brought suit against Meade in the same court to recover the very sum he had heretofore paid in conformity to its own judgment. The court awarded judgment against Meade a second time for this money. The latter appealed to the superior tribunal, called Abradas. During its pendency, it is charged by Meade, that the cause was removed, by the interposition of the British Minister, to the council of war, and, by the same interposition, his arrest and confinement were procured, from which he could be relieved only by a repayment of the money. He has languished in confinement from the 2d of May, 1816, down to the last accounts from Spain.

The Representative of this nation at that Court has repeatedly appealed to His Catholic Majesty for the relief of Meade; and the appeal has been in vain—the Court of Spain having refused either to restore the money deposited in its own treasury, by order of its own competent judicial authority, or to release the person of Meade from the long confinement to which he has been doomed; and, finally, the President of the United States, whose peculiar province is to take cognizance of subjects of this kind, has caused a representation of the subject to be made to the Minister of Spain to the United States, demanding his immediate liberation. Nothing but a confidence that this representation will produce the desired result, would have restrained your committee from recommending the adoption of measures of severe retribution.

Your committee are of opinion, that it is due to the dignity of the United States to adopt, as a fundamental rule of its policy, the principle, that one of its citizens, to whatever region of the earth his lawful business may carry him, and who demeans himself as becomes his character, is entitled to the protection of his Government, and whatever intentional injury may be done him should be retaliated by the employment, if necessary, of the whole force of the nation.

Medals to Harrison and Shelby.

Mr. DICKERSON, agreeably to notice given yesterday, asked leave to introduce a resolution offering the thanks of Congress to Major General William Henry Harrison and Isaac Shelby, late Governor of Kentucky, for their distinguished bravery and good conduct in capturing the British army under command of Major General Proctor, at the battle of the Thames in Upper Canada, on the 5th of October, 1813.

Mr. D. then offered the following resolution:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the thanks of Congress be, and they are hereby, presented to Major General William Henry Harrison, and Isaac Shelby, late Governor of Kentucky, and through them to the officers and men under their command, for their gallantry and good conduct in defeating the combined British and Indian forces under Major General Proctor, on the Thames, in Upper Canada, on the 5th day of October, one thousand eight hundred and thirteen, capturing the British army, with their baggage, camp equipage, and artillery; and that the President of the United States be requested to cause two gold medals to be struck, emblematical of this triumph, and presented to General Harrison and Isaac Shelby, late Governor of Kentucky.

The resolution was read and passed to a second reading.

WEDNESDAY, March 25.

Seminole Indians.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate of the United States:

I now lay before Congress all the information in the possession of the Executive, respecting the war with the Seminoles, and the measures which it has been thought proper to adopt, for the safety of our fellow-citizens on the frontier exposed to their ravages. The enclosed documents show that the hostilities of this tribe were unprovoked, the offspring of a spirit long cherished, and often manifested towards the United States, and that, in the present instance, it was extending itself to other tribes, and daily assuming a more serious aspect. As soon as the nature and object of this combination were perceived, the Major General commanding the Southern division of the troops of the United States, was ordered to the theatre of action, charged with the management of the war, and vested with the powers necessary to give it effect. The season of the year being unfavorable to active operations, and the recesses of the country affording shelter to these savages, in case of retreat, may prevent a prompt termination of the war, but it may be fairly presumed that it will not be long before this tribe, and its associates, receive the punishment which they have provoked and justly merited.

As almost the whole of this tribe inhabits the country within the limits of Florida, Spain was bound, by the Treaty of 1795, to restrain them from committing hostilities against the United States. We have seen, with regret, that her Government has altogether failed to fulfil this obligation, nor are we aware that it made any effort to that effect. When we consider her utter inability to check, even in the slightest degree, the movements of this tribe, by her very small and incompetent force in Florida, we are not disposed to ascribe the failure to any other cause. The inability, however, of Spain, to maintain her authority over the territory, and Indians within her limits, and in consequence to fulfil the treaty, ought not to expose the United States to other and greater injuries. When the authority of Spain ceases to exist there, the United States have a right to pursue their enemy, on a principle of self-defence. In this instance, the right is more complete and obvious, because we shall perform only what Spain was bound to have performed herself. To the high obligations and privileges of this great and sacred right of self-defence will the movement of our troops be strictly confined. Orders have been given to the General in command not to enter Florida, unless it be in pursuit of the enemy, and in that case, to respect the Spanish authority, wherever it is maintained, and he will be instructed to withdraw his forces from the province, as soon as he shall have reduced that tribe to order, and secure our fellow-citizens, in that quarter, by satisfactory arrangements, against its unprovoked and savage hostilities in future.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, March 25, 1818.

The Message and accompanying documents were read, and two hundred additional copies thereof ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

TUESDAY, March 31.

Honors to Colonel R. M. Johnson.

Agreeably to notice given, Mr. BARBOUR asked and obtained leave to bring in a resolution requesting the President of the United States to present to Colonel Richard M. Johnson a sword, as a testimony of the high sense entertained by Congress of the daring and distinguished valor displayed by himself and the regiment of volunteers under his command, in charging the enemy on the Thames, in Upper Canada, on the 5th October, 1813; and the resolution was read twice by unanimous consent, and considered as in Committee of the Whole, and having been amended, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House accordingly; and the amendments being concurred in, the resolution was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time.

On introducing the proposition for causing a sword to be presented to Colonel R. M. Johnson—

Mr. BARBOUR said, in availing himself of the notice given on yesterday, of asking leave to introduce a resolution, whose object would be to present to Colonel Richard M. Johnson some testimonial of the high sense entertained by the nation of the distinguished services rendered by him on the 5th October, 1813, in the battle of the Thames, he considered himself bound to make a few remarks, disclosing the propriety of granting the leave asked.

As to the distinguished merit of Colonel Johnson, he presumed there could be no difference of opinion; the only objection that could possibly present itself would be, the time when the resolution was presented, or possibly the grade which Colonel Johnson held in the army. To remove these, if they exist, was all that devolved on him. As to the objection of time, it will at once be removed by reflecting on that which has just occurred—the vote of thanks which has been awarded in favor of General Harrison and Governor Shelby. It is not unknown that rumor, the result of envy, or some other bad passion, had attempted to throw a shade around the character of that distinguished commander. He felt as he ought, and sought an investigation, to vindicate his character from the foul aspersions which had been cast upon it. It, after some delay, took place, and resulted in an honorable acquittal. In the mean time the venerable Shelby was, at his own request, withheld from the notice of the nation, as it regarded the distinguished services he had rendered—Shelby, a name which can never be mentioned without awakening in every American bosom emotions of gratitude. I see in this illustrious character a display of that love of country and chivalrous spirit which conceived and effected our independence, and, unabated by age, it reappeared to vindicate those rights, to the establishment of which, in his more youthful days, he had so essentially contributed; but he is as generous as he is brave, and he refused to accept a tribute of respect, whose indirect consequence might have been a reflection on the Commander-in-chief, to whose zeal, patriotism, and capacity in conducting this campaign, he always bore a cheerful testimony.

Colonel Johnson, influenced by the same sensibility, peremptorily refused to his friends the permission of bringing this subject before the Representatives of the people. I, however, will barely remark, in regard to the commanding general, that, with the regrets which the delay of justice to this citizen must necessarily create, will be mingled some consolation in the reflection, that his character has been entirely purified from the censure which had been improperly cast upon it; and that the meed now dispensed has the sanction of the deliberate judgment of the nation, unbiassed by passion or the false fire of the moment. He will now receive it with a grateful feeling, as the highest reward which freemen can give or a freeman receive.

With regard to Colonel Johnson, it is due to him to say, this proposition is now made without his consent. Mr. B., however, who took a pride in calling him his friend, took the responsibility upon himself, because he thought it would be an act of consummate injustice, were no lasting memorial to be erected to the valor which he so signally displayed on the occasion alluded to. Another motive with Mr. B. was, a notification on the part of Colonel Johnson, of his retiring from public life. While he regretted this event as a serious loss to the public councils, he was perfectly satisfied that his reasons were sufficient to justify it. While upon this subject he would barely add, that he was satisfied it would not be deemed an exaggeration when he asserted that no man in Congress had performed more service than Colonel Johnson. In addition to the just claims of his own particular constituents upon him, what part of the Union is it from which applications have not been made and cheerfully attended to by this patriotic citizen? So much for the first objection that might possibly be made, although he did not anticipate it. As to the second difficulty, that might exist in the opinion of some gentlemen, the grade of Colonel Johnson—if there were no precedent applicable to this case, Mr. B. would have had no difficulty in fixing one. It is the attribute of all governments to adapt their proceedings to the endless vicissitudes which human affairs continually present. The valor displayed by Colonel Johnson is unsurpassed by any example in the annals of mankind. But it is not now necessary to press this question, because you have a precedent in the case of McDonough and his associates, in the distinguished victory gained by them on Lake Champlain, over a British squadron, and some others. Mr. B. said he should but ill represent the feelings of his friend, or his own, if, in asking for this tribute of respect, any thing could be inferred from what is said or done, unfavorable to those patriotic officers holding grades between Colonel Johnson and the Commander-in-chief. It was but justice to them to say, that had it been their good fortune on the day of battle to have had the post of honor, they would have acquired those laurels so dearly earned by Colonel Johnson. Generous as brave, so far from looking with an eye of envy upon this honorable tribute of gratitude, dispensed in behalf of this distinguished citizen, they will warmly participate in the fine feelings with which Colonel Johnson will receive this mark of his country's distinction.

As to the merit of Colonel Johnson to this evidence of our gratitude, Mr. B. said, he had already declared that upon this point there could be no difference of opinion. To expatiate upon it would be unnecessary; yet he could not dismiss this subject without briefly enumerating some of the leading acts of his public life, so far at least as they connect themselves with the question under consideration.

Let it then be remembered that he was zealously in favor of the war. Not content with the distinguished place he held in the councils of the nation, he patriotically resolved to vindicate with his own arm those rights which he had so manfully asserted while voting for the declaration of war. He erects his standard and proclaims his purpose, and although much was to have been expected from the patriotism, the zeal, the enterprise, and courage of Kentucky—a people Mr. B. delighted to honor, as, in addition to their merit, he considered them his own kindred, thousands of his near and highly respected relations being there—although, he said, much was to have been expected, yet, when we reflect upon the devotedness of those old and young, rich and poor, rallying around the standard of their country, we see a new subject of admiration.

In doing justice to those patriots, let it not be understood that any invidious distinction is intended to be made in their favor. Mr. B. said he well knew that illustrious examples of courage and patriotism were exhibited in other portions of the Union, and on all proper occasions he was prepared to lift his feeble voice to do them ample justice. But, to return to the patriotic volunteers, who embodied at the call of Colonel Johnson, displaying a spectacle as honorable to themselves as to Colonel Johnson—manifesting the high confidence they reposed in this their illustrious citizen—these brave men, leaving their homes and their domestic blessings, and, weighing the honor of their country and the defence of her rights against the privations and hazards of war, willingly accepted them as an equivalent. Undeterred by the difficulties or dangers to which they are about to be exposed, they fearlessly commit themselves to the trackless desert, to the secret danger of the ambuscaded savage, or the more open perils of their less savage ally. A night of misfortune had shed its disastrous gloom over our affairs. It was given to Commodore Perry to turn back the tide of adversity upon the fountain from which it flowed. Lake Erie was reserved for the display of the brilliant superiority of American bravery and seamanship over our then haughty foe—achieving a victory, which, in the language of President Madison, will fill an early page in our naval annals, as having never been surpassed in lustre, however much it may have been in magnitude. The way having been opened, the commanding general and his veteran associate, with promptitude, availed themselves of the opportunity thus offered, to throw themselves in the enemy's country, and pursuing, with unanimity and an unexampled rapidity, (of which pursuit Colonel Johnson led the van,) speedily overtook them. The battle is arrayed; the post of honor, for such he made it, is assigned Colonel Johnson. The enemy have the Thames on the left; a British regiment, seven hundred strong, has also a ravine on the right, beyond which was the celebrated Tecumseh, at the head of fifteen hundred savages—a force truly formidable. When we refer to the commander, of whom it may be said, unless his character has been greatly exaggerated, that, had he have been favored with the embellishments of civilized life, and the benefits of military experience, he would have been one of the most distinguished captains of the present eventful period; to which, when we superadd that his associates were acting under the impression of their being under the particular favor of Heaven, it well may be said that the force thus to be encountered was indeed formidable. This force, so placed, and so formidable to ordinary minds, presented nothing alarming to the mounted regiment. Colonel Johnson divides his regiment, say one thousand strong—one battalion placed under the command of Colonel James Johnson, who gave, in accepting his station under a younger brother, an honorable evidence of his patriotism; the other battalion, headed by himself, passed a defile, and placed itself on the right of the marsh. The bugle was to announce the readiness for attack. The sound is heard, and, mingled with the watchword, victory or death, floated along the line. The British force was overwhelmed in an instant; they threw down their arms, and on their knees supplicated mercy. Although there was a long account of unatoned-for blood, impiously shed by this united British and Indian force, and retaliation justified even to their entire extermination, yet, at the cry of mercy, the sword was immediately sheathed, and the guilty survived. Far different was the conflict with the savage foe; there man was opposed to man, in single combat, rifle to rifle, and tomahawk to tomahawk; wounds and death were mutually dealt out. Colonel Johnson, early in the combat, received two severe wounds, attended with the loss of much blood. In this trying crisis an ordinary courage would have retired from the combat; on him it had a different effect. It seemed to impart to him new courage, which manifested itself in a prodigy of valor, which loses nothing in a comparison with the most splendid achievement recorded in the whole extent of "backward time." Calling around him twenty spirits, the bravest among the brave, he resolved, at their head, to precipitate himself on the fiercest part of the conflict, where Tecumseh in person commanded, and who was the soul of the battle. Of these daring spirits, composing the forlorn hope, one only escaped. The others were all cut down, some to rise no more; the remainder mangled by numerous wounds, of which the subject of the present resolution had his melancholy share. Bleeding, exhausted by effusion of blood, and alone, his fate seemed inevitable, when Tecumseh, cool, and collected, approached with his unerring rifle and ruthless tomahawk. It pleased Providence to interpose. Amidst universal carnage, and in the teeth of approaching death, Colonel Johnson remained undismayed, and hurled at Tecumseh that death which had been prepared for him. This is the man and the services to which Mr. B. wished an honorable testimony to be erected, one more lasting than that which is found in evanescent papers of the day. If any thing was necessary to be added in support of the high claims of this distinguished citizen upon the gratitude of his country, it would be found in the honorable notice taken of him by the commanding general, and repeated, in the most flattering manner, by President Madison, in communicating the result of the battle to Congress. But it is more than unnecessary to furnish any additional proofs. Wherever there is an American, the courage and services of Colonel Johnson are known and applauded. Mr. B. indulged a hope, bordering on confidence, that the measure he now proposed would receive the unanimous consent of the Senate, for in that unanimity its principal merit would consist.

FRIDAY, April 3.

British West India Trade—Navigation Bill.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill concerning navigation, reported by the Committee of Foreign Relations on Wednesday.

[The 1st section provides, that from and after the 30th of September next, the ports of the United States shall be and remain closed against every vessel owned wholly or in part by a subject or subjects of His Britannic Majesty, coming or arriving from any part or place in a colony or territory of His Britannic Majesty, that is or shall be, by the ordinary laws of navigation and trade, closed against vessels owned by citizens of the United States; and every such vessel, so excluded from the ports of the United States, that shall enter, or attempt to enter the same, in violation of this act, shall, with her tackle, apparel, and furniture, together with the cargo on board such vessel, be forfeited to the United States.

The 2d section provides, substantially, that any British vessel entering our ports, shall, on her departure, if laden with the productions of the United States, give bonds not to land her cargo at any of the British ports prohibited in the first section, and to forfeit vessel, tackle, &c., if she attempts to sail without so giving bond.

The 3d section enacts the manner of recovering the penalties, accounting for them, &c.]

Mr. BARBOUR, of Virginia, said, as the organ of the committee who reported the bill, it was expected of him by the Senate that he should disclose the views of the committee on this interesting subject.

It certainly behooved the Senate to give this subject its most serious attention, and to act only upon the most mature deliberation; for remember, when once adopted, it must be adhered to. To recede, would be to insure an endless duration to the serious evils of which we complain, and, what is still of more consequence, it must be attended with a diminution of character. Any policy, adopted by the unanimous consent of the nation, founded in justice and wisdom, and sustained by perseverance, must finally be felt and yielded to by any and every nation on which it operates. The object of the bill under consideration, is to relieve from the effects of measures adopted by Great Britain in relation to our commercial intercourse with her North American colonies and West Indies; measures exclusively against us, as injurious to our navigating interest as they are offensive to our dignity. The invidious policy of which we complain, and which is attended with such unpleasant effects, may be summed up in a few words. She has shut her ports in the possessions formerly alluded to, against American vessels and American property. Not a cock-boat, not an atom of any thing that is American, does she permit to enter, while she modestly insists to bring every thing that she pleases from these possessions to the United States, and to purchase, and exclusively to carry the produce and manufactures of the United States in return; that is, she insists upon, and we have been tame enough to submit to it, to enjoy exclusively the whole of this valuable intercourse.

The evil has been of long standing; it commenced upon our becoming an independent people. She was not generous enough to forget that we had been enemies, nor wise enough to profit by a liberal policy. She would have found in the same language, the same habits, the same feelings; and in the kind affections inseparably attending two people of a common origin, except when repressed by injustice or oppression; she would have found in these circumstances sure guarantees to an uninterrupted, friendly, and, to her, highly beneficial intercourse. But other counsels prevailed, and displayed a new proof of the mortifying truth, that small, indeed, is the portion of wisdom that directs the government of human affairs. Hence, the moment she acknowledged our independence, she immediately denounced against the United States all the rigor of her colonial system—departing from it only in such parts as would promote her interest, and render it more injurious and humiliating to us. She superciliously rejected all offers at negotiation. The United States, without a common head, and pursuing among themselves an insulated, and frequently a selfish and an unwise policy, became the footballs of Great Britain, who, watching, as she always does, with a sleepless eye, whatever is to affect her commerce, seized instantly upon her defenceless prey, and pushed her exclusive system to the uttermost of endurance. In this spirit, instead of being content with enforcing towards us the real colonial system, which was, that the trade should be exclusive through and with the mother country, she permitted the produce of her dependencies to be brought directly to this country, and the produce of this country to be carried back directly to them, but both operations to be effected exclusively by British shipping, to the consequent exclusion of the American shipping from the transportation of the produce even of America. So injurious were the effects resulting from our commercial intercourse, and so entirely unable were the United States to counteract these effects in their then disjointed condition, that our sanguine anticipations from the successful result of our Revolution, began fast to dissipate, and no little solicitude to be experienced in regard to the future. This state of things produced a convention of the States, and finally resulted in our present happy constitution. I am authorized to say, from the best authority, that it is to this cause chiefly, if not entirely, that we are indebted for this greatest blessing of Heaven. In looking through the history of mankind, and tracing the causes which contribute to the rise and downfall of nations, it frequently becomes a subject of curious speculation, when we see the most propitious results flowing from apparently injurious causes, and the worst passions of mankind converted into the means of furthering some beneficent purpose of Providence. Little did the statesman of Britain think, when indulging his thirst for cupidity or revenge, that he was to become the involuntary benefactor of America, by essentially contributing to the order of things which now exists, and which, under Providence, will insure us an endless succession of power, of prosperity, and of happiness.

The new Governemnt being organized, it turned its attention to the particular subject intrusted to its care. Unfortunately, however, other objects, both foreign and domestic, interposed before its deliberations ripened into action. Europe was agitated by a convulsion the most important in the annals of the world, whether we regard its duration, its extent, or its effects. During this troubled state of the world, the policy now under consideration, engaged the attention of Congress. The result of the effort at that time is known to the Senate —the causes leading thereto lie out of the proper sphere of the present discussion. Mr. Jay was sent to England—he negotiated a treaty—so much of it as relates to the trade in question, eventuated in nothing; but such was the condition of the nations of Europe, that we enjoy ed, from the necessities of England, what we had a right to expect from her justice. America became the carrier of the world, and her commerce, her shipping, and her wealth, increased in the most astonishing ratio, till at length America, in her turn, felt the effects of war, and its frequent privations. Peace was no sooner established, than Great Britain resorted to her colonial system, with all its abuse. The more intolerable, as it is exclusively directed against us, inasmuch as she indulges to the vessels of other nations an intercourse withheld from us; a course aggravated by the consideration that she stands alone in this policy, American vessels being admitted into French, Spanish, Dutch, and Swedish colonies. This course, so injurious to our interest, and so offensive to a just pride, claimed the immediate attention of the Government, and efforts were made to obtain redress by a treaty; the result is known. Mr. B. begged leave to read so much of President Madison's Message at the last session of Congress, as regards this subject. Here you perceive the door of negotiation is closed; all hope of redress in that way is desperate, and he calls upon Congress to interpose. Independently of the respect due to the recommendation of a President of the United States, there were other considerations which would give a weight to this opinion of Mr. Madison. When it is recollected, that he devoted the whole of his most useful life to his country, with motives always pure, and with a judgment but little liable to err, guided as it was by a superior genius; when such a man, from the commencement of the Government, down to the moment of his quitting public life, with the benefit of thirty years' observation and experience, invariably entertains the same opinion, and, in his last solemn appeal to the nation, strongly inculcates the propriety of the measure now under consideration, Mr. B. was justifiable in saying a recommendation thus sustained would receive from the Senate a degree of consideration far beyond that arising from mere official respect. In addition to this, we have been advised by President Monroe of his fruitless attempts to procure redress by negotiation, and he also submits to Congress the propriety of interposing by regulations, whose effects will produce that which he has in vain sought to obtain by negotiation.

Mr. KING addressed the Chair as follows: Agriculture, manufactures, and foreign commerce, are the true sources of wealth and power of nations; agriculture is the chief and well-rewarded occupation of our people, and yields, in addition to what we want for our use, a great surplus for exportation. Manufactures are making a sure and steady progress; and, with the abundance of food and of raw materials, which the country affords, will, at no distant day, be sufficient, in the principal branches, for our own consumption, and furnish a valuable addition to our exports.

But, without shipping and seamen, the surpluses of agriculture and of manufactures would depreciate on our hands; the cotton, tobacco, breadstuffs, provisions, and manufactures, would turn out to be of little worth, unless we have ships and mariners to carry them abroad, and to distribute them in the foreign markets.

Nations have adopted different theories, as respects the assistance to be derived from navigation; some have been content with a passive foreign commerce—owning no ships themselves, but depending on foreigners and foreign vessels to bring to them their supplies, and to purchase of them their surpluses; while others, and almost every modern nation that borders upon the ocean, have preferred an active foreign trade, carried on, as far as consistent with the reciprocal rights of others, by national ships and seamen.

A dependence upon foreign navigation subjects those who are so dependent, to the known disadvantages arising from foreign wars, and to the expense and risk of the navigation of belligerent nations—the policy of employing a national shipping is, therefore, almost universally approved and adopted: it affords not only a more certain means of prosecuting foreign commerce, but the freight, as well as the profits of trade, are added to the stock of the nation.

The value and importance of national shipping and national seamen, have created among the great maritime powers, and particularly in England, a strong desire to acquire, by restrictions and exclusions, a disproportionate share of the general commerce of the world.

As all nations have equal rights, and each may claim equal advantages in its intercourse with others, the true theory of international commerce is one of equality, and of reciprocal benefits; this theory gives to enterprise, to skill, and to capital, their just and natural advantages; any other scheme is merely artificial; and so far as it aims at advantages over those who adhere to the open system, it aims at profit at the expense of natural justice.

The colonial system being founded in this vicious theory, has, therefore, proved to be the fruitful source of dissatisfaction, insecurity, and war. According to this system, the colonies were depressed below the rank of their fellow subjects, and the fruits of their industry and their intercourse with foreign countries, placed under different regulations from those of the inhabitants of the mother country; it was the denial to Americans of the rights enjoyed by Englishmen, that produced the American Revolution—and the same cause, greatly aggravated, is working the same effect in South America.

Among the navigators and discoverers of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, the Dutch became highly distinguished, and, by enterprise, economy, and perseverance, made themselves the carriers of other nations, and their country the entrepot of Europe—and it was not until the middle of the fourteenth century, that England passed her navigation act, which had for its object to curtail the navigation of the Dutch and to extend her own.

According to this act, the whole trade and intercourse between England, Asia, Africa, and America, were confined to the shipping and mariners of England; and the intercourse between England and the rest of Europe was placed under regulations which, in a great measure, confined the same to English ships and seamen.

This act was strenuously opposed by the Dutch, and proved the occasion of the obstinate naval wars that afterwards followed. England was victorious, persisted in her navigation act, and, in the end, broke down the monopoly in trade which the Dutch possessed.

That in vindication of her equal right to navigate the ocean, England should have resisted the monopoly of the Dutch, and freely expended her blood and treasure to obtain her just share of the general commerce, deserved the approbation of all impartial men. But, having accomplished this object, that she should herself aim at, and in the end establish, the same exclusive system, and on a more extended scale, is neither consistent with her own laudable principles, nor compatible with the rights of others; who, relatively to her monopoly now, are in the like situation towards England in which England was towards the Dutch, when she asserted and made good her rights against them.

By the English act of navigation, the trade of the colonies is restrained to the dominions of the mother country, and none but English ships are allowed to engage in it.

So long as colonies are within such limits as leave to other nations a convenient resort to foreign markets for the exchange of the goods which they have to sell, for those they want to buy, so long this system is tolerable; but if the power of a State enables it to increase the number of its colonies and dependent territories, so that it becomes the mistress of the great military and commercial stations throughout the globe, this extension of dominion, and the consequent monopoly of commerce, seem to be incompatible with, and necessarily to abridge the equal rights of other States.

In the late debates in the English Parliament, the Minister, in the House of Lords, stated "that instead of seventeen thousand men, employed abroad in 1791, forty-one thousand were then (1816) required, exclusive of those that were serving in France and in India. That England now has forty-three principal colonies, in all of which troops are necessary; that sixteen of these principal colonies were acquired since 1791, and six of them had grown into that rank from mere colonial dependencies." And, in the House of Commons, the Minister, alluding to the acquisitions made during the war with France, said "that England had acquired what, in former days, would have been thought romance—she had acquired the keys of every great military station."

Thus, the commercial aggrandizement of England has become such, as the men who protested against monopoly, and devised the navigation act to break it down, could never have anticipated; and it may, ere long, concern other nations to inquire whether laws and principles, applicable to the narrow limits of English dominion and commerce, at the date of the navigation act, when colonies and commerce, and even navigation itself, were comparatively in their infancy; laws and principles aimed against monopoly, and adopted to secure to England her just share in the general commerce and navigation of the world, ought to be used by England to perpetuate in her own hands a system equally as exclusive, and far more comprehensive, than that which she was the chief agent to abolish.

Our commercial system is an open one—our ports and our commerce are free to all—we neither possess, nor desire to possess, colonies; nor do we object that others should possess them, unless thereby the general commerce of the world be so abridged, that we are restrained in our intercourse with foreign countries wanting our supplies, and furnishing in return those which we stand in need of.

But, it is not to the colonial system, but to a new principle, which in modern times has been incorporated with those of the navigation act, that we now object. According to this act, no direct trade or intercourse can be carried on between a colony and a foreign country; but by the free port bill, passed in the present reign, the English contraband trade, which had been long pursued, in violation of Spanish laws, between English and Spanish colonies, was sanctioned and regulated by an English act of Parliament; and, since the independence of the United States, England has passed laws, opening an intercourse and trade between her West India colonies and the United States, and, excluding the shipping of the United States, has confined the same to English ships and seamen; departing by this law not only from the principles of the navigation act, which she was at liberty to do, by opening a direct intercourse between the colonies and a foreign country, but controlling, which she had no authority to do, the reciprocal rights of the United States to employ their own vessels to carry it on.*

Colonies being parts of the nation, are subject to its regulations; but, when an intercourse and trade are opened between colonies and a foreign country, the foreign country becomes a party, and has a reciprocal claim to employ its own vessels equally in the intercourse and trade with such colonies, as with any other part of the nation to which they belong.

Governments owe it to the trust confided to them, carefully to watch over, and by all suitable means to promote, the general welfare; and while, on account of a small or doubtful incon-

* England alone excludes our vessels and seamen from the trade opened between her West India colonies and the United States. In the same trade between the United States and the colonies of France, Spain, Holland, Denmark and Sweden, our vessels and seamen are alike employed, as those of the parent countries, respectively.

venience, they will not disturb a beneficial intercourse between their people and a foreign country, they ought not to omit the interposition of their corrective authority, whenever an important public interest is invaded, or the national reputation affected. "It is good not to try experiments in states, unless the necessity be urgent, or the utility evident; and well to beware, that it be the reformation that draweth on the change, and not the desire of change that pretendeth the reformation."

In this case, the importance of the reformation is seen and acknowledged by every one, and the delay that has occurred in the making of it may call for explanation.

We are unable to state with accuracy the tonnage and seamen employed before the Revolution, in the trade between the territories of the United States and the other English colonies, but it is known to have been a principal branch of the American navigation.

The colonies that England has since acquired from France, Spain, and Holland, together with the increased population of the old colonies, require more ships and seamen to be employed in the trade now than were engaged in it before the independence of the United States.

Without reference to the tonnage and trade between the United States and the English West India colonies, during the late wars between England and France, which, by reason of the suspension of the English navigation act, and the neutrality of the United States, will afford no standard by which the tonnage and trade of peace can be ascertained, the present custom-house returns are the best documents that we can consult upon this subject. According to a late report from the Department of the Treasury, the tonnage employed in this trade during the year 1816, which may be taken as an average, amounted to one hundred and two thousand tons, requiring between five and six thousand seamen. There may be some error in this return, though we are not able to detect it; the magnitude and importance of the shipping and seamen engaged in this trade, will be more readily understood by comparison than otherwise. The tonnage thus employed exceeds the whole tonnage employed by the English East India Company in its trade with Asia; is nearly a moiety of the American and English tonnage employed between the United States and England, and her possessions in Europe; is equal to the American tonnage employed between the United States and England, and is almost an eighth part of the whole registered tonnage of the United States.

To the loss of profits, which would accrue from an equal participation in this trade, may be added the loss of an equal share of the freights made by the vessels engaged in it; the amount whereof must be equal to two millions of dollars, annually. Other advantages are enjoyed by England, by the possession of the exclusive navigation between the United States and her colonies, and between them and England. Freights are made by English vessels between England and the United States, between them and the English colonies, as well as between those colonies and England. English voyages are thus made on the three sides of the triangle, while those of the United States are confined to one side of it, that between the United States and England.

The documents that have been communicated to the Senate, by the Chairman of the Committee of Foreign Relations, (Mr. BARBOUR,) satisfactorily prove that we are independent of the English colonies for a supply of sugar and coffee for our own consumption; our annual re-exportation of these articles exceeding the quantity of them annually imported from the English colonies; and, in respect to rum, the other article imported from these colonies, its exclusion will be the loss to England of its best and almost only market; and its place will be readily supplied by other foreign rum and by brandy; or, which is more probable, by domestic spirits distilled from grain.

The exports from the United States to the English West India colonies have been estimated at four millions of dollars annually; the problem has been disputed ever since the independence of the United States, and still remains to be solved, whether these colonies could obtain from any other quarter the supplies received from the United States. To make this experiment effectually, further restrictions and regulations may become necessary, which it is not now deemed expedient to propose. If the question be decided in the negative, the supplies will be continued from the United States, and our shipping will be benefited.

If the articles heretofore supplied from this country can be obtained elsewhere, we must find out other markets for our exports, or the labor employed in preparing them must be applied to some other branch of industry. We have the power, and hereafter it may become our policy, as it is that of other countries, to resort to a regulation, the effect of which would go far to balance any disadvantage arising from the loss of the English colonial markets. We import annually upwards of six millions of gallons of West India rum, more than half of which comes from the English colonies; we also import, every year, nearly seven millions of gallons of molasses: as every gallon of molasses yields, by distillation, a gallon of rum; the rum imported, added to that distilled from imported molasses, is probably equal to twelve millions of gallons, which enormous quantity is chiefly consumed by citizens of the United States.

But why has a measure of this importance been so long deferred? The explanation which this question requires cannot be made without some reference to the history of our communications with England since the peace of 1783, as well as to the views and policy of men and parties that have in succession influenced our public affairs.

As, according to the powers of England, notwithstanding the acknowledgment of our independence, neither trade nor intercourse could be carried on between the United States and her dominions, it became necessary after the treaty of peace to pass some act whereby this trade and intercourse might be prosecuted, a bill for this purpose was introduced into the House of Commons by the Administration which concluded the treaty of peace with the United States. The general scope and provisions of the bill correspond with the liberal principles which were manifested in the treaty of peace. They plainly show that the authors of this bill understood that the true basis of the trade and intercourse between nations is reciprocity of benefit; a foundation on which alone the friendly intercourse between men and nations can be permanently established. The preamble of this bill declares "that it was highly expedient that the intercourse between Great Britain and the United States should be established on the most enlarged principles of reciprocal benefit to both countries;" and as, from the distance between them, it would be a considerable time before a treaty of commerce, placing their trade and intercourse on a permanent foundation, could be concluded, the bill, for the purpose of a temporary regulation thereof, provided, that American vessels should be admitted into the ports of Great Britain, as those of other independent States, and that their cargoes should be liable to the same duties only as the same merchandise would be subject to if the same were the property of British subjects, and imported in British vessels; and, further, that the vessels of the United States should be admitted into the English plantations and colonies in America, with any articles the growth or manufacture of the United States, and with liberty to export from such colonies and plantations to the United States any merchandise whatsoever, subject to the same duties only as if the property of British subjects, and imported or exported in British vessels; allowing, also, the same bounties, drawbacks, and exemptions, on goods exported from Great Britain to the United States in American vessels, as on the like exportations in British vessels to the English colonies and plantations.

The persons benefited by the English exclusive system of trade and navigation were put in motion by this bill, which was earnestly opposed, and, after a variety of discussion, postponed or rejected. About this period Mr. Pitt, who had supported this bill in the House of Commons, resigned his office of Chancellor of the Exchequer, as his colleagues in Lord Shelburne's administration had before done. The coalition administration that succeeded introduced a new bill, which became a law, vesting in the King and Council authority to make such temporary regulations of the American navigation and trade as should be deemed expedient.

Sundry Orders in Council were accordingly made, whereby a trade and intercourse in American and English vessels between the United States and Great Britain were allowed; and, with the exception of fish oil, and one or two other articles, the produce of the United States, imported into Great Britain, was admitted freely, or subject to the duties payable on the like articles imported in English vessels from the American colonies.

An intercourse and a trade in enumerated articles were also opened between the United States and the English West India colonies, but with a proviso, (the principle whereof is still maintained against us,) whereby American vessels were excluded, and the whole trade confined to English vessels.

After a periodical renewal of these orders for several years, the regulations that they contained were adopted by, and became an act of, Parliament. This act was afterwards modified, and rendered conformable to the provision of Mr. Jay's treaty, the commercial articles of which expired in the year 1803—not long after which date England passed a new act of Parliament concerning the American navigation and trade. This act maintains the exclusion of American vessels from the intercourse between the United States and the English colonies, and confines the same, as former acts and Orders in Council had done, to English vessels; it repealed the settlement of duties pursuant to Mr. Jay's treaty; and, giving up the policy of the enlarged and liberal system of intercourse which had been proposed in Mr. Pitt's bill, it repealed such parts of all former acts and orders as admitted the productions of the United States, either freely, or, on paying the same duties only as were payable on the like articles imported from the English colonies and plantations; and placed all articles the produce of the United States, imported in American vessels, on the same footing as the like articles imported in foreign ships from other foreign countries. This new footing of our trade with England, the importance whereof is well understood by those who are engaged in supplying her markets with masts, spars, timber, naval stores, and pot and pearl ashes, may be regarded as decisive evidence of a complete change of policy concerning the American trade and intercourse—which, however unsatisfactory, as respected the colonial trade, has become more so by the foregoing provision of this act of Parliament.

The policy that manifested itself in the treaty of our independence, and which is seen in the bill to regulate the trade and intercourse between England and the United States, prepared by the Administration that made the Treaty of Peace, was to unite in a firm bond of friendship, by the establishment of trade and intercourse on the solid basis of reciprocal benefit, a people politically separate, living under different governments, but having a common origin, a common language, a common law, and kindred blood; circumstances so peculiar, as not to be found between any other nation. Instead of this policy, one of a different sort is preferred—one that England has a right to prefer; and against the many evils of which, we must protect ourselves as well as we are able to do. The intricate, countervailing and perplexing code of commercial intercourse, founded in jealousy, and the rival establishments and pursuits of the powers of Europe bordering upon, and constantly interfering with each other, has been adopted and applied to the United States—a people, agricultural more than manufacturing or commercial, placed in another quarter of the globe, cultivating, and proposing to others, an open system of trade and intercourse; and herein, as in many other important discriminations, differing from the nations of Europe, and therefore not fit subjects to which these restrictive and jealous regulations are applicable.

Our policy is, and ever has been, a different one. We desire peace with all nations; and the wars of maritime Europe have taught us that a free system of trade and intercourse would be the best means of preserving it.

With these principles as our guide, at the negotiation of the Treaty of Peace in 1783, our Ministers were authorized to conclude a treaty of commerce with England on this basis; but no treaty was concluded. Afterwards, and when a temporary trade and intercourse were opened by England, looking, as we supposed, to a treaty of commerce, Congress instructed Messrs. Adams, Franklin, and Jefferson, to renew the overture of a treaty of commerce, which was done through the English Ambassador at Paris, in the year 1784; but no correspondent disposition being shown by England, this second overture failed.

The interest and prejudice of those who were benefited by the monopolies and exclusive system of England, were opposed to any treaty with this country, on the principle of reciprocal advantage. The political writers of that day, under the influence of these partial views, or not sufficiently appreciating the true theory of commerce, contended that it would be folly to enter into engagements by which England might not wish to be found in future; that such engagements would be gratuitous; as, according to their interpretation, Congress possessed no power, under the confederation, to enforce any stipulation into which they might enter; that no treaty that could be made would suit all the States; if any were necessary, they should be made with the States separately; but that none was necessary; and those who talked of liberality and reciprocity in commercial affairs, were either without argument or knowledge; that the object of England was, not reciprocity and liberality, but to raise as many sailors and as much shipping as possible.*

This unequal footing of our foreign commerce, and the language made use of by England at this juncture, served still more to increase the public discontent; especially as it was plainly avowed that England ought to render the trade with us as exclusively advantageous to herself as her power would enable her to do. Congress having no power, under the Confederation, to impose countervailing and other corrective regulations of trade, the States separately attempted to establish regulations upon this subject. But, as a part only of the States joined in this measure, and as the laws that were passed for this purpose differed from each other, the experiment completely failed.

In this condition of our navigation and trade, subject to foreign restrictions and exclusion, without a power at home to countervail and check the same, Congress resolved to make another effort to conclude a commercial treaty with England. For this purpose Mr. Adams, since President of the United States, was appointed, and went to England. Mr. Adams resided in England for several years; but found and left the Government unchanged, and equally as before disinclined to make with us a treaty of commerce.

This further disappointment, with the depreciating condition of our navigation and trade, joined to the embarrassment of the public finances, produced what no inferior pressure could have done; it produced the General Convention of 1787, that formed the Constitution of the United States.

Had England entered into a liberal treaty of commerce with the United States, this convention would not have been assembled. Without so intending it, the adherence of England to her unequal and exclusive system of trade and navigation, gave to this country a constitution; and the countervailing and equalizing bill now before the Senate, arising from the same cause, may assist us in establishing and extending those great branches of national wealth and power, which we have such constant and urgent motives to encourage.

The establishment of the Constitution of the United States was coëval with the commencement of the French Revolution. The sessions of the General Convention at Philadelphia, and of the Assembly of Notables at Paris, were in the same year.

Laws were passed by the first Congress assembled under the new constitution, partially to correct the inequality of our navigation and trade with foreign nations; and a small discrimination in duties of impost and tonnage was made for this purpose.

Afterwards, in the year 1794, a number of resolutions on the subject of navigation and trade were moved in the House of Representatives, by a distinguished member of that body. These resolutions had a special reference to the refusal of England to enter into an equal commercial treaty with us, aimed at countervailing her exclusive system. Other and more direct resolutions. bearing on England, were also proposed by other members, and referred to the inexecution of the Treaty of Peace, and to the recent captures of American vessels by English cruisers, in the American seas.

The policy of these resolutions was doubted; they were therefore strenuously opposed, and the extraordinary mission of Mr. Jay to England suspended their further discussion.

The French Revolution had by this time become the subject of universal attention. War had broken out between France and England. The avowed policy of our own Government to avoid war, and to adhere to a system of neutrality, was much questioned; and for a time it was matter of great uncertainty whether the country would support the neutrality recommended by the President.

The universal dissatisfaction, on account of the commercial system of England, the inexecution of the articles of peace, the numerous captures by orders of the French Government, of our vessels, employed in a trade strictly neutral, combined with our friendly recollections of the services of France, and our good wishes in favor of the effort she professed to be making to establish a free constitution, constituted a crisis most difficult and important.

It was in these circumstances that President WASHINGTON nominated Mr. Jay as Envoy to England. The Senate confirmed the nomination, and the immediate effect was, the suspension of the further discussion of the important resolutions before the House of Representatives.

England seems never to have duly appreciated the true character and importance of this extraordinary measure. France well understood and resented it. Mr. Jay was received with civility, and concluded a treaty with England on all the points of his instructions. When published, it met with great opposition. The article respecting the West India trade had been excluded from the treaty by the Senate, by reason of the inadmissible condition or proviso that was coupled with it—with this exception, it was finally ratified by the President.

Although the treaty did not come up to the expectation of all, in addition to the satisfactory arrangements concerning English debts, the unlawful capture and condemnation of our vessels, and the delivery of the ports, points of very great importance, it contained articles regulating the trade, navigation, and maritime rights of the two countries. No treaty that could have been made with England would, in the highly excited temper of the country, have satisfied it. But, to those whose object it was to prevent the country from taking part in the war between France and England, and to prevail upon it to adhere to a system of impartial neutrality; who, moreover, believed, that the safety, and even liberties of the country were concerned in the adoption of this course, the treaty proved a welcome auxiliary.

It suspended the further agitation of difficult and angry topics of controversy with England; it enabled the Government to persist in, and to maintain, the system of neutrality which had been recommended by the Father of his Country—a policy, the correctness and benefits of which, whatever may have been the disagreement of opinion among the public men of those times, that will now scarcely be doubted.

During the continuance of this treaty, further though ineffectual attempts were made to establish a satisfactory intercourse with the English colonies in the West Indies, and, likewise, to place the subject of impressment on a mutually safe and equitable footing.

The commercial articles of this treaty expired in 1804, no proposal having been made to renew them. A subsequent negotiation took place, but nothing was definitively concluded. The peace of Amiens was of short duration. Another war took place between France and England; no maritime treaty existed between the United States and England; and the manner in which England exercised her power on the ocean; the great interruption of the navigation and trade of neutral nations; the numerous captures of their ships and cargoes under the retaliatory decrees and orders of France and England, with other vexatious occurrences, revived the former angry feelings towards England, and greatly contributed to the late war with that nation.

This war was closed not long after the conclusion of the general peace in Europe; and the Treaty of Ghent was followed by a meagre commercial convention, made at London, and limited, in its duration, to a few years only.

Neither the spirit of the negotiation, nor the scope of the articles, afford any evidence that England is inclined to treat with this country on the only principle on which a commercial treaty with her can be desirable. Her decision on this point seems to be beyond question, as our latest communications inform us that her ancient system will not be changed; and, in case we are dissatisfied with its operation, that England has no objection to our taking any such measures concerning the same, as we may deem expedient—an intimation that puts an end to further overtures on our part. Such is the explanation why the measure now proposed has been so long deferred.

During the Confederation, Congress were without power to adopt it.

The treaty concluded by Mr. Jay, 1794, the relaxation of the navigation and colonial laws, during the war between France and England, and the advantages derived from our neutral trade while this war continued, rendered the measure inexpedient during this period.

And the expectation since entertained that a more enlarged and equal treaty of commerce and navigation, applicable in its provisions to peace as well as war, might be substituted in place of the present commercial convention, has hitherto suspended the interference of Congress.

This expectation must be given up; England has apprised us of her decision to adhere to her ancient and exclusive system of trade and navigation, and the only alternative before us, is to submit to the regulation of our own navigation by England, or to interpose the authority of the constitution to countervail the same. There can be no hesitation in the choice.

The bill before the Senate, is in nothing unfriendly towards England—it is merely a commercial regulation, to which we are even invited; a measure strictly of self-defence, and intended to protect the legitimate resources of our own country from being any longer made use of, not as they should be, for our benefit, but to increase and strengthen the resources and power of a foreign nation.

Mr. MACON spoke in support of the bill; after which—

The question, "Shall the bill be engrossed and read a third time?" was taken, and determined in the affirmative—yeas 32, nay 1, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barbour, Burrill, Crittenden, Daggett, Dickerson, Fromentin, Gaillard, Goldsborough, Horsey, Hunter, Johnson, King, Lacock, Leake, Macon, Morrill, Morrow, Noble, Otis, Roberts, Ruggles, Sanford, Smith, Stokes, Storer, Tait, Talbot, Taylor, Tichenor, Van Dyke, Williams of Mississippi, and Williams of Tennessee.

THURSDAY, April 9.

SAMUEL W. DANA, from the State of Connecticut, took his seat in the Senate.

On motion by Mr. BARBOUR, it was unanimously agreed to suspend the third rule for conducting business in the Senate, as it respects the honorable Mr. DANA, to wit: "Every member when he speaks shall address the Chair, standing in his place, and when he has finished shall sit down."

Bank of the United States—Application for Authority to appoint Persons to sign its Notes.

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the same committee, to whom was recommended the memorial of the President and Directors of the Bank of the United States, reported a bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States," and the bill was read twice by unanimous consent, and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and no amendment having been made thereto, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House; and the bill was amended. Mr. C. also laid on the table the following document:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, April 7, 1818.

SIR: I have been informed by the President of the Bank of the United States, that the board of directors have applied to the Congress of the United States for permission to issue bills and notes signed by other persons than the president and cashier of the bank. The intimate connection which necessarily exists between that institution and the department of the Executive Government confided to my direction, may render it excusable on my part to present to the Committee on Finance, under whose consideration the subject has been placed by the Senate, some of the reasons which appear to be necessarily connected with the application. It is not my intention to urge the sanction of the committee to the particular modification sought by the bank. I shall attempt only to satisfy the committee that, under the existing provisions of the charter, as construed by the corporation, it is impossible to put into circulation an amount of bills of suitable denominations to supply the necessary and indispensable demands of the community.

The president and cashier of the bank have to sign and countersign all the bills of the bank and of its various offices. They have, in addition to the ordinary duties of president and cashier of a bank, to perform all the duties of commissioners of loans for the State of Pennsylvania, and of agents for the payment of pensioners of every description for that State. They are necessarily charged with the general superintendence of all the offices established by the bank, from the District of Maine to the State of Louisiana, involving a most extensive correspondence, and imposing upon them an examination of the weekly returns of those offices. This examination is necessarily imposed upon those officers, who are bound to watch over the interests of the bank generally, and to supply the wants of the different officers; to transmit specie where there is a demand for it, and to withdraw it from points where, from the course of trade or other causes, it may have temporarily accumulated. The duty of transmitting the public funds wherever required within the United States demands and receives their unremitted attention. From the view here presented of the various and important duties assigned to them by the charter, many of which are so intimately connected with the Government as to constitute them highly important officers, it will be readily perceived that but a very small portion of their time can be devoted to the mechanical labor of signing bills and notes. It may, indeed, be said that the corporation, having the power of appointing such officers and servants as the interest of the institution may require, may appoint other officers, who may be charged with the superintendence of the interests of the institution generally, and of course with the correspondence and distribution of the capital of the bank among the different offices, according to their various wants and necessities arising out of the course of trade, or any other cause. Such a course might, indeed, be pursued; but it would be an entire inversion of the established principle of action, not only in institutions of this nature, but of right reason, when applied to all associations whatsoever.

The signing of bills and notes is a mere mechanical act. The superintendence of an institution so extensive and complicated, intimately connected not only with the Government, but with all the wants and conveniences of society, especially influencing in a very high degree the commercial transactions of the nation, requires intellects of more than ordinary elevation, and information as various as the wants and conveniences of civilized society. To metamorphose the highest officers of the institution into mere machines, the operations of which are to be confined to tracing certain characters infinitely repeated, whilst subordinate officers or servants are invested with duties requiring the highest order of intellect and the most extensive degree of information, would indeed be an inversion of the established ideas of the moral fitness of things.

* As revolted colonies, we lost the rights of trade with the British dominions, and at the restoration of peace it was found impracticable to recover the right in full—the trade to her colonies being the exception, and the direct trade to her West Indies totally interdicted. Negotiation, though tried under every President, failed to obtain it: legislation was resorted to, of which this bill was one instance, but still without effect. The interdiction remained until the year 1830, when, under the administration of President Jackson, it was removed, and the direct trade with the British West Indies placed upon the just and fair principles of reciprocity which have prevailed ever since.

It is not my intention, nor is it the wish of the bank, to relieve the president and cashier from the mechanical labor of signing bills. This duty will always be performed by them, as far as a due attention to their other and more important duties will permit.

The reasons and facts which I have presented, in order to prove that it is impossible for the president and cashier to sign the bills necessary to the wants and convenience of the community, are supported by the experience of the bank. Twenty offices have been established, and applications for others remain suspended from the impossibility of furnishing them with bills for circulation. Two of those which were organized more than six months back, have not yet been supplied with bills to commence operations. Several of those established in the Western country have been so scantily supplied as to render their operations extremely circumscribed. That established at Augusta, in Georgia, will probably be abandoned, on account of the impossibility of supplying it with bills to make the employment of capital profitable.

I remain, with sentiments of the highest respect, your most obedient and very humble servant,

WM. H. CRAWFORD.

Hon. G. W. CAMPBELL, Chairman Com. Finance.

Statistics of the United States.

Mr. BARBOUR, from the committee to whom was referred the resolution authorizing a subscription of five hundred copies of Statistical Annals, proposed to be published by Adam Seybert, and the purchase of a certain number of copies of a Statistical view of the Commerce of the United States, by Timothy Pitkin, made a report, accompanied by a bill, authorizing a subscription for the Statistical Annals by Adam Seybert, and the purchase of Pitkin's Statistics; and the report and bill were read, and the bill passed to a second reading.

The report is as follows:

That the manuscript of Dr. Seybert's work has been submitted to their inspection, and, in their opinion, it combines a mass of various and valuable facts and materials, collected with thorough diligence from authentic documents, lucidly and conveniently arranged and methodized. Its main object appears to be to furnish complete information as to the past and present state of the population, navigation, commerce, manufactures, army, navy, public lands, and finances of the United States, and a series of important facts in relation to these and other connected subjects, is condensed into tabular forms and statements, exhibiting in one view an entire and comparative history of each subject. To this work, much time, industry, and ability must have been devoted; and it forms a vast depository of information, the whole of which is useful and interesting, and some of which, from the conflagration of the public offices, and other untoward events, is now, perhaps, nowhere else preserved. It must be apparent, then, that this work must be deemed necessary and acceptable to every functionary of the Government of the United States, either in its administrative or legislative departments. It was principally for their use the work was designed. It will expedite and facilitate the performance of their respective duties, and it is therefore natural and proper that it should receive their protection and encouragement. It appears to the committee altogether hopeless that the publication of these Statistical Annals can otherwise be obtained. It will not be undertaken by the author at his own risk. From the variety of numerical tables, the expense of printing would considerably exceed that of ordinary books; and as profit cannot be expected from the sale of a work, which, from its nature, can never be in a certain sense popular, there is no inducement to stimulate the enterprise of a bookseller. Works of a similar description in other countries have frequently been published at the national charge; and surely there is something in the nature of our liberal institutions that ought to induce us, as freely as any other nation, to give publicity to all we have done, as fully to develop the principles of our policy, and to ascertain as clearly the causes of our prosperity. And it may be added, that the best mode of deriving benefit from experience, of rendering what is valuable in our system of political economy permanent, and of reforming what is injudicious and erroneous, can best be suggested by a systematic collation of the facts and principles on which that system is established.

The most of the foregoing remarks are likewise strictly applicable to Mr. Pitkin's published work, entitled "Commercial Statistics of the United States." It is a work of undoubted merit and utility; its facts are drawn from authentic official documents, and its numerical tables and calculations exhibit great industry and accuracy of research. It is understood that, intrinsically valuable as this work is, it has produced little or no profit to the publisher or the author; and it appears to the committee it would be unjust and ungrateful to distinguish one of these works by the praise and patronage of Congress, and leave the other unnoticed and unrewarded. The committee are therefore of opinion that a subscription for both these works ought to be authorized, and report a bill for that purpose.

SATURDAY, April 11.

Five o'clock in the Evening.

On motion by Mr. MACON, a committee was appointed on the part of the Senate, jointly with such committee as may be appointed on the part of the House of Representatives, to wait on the President of the United States, and notify him that, unless he may have any further communication to make to the two Houses of Congress, they are ready to adjourn. Mr. MACON and Mr. KING were appointed the said committee.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House, having finished the business before them, are about to adjourn.

Mr. MACON reported from the joint committee, that they had waited on the President of the United States, who informed them that he had no further communication to make to the two Houses of Congress.

Ordered, That the Secretary inform the House of Representatives that the Senate, having finished the Legislative business before them, are about to adjourn.

Whereupon, the PRESIDENT adjourned the Senate to meet on the third Monday in November next.

FIFTEENTH CONGRESS.—FIRST SESSION.

Election of Speaker, &c.

A quorum, consisting of a majority of the whole number of members, being present, the House then proceeded to the choice of a SPEAKER. On counting the votes, it appeared that of 147 votes given in, there were for HENRY CLAY, 140; for SAMUEL SMITH, 6; blank, 1.

So that Mr. CLAY was declared to be duly elected Speaker; and, being conducted to the Chair, the usual oath was administered to him, by Mr. BASSETT; when the Speaker made his acknowledgments to the House in the following terms:

"If we consider, gentlemen, the free and illustrious origin of this assembly; the extent and magnitude of the interests committed to its charge; and the brilliant prospects of the rising confederacy, whose destiny may be materially affected by the legislation of Congress, the House of Representatives justly ranks amongst the most eminent deliberative bodies that have existed. To be appointed to preside at its deliberations, is an exalted honor of which I entertain the highest sense; and I pray you to accept, for the flattering manner in which you have conferred it, my profound acknowledgments.

"If I bring into the Chair, gentlemen, the advantage of some experience of its duties, far from inspiring me with undue confidence, that experience serves only to fill me with distrust of my own capacity. I have been taught by it, how arduous those duties are, and how unavailing would be any efforts of mine to discharge them, without the liberal support and cheering countenance of the House. I shall anxiously seek, gentlemen, to merit that support and countenance, by an undeviating aim at impartiality, and at the preservation of that decorum, without the observance of which, the public business must be illy transacted, and the dignity and the character of the House seriously impaired."

The members having been severally qualified by taking the oath to support the constitution, the House proceeded to elect a clerk. On counting the ballots, it appeared that 144 votes were given in, all of which were for THOMAS DOUGHERTY, who resumed his place as Clerk of the House.

THOMAS CLAXTON was then reappointed Doorkeeper, BENJAMIN BURCH Assistant Doorkeeper, and THOMAS DUNN Sergeant-at-Arms, without opposition.

After the usual incipient proceedings, and interchanging messages with the Senate, the House adjourned to 12 o'clock to-morrow.

TUESDAY, December 2.

Several other members, to wit: from New Jersey, EPHRAIM BATEMAN; from Virginia, WILLIAM J. LEWIS; and from Tennessee, THOMAS CLAIBORNE and THOMAS HOGG, appeared, produced their credentials, were qualified, and took their seats.

Mr. HOLMES, of Massachusetts, from the joint committee appointed yesterday to wait on the President of the United States, reported, that the committee had performed that service, and that the President answered, that he would make a communication to the two Houses of Congress to-day, at 12 o'clock.

A Message in writing, was then received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, which was read and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and five thousand copies thereof ordered to be printed for the use of the members of the House. [For this Message, see Senate proceedings of this date, page 4.]

WEDNESDAY, December 3.

Several other members, to wit: from Pennsylvania, JOHN SERGEANT; from Virginia, PETERSON GOODWYN and THOMAS M. NELSON; and from South Carolina, WILSON NESBITT, appeared, produced their credentials, were qualified, and took their seats.

Reference of the Message.

On motion of Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, being called to the Chair.

The President's Message was the subject of consideration.

Mr. TAYLOR moved a series of resolutions, embracing the following references of various parts of the Message:

"Resolved, That so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to the subject of Foreign Affairs, and to our commercial intercourse with British Colonial ports, be referred to a select committee."

The first resolution having been read for consideration, Mr. CLAY (the Speaker) moved to amend the same by adding to the end thereof the following words:

"And that the said committee be instructed to inquire whether any, and if any, what provisions of law are necessary to insure to the American colonies of Spain a just observance of the duties incident to the neutral relation in which the United States stand, in the existing war between them and Spain."

Mr. CLAY said, that his presenting at so early a period of the session this subject to the consideration of the House, was in consequence of certain proceedings which he had seen represented in the public prints, as having taken place before certain of our courts of justice. Two or three cases bearing on this subject had come to his knowledge, which he wished to state to the House. The first had occurred at Philadelphia, before the circuit court of the United States held in that city. The circumstances of the case, for which however he did not pretend to vouch, having seen them through the channel already indicated, were these—if they were incorrectly stated, he was happy that a gentleman had taken his seat this morning from that city, who would be able to correct him: that nine or ten British disbanded officers had formed in Europe the resolution to unite themselves with the Spanish patriots in the contest existing between them and Spain; that to carry into effect this intention they had sailed from Europe, and in their transit to South America had touched at the port of Philadelphia; that, during their residence in Philadelphia, wearing, perhaps, the arms and habiliments of military men, making no disguise of their intention to participate in the struggle, they took passage in a vessel bound to some port in South America; that, a knowledge of this fact having come to the ears of the public authorities, or, perhaps at the instigation of some agent of the Spanish Government, a prosecution was commenced against these officers, who, from their inability to procure bail, were confined in prison. If, said Mr. C., the circumstances attending this transaction be correctly stated, it becomes an imperious duty in the House to institute the inquiry contemplated by the amendment which I have proposed. That this was an extraordinary case was demonstrated by the fact of the general sensation which it had excited on the subject in the place where it had occurred. Filled as that respectable and popular city is with men differing widely on political topics, and entertaining various views of political affairs, but one sentiment, Mr. C. said, prevailed on this subject, which was favorable to the persons thus arraigned. With regard to the conduct of the court on this occasion, he would say nothing. The respect which, whilst he had a seat on this floor, he should always show to every department of the Government; the respect he entertained for the honorable Judge who had presided, forbade him pronouncing the decision of that court to have been unwarranted by law. But he felt himself perfectly sustained in saying, that if the proceeding was warranted by the existing law, it was the imperious duty of Congress to alter the law in this respect. For what, he asked, was the neutral obligation which one nation owed to another engaged in war? The essence of it is this: that the belligerent means of the neutral shall not be employed in the war in favor of either of the parties. That is the whole of the obligation of a third party in a war between two others. It certainly does not require of one nation to restrain the belligerent means of other nations. If those nations choose to permit their means to be employed in behalf of either party, it is their business to look to it, and not ours. Let the conduct of the persons prosecuted be regarded in its most unfavorable light; let it be considered as the passage of troops through our country, and there was nothing in our neutral obligations forbidding it. The passage of troops through a neutral country, according to his impressions, was a question depending on the particular interest, quiet, or repose of the country traversed, and might be granted or refused, at its discretion, without in any degree affecting the obligations of the neutral to either of the parties engaged in the controversy. But surely, Mr. C. said, this was not a case of the passage of troops, the persons apprehended not being in sufficient number; not organized or equipped in such a manner as, under any construction, to constitute a military corps.

On this case he would detain the House no longer, he said; for he was satisfied they could not but agree with him, if the law justified the proceeding that had taken place, that law ought to be immediately amended. Other cases had occurred in which it appeared to him it became the Congress to interpose its authority. Persons sailing under the flag of the provinces had been arraigned in our courts, and tried for piracy; in one case, after having been arraigned, tried, and acquitted of piracy, the same individuals, on the instigation of a Spanish officer or agent, had been again arraigned for the same offence. The gentleman from Massachusetts would correct him if he was wrong, for the case had occurred in the town of Boston. We admit the flag of these colonies into our ports, said Mr. C.; we profess to be neutral; but if our laws pronounce that the moment the property and persons under that flag enter our ports, they shall be seized, the one claimed by the Spanish Minister or Consul as the property of Spain, and the other prosecuted as pirates, that law ought to be altered if we mean to perform our neutral professions. I have brought the subject before this House thus promptly, said Mr. C., because I trust that in this House the cause will find justice; that, however treated elsewhere, on this floor will be found a guardian interest attending to our performance of the just obligations of neutrality. Hitherto, he said, whatever might have been our intentions, our acts have all been on the other side. From the proclamation of 1815, issued to terminate an expedition supposed to be organizing in Louisiana—an expedition existing only in the mind of the Chevalier de Onis—down to the late act, whether the measure was a proper one or not he did not say; his confidence in the Executive led him to suppose it was adopted on sufficient grounds—down to the order for suppressing, as it was called, the establishments at Amelia Island and Galveston—all the acts of the Government had been on one side; they all bore against the colonies, against the cause in which the patriots of South America were arduously engaged. It became us, he said, to look to the other side, honestly intending neutrality, as he believed we did. Let us recollect the condition of the patriots; no minister here to spur on our Government, as was said in an interesting, and it appeared to him a very candid work recently published in this country, respecting the progress of the South American revolution; no Minister here to be rewarded by noble honors in consequence of the influence he is supposed to possess with the American Government. No; their unfortunate case, Mr. C. said, was what ours had been in the years 1778 and 1779—their Ministers, like our Franklins and Jays at that day, were skulking about Europe imploring inexorable legitimacy one kind look—some aid to terminate a war afflicting to humanity. Nay, their situation was worse than ours; for we had one great and magnanimous ally to recognize us, but no nation had stepped forward to acknowledge any of these provinces. Such disparity between the parties, Mr. C. said, demanded a just attention to the interests of the party which was unrepresented; and if these facts which he had mentioned, and others which had come to his knowledge, were correct, they loudly demanded the interposition of Congress. He trusted the House would give the subject their attention, and show that here, in this place, the obligations of neutrality would be strictly regarded in respect to Spanish America.

Mr. SERGEANT rose in consequence of the gentleman having appealed to him, not to enter into any discussion of the question presented by the amendment, but to speak of the facts which were within his knowledge. The statement made by the Speaker was substantially correct; it was also correct that the circumstance had occasioned considerable sensation among all parties in the city of Philadelphia. Mr. S. recapitulated the principal facts, adding, that the vessel in which these persons embarked was laden with munitions of war. As respected the views and intentions of the persons apprehended, Mr. S. said, he believed they had neither any intention nor any idea of violating the laws of the United States, and that their conduct had been perfectly decorous and correct. The court had thought they had offended against the act of Congress of the last session; or were so far at least of that opinion, that they thought it necessary to detain them. The bail demanded was not high; but they were not able to procure it, and were, therefore, committed to jail. It was because of the correct deportment of these persons, that the sentiment in their favor had been so general—but no complaint was made of the court, for which the same respect was entertained with which the Speaker himself had regarded it. He had mentioned these facts only that the House might, when the time came for acting on it, be aware of the construction put on the existing law, so far as any had been given.

The amendment moved by Mr. CLAY to the first resolution was agreed to without opposition.

THURSDAY, December 4.

Three other members, to wit: from Pennsylvania, HENRY BALDWIN; from Maryland, THOMAS BAYLEY; and from Virginia, JAMES JOHNSON, appeared, produced their credentials, were qualified, and took their seats.

FRIDAY, December 5.

Two other members, to wit: from Pennsylvania, WILLIAM MACLAY, and from Virginia, BALLARD SMITH, appeared, produced their credentials, were qualified, and took their seats.

Spanish American Provinces.

Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana, offered the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to lay before the House of Representatives such information as he may possess and think proper to communicate, relative to the independence and political condition of the provinces of Spanish America.

The resolution having been read—

Mr. ROBERTSON said that he supposed there would be no objection to the adoption of the resolution which he had just submitted to the consideration of the House. He found, from the late Message of the President, that the attention of the House, as well as of the nation, had been, in a general way, directed to the situation of the provinces of Spanish America. The President had observed, too, and very truly, that the citizens of the United States sympathized in the events which affected their neighbors. Mr. R. said that, as far back as the year 1811, this subject had excited considerable interest; that a committee had been raised; the declaration of independence and the constitution of Venezuela, with other information, laid before it by the then President, and a report on them submitted to the House. The report, among other things, expressed much good will towards the Venezueleans, and an intention to acknowledge their independence whenever that independence should be achieved. From that time till the present, silence had been observed in regard to the affairs of that part of the continent. The reason was obvious; we were soon after engaged in war with England, and since the peace, our own pressing concerns had occupied our attention.

The President has spoken, sir, of the interest and the sympathy we feel in the affairs of our southern neighbors. Perhaps it may be said, with truth, that no subject excites, throughout the civilized world, a stronger interest than the contest in which the provinces of Spanish America are engaged. Every wind that blows wafts to our shores the schemes and speculations of European statesmen and politicians; from the frozen regions of the North to the milder climes of the Peninsula, it elicits remark and commands attention. Even Alexander, he who indites epistles about peace and bible societies, while he whets the sword of battle and prepares the weapons of destruction; he, it is said, is about to furnish his Cossacks to add to the horrors of, as it is already called, the war of death. The thunders of the Pope, too, the head of the Christian church, began to be heard, and no doubt we shall soon see his anathemas giving up the people of South America, body and soul, to the punishments due here and hereafter to the crimes of rebellion and republicanism. If, then, to governments across the Atlantic, the situation of this people be thus interesting, surely it is not a matter of surprise that the citizens of the United States should with some solicitude turn their attention towards them. Every Republican in the United States must lament their disasters and exult in their triumphs; they do but follow the example we have set them; we owe our glory and our fame to resistance to arbitrary power, and the people of Spanish America, and all others groaning under oppression, must owe their elevation and worth of character to the same circumstance. They do but follow in our footsteps; it is in vain to deny or disguise the fact; it is known throughout the world—whatever of injury despotism or priestcraft have sustained, whether from the revolution of France, or that which now, I hope, flourishes in our hemisphere, is laid to the account of our glorious Revolution, and the excellent principles of our constitution.

It is to be regretted, Mr. Speaker, that our acquaintance with the people of Spanish America is not more particular and intimate than it is: we entertain but one sentiment about them—our feelings are all in unison; yet we differ and dispute on a variety of points, which it is desirable should be no longer suffered to remain in doubt. Mexico, Peru, Chili, Buenos Ayres, Venezuela, New Granada, are they independent? Are they struggling for independence, or have they yielded to their European tyrant? Have they made known their situation to the Executive Department? Have they demanded to be recognized as independent sovereignties? Do they govern themselves? elect their agents, legislature, executive, and judiciary? lay and collect taxes, raise and support armies, and navies? It is possible that these facts are in the possession of the President; it is very well known that there have been agents, men of high respectability, sent publicly from the governments of Venezuela, New Granada, Buenos Ayres, and Mexico, to this country, and, for any thing I know to the contrary, from other provinces. It is probable that they have not remained silent, but whatever they may have said has not been made known to this House, or to this nation. As our Government is essentially popular, I wish information to be given to the people. I wish for information, that our judgments may sanction sentiments our hearts so warmly approve. I do not mean, Mr. Speaker, to commit myself in regard to my future course—it must, to a certain extent, depend upon circumstances. This House will act as circumstances may require, but for myself, I have no hesitation to say, that if it shall appear that the provinces of Spanish America, or any of them, are really independent, no earthly consideration shall prevent me, in my public character, from acknowledging them as sovereign States.

Mr. FORSYTH said he was too well acquainted with the temper of the people of the United States on this subject, to oppose any motion for inquiring into it; such was not his object; but he knew from experience, that some inquiries were proper and some dangerous. In this case, he thought that all which could be known ought to be known; but he suggested to the mover of the resolution, whether it was not too broad in its call on the Executive, and whether it ought not to contain the usual qualification of excepting such information as the President might deem the communication of incompatible with the public interest. Mr. F. presumed the President had communicated all that he knew, or all that he wished Congress to know on the subject; and as it was usual in requesting information of the Executive, to ask for such only as the public interest would, in his opinion, permit to be disclosed, he proposed so to modify this motion; in which shape only could he consent to vote for it.

Mr. ROBERTSON signified his ready assent to Mr. FORSYTH's proposition.

The resolution passed nem. con. as modified, and a committee of two was appointed to wait on the President with it.

The House adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, December 8.

Several other members, to wit: from Massachusetts, JONATHAN MASON; from Virginia, ARCHIBALD AUSTIN and JOHN FLOYD; and from Ohio, PETER HITCHCOCK, appeared, produced their credentials, were qualified, and took their seats.

NATHANIEL POPE from the Illinois Territory, and JOHN SCOTT, from the Territory of Missouri, having also appeared and produced their credentials as Delegates to represent the said Territories in the Fifteenth Congress of the United States, were also qualified, and took their seats.

Amelia Island and Spanish Patriots.

Mr. RHEA offered for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President be requested to lay before the House of Representatives any information he may possess, and think proper to communicate, relative to the proceedings of certain persons who took possession of Amelia Island, at the mouth of the St. Mary's River, near the boundary of the State of Georgia, in the summer of the present year, and made an establishment there; and also any information he hath, and may think proper to communicate, relative to an establishment made, at an earlier period, by persons of the same description, in the Gulf of Mexico, at a place called Galveston, within the limits of the United States, as we contend, under the cession of Louisiana; together with the reasons inducing him to issue orders to suppress the said establishments.

Mr. RHEA said that the establishments referred to in the resolution he had just offered, had already excited much attention throughout the country, which would be still more attracted to that point by the order given to suppress them. His object in offering this motion was to obtain such information as might satisfy the minds of the American people on the expediency of that measure.

Mr. FORSYTH moved to strike out the last clause of the proposed resolution. It would be an extraordinary course for the House to ask for the reasons of the measure in question, when they were distinctly and satisfactorily avowed in the Message of the President. To call upon him, after that exposition, to explain the reasons for his conduct, would be to cast a severe reflection on the Executive, as implying dissatisfaction at the reasons already given. For his own part, Mr. F. said, the conduct of the Executive appeared to him to have been perfectly correct; but he had no objection to any information desired, if asked for, unconnected with the clause he had excepted to.

Mr. HUGH NELSON, of Virginia, twice addressed the House on the main subject of the resolution, but, being interrupted in his remarks by incidental circumstances, we have connected his observations in the following report of the substance of them. A few remarks are added, which the interruptions referred to prevented him from making. Mr. N. was decidedly in favor of the motion. Like the honorable SPEAKER, who had alluded to this matter when in Committee of the Whole the other day, Mr. N. said he felt his confidence in the Executive not diminished; like him, he felt confident that the measure of the suppression of these establishments, was founded, in their opinion, in a just sense of propriety, and in a desire to promote the public weal: and he believed that, for the satisfaction of the public, and for a just vindication of the Executive, these documents should be exhibited. I cannot but believe, said he, that the public will see, that, in this measure, the conduct of the Government has been marked by a due respect to the rights of the Spanish provinces, and a vigilant and prompt attention to the rights and interests of our own country. It is the best interest of the Spanish provinces, embarked in the noble cause of emancipating themselves, to give evidence to the world, that all their proceedings are the result of just and sound principles; to repel and refute, by a high-minded and magnanimous conduct, the malignant and calumnious representations which would place them in the grade of savages and barbarians. A just regard to the opinions of the civilized world; a due estimate of their own dignity and self-respect, will lead them to disclaim all connection with these piratical establishments. Their own interest would lead them to cooperate in the extinction of these hordes of buccaneers. There was a time when the union of McGregor, distinguished by his gallant exertions in the patriot cause of the Spanish provinces, with their naval commander, Aury, and supported by some of the high-minded and gallant spirits of our own late military establishment, might have led to the opinion that it was a bold and valorous enterprise, to wrest from their oppressors a portion of their territory, and bravely to wage the war in the assailable dominions of the Spanish monarch. But the moment for that opinion has gone by—McGregor has abandoned them. Posey and the other gallant spirits of this country, no more give color to the enterprise. And have they not themselves given further proofs, if proofs are wanting, that they are but a horde of buccaneers, invading our own territory, and plundering our own citizens? See the accounts from Savannah. To believe that these settlements are sanctioned by the Patriots, would be to degrade them from the high and dignified station which they hold in our estimation. That the Patriots should themselves countenance such establishments, would be further to descend from the highest pinnacle of honorable elevation, to the lowest abyss of humiliation and contempt. Men embarked in the glorious and magnanimous struggle for freedom and the rights of man, can never stoop to the condition of buccaneers, banditti, and pirates.

Mr. RHEA having accepted Mr. FORSYTH's proposed amendment as part of his own motion, the main question was taken on the resolution, and decided in the affirmative without a division; and a committee ordered to be appointed to wait on the President therewith.

TUESDAY, December 9.

Another member, to wit: ELIAS EARLE, from the State of South Carolina, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat.

WEDNESDAY, December 10.

Representative Qualifications.

Mr. FORSYTH, of Georgia, offered for consideration the following resolution, to obtain a decision on a question raised by a memorial yesterday presented, contesting the election of a member from Ohio, and which Mr. F. considered of great importance:

Resolved, That the Committee of Elections be instructed to inquire and report what persons elected to serve in the House of Representatives have accepted or held offices under the Government of the United States since the 4th day of March, 1817, and how far their right to a seat in this House is affected thereby.

The adoption of this resolution was warmly opposed by Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, and Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, and was also opposed by Mr. SEYBERT, of Pennsylvania, Mr. LIVERMORE, of New Hampshire, and Mr. W. P. MACLAY, of Pennsylvania, and was supported by Mr. FORSYTH.

It was opposed as a novel proceeding, imposing inconvenient and extraordinary duties on the Committee of Elections, by requiring them to go through the alphabet from A to Z, and inquire into the qualifications of every member of the House. It was also opposed as imputing impurity to the House, not justly attributable to it; since the fact of taking the oath to support the constitution was prima facie evidence that the member taking it was conscious of having violated no provision of that instrument. If we inquire into the qualifications of members, why not also into others equally prescribed by the constitution? It was time enough to inquire into the rights of members to their seats when any specific allegation was made as to the want of qualification of any one or more of them.

To which the mover (Mr. FORSYTH) replied, by expressing his surprise at the opposition to his motion. There was nothing in it, he said, which accused any part of this House, or any member of it, of improper conduct. It neither charged the House with suffering members to remain who ought not, nor any member of the House with remaining when he ought not. The object was to inquire whether persons in certain situations had a right to a seat or not. It was presumed that those gentlemen so situated had examined their own rights, and were convinced of their title to seats here. But as he very much doubted the right of any person so situated to a seat in this House, he wished to have the question settled. If the House should be of his opinion, he should see with great regret any gentleman so situated return even temporarily to his constituents—for temporarily he was sure it would be, and that the House would at the next session, if not at the close of this, have the aid of their judgments and abilities. As to specifying the members who would fall under this rule, Mr. F. said he did not know all there were; he had been informed that there were ten or eleven members whose right to a seat depended on the decision of this question—he did not know them; if he did, he should have no objection to comprehend their names in his motion. He concluded his observations by disclaiming the intention to impute the least blame to gentlemen who had taken their seats under these circumstances; for they had no doubt satisfied themselves on the question.

The question on the resolution was taken, when there appeared in favor of the resolution 85, against it 85.

The House being equally divided, the SPEAKER, assigning as his reason his desire to have the constitutional question fully investigated, voted in favor of the motion, which was therefore adopted.

Repeal of Internal Duties.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to abolish the internal duties.

The bill having been read through—

Mr. LOWNDES, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, made a few remarks of the same bearing as the reasoning of the report. He took occasion also to say that it was due to candor and to himself to add, that he should have individually thought it better, instead of a total repeal, to have made a modification of the duties, so as to reduce their amount and lighten their burden, but still to leave a part of the system in operation. Believing, however, that the expectation of the total repeal was such as to render vain any attempt to discriminate, or to modify, he had concurred in the course adopted by the committee of recommending a total repeal, in preference to retaining the whole.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, heartily concurred in the sentiment of the gentleman from South Carolina, that these taxes ought not to be retained for the purpose of adding to the surplus in the treasury. He rejoiced that, whether gentlemen voted on the subject from the spontaneous determination of their own minds, or the recommendation of the Executive, the taxes were to be repealed. He congratulated the country, that from this time the people would be exempted from a system as unequal in its operation as it was unjust. Our citizens, he said, had sustained it with a patience and long-suffering which was remarkable, and afforded a pledge that, should it be necessary hereafter again to resort to internal taxes, the Government might do so, and trust to the good sense of the people for their justification. The people, he argued, were always willing to pay taxes when the necessity of them was apparent. But, for more than a year past, that necessity had not existed for the internal duties, and, therefore, the people had demanded the repeal of them. Mr. W. referred to the estimates of the revenue from imposts for the present and last years, to show that the actual product had nearly doubled the estimate, as had been shown and predicted by the gentleman from Virginia, who was his able coadjutor at the last session, (Mr. JOHNSON,) and himself. He mentioned these facts, he said, to show that, if there was any blame anywhere for the occurrences of last session having reference to this subject—and blame had been imputed—the blame belonged to those who opposed the repeal of the taxes at that time, and not to those who advocated it. We rejoice now, said Mr. W., that the President has thought proper to recommend the measure, and that there appears to be a unanimous disposition at this time favorable to it.

The committee rose and reported their agreement to the bill, without amendment.

On the question to engross the bill—

Mr. BEECHER, of Ohio, said he was not sufficiently acquainted with this subject to act conclusively on it, and he presumed others might be in the same situation. To give them time to examine, he moved to adjourn.

This motion was lost by a large majority; and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

SATURDAY, December 13.

Revolutionary Survivors.

Mr. BLOOMFIELD, of New Jersey, from the committee to whom was referred so much of the President's Message as relates to the surviving Revolutionary patriots, reported, in part, a bill concerning certain surviving officers and soldiers of the late Revolutionary army.

[This bill provides that every commissioned and non-commissioned officer or soldier, who had served in the Army during the war which terminated in the Treaty of Peace with Great Britain in 1783, and reduced to indigence, or by age, sickness, or any other cause, may be unable to procure subsistence by manual labor, shall receive half-pay during life, equal to the half of the monthly pay allowed to his grade of service during the Revolutionary war—provided that no pension thus allowed to a commissioned officer shall exceed the half-pay of a lieutenant-colonel.]

The bill was twice read and committed.

The motion submitted by Mr. BASSETT, of Virginia, to amend the rules of the House, was taken up and agreed to. [The question of consideration, which has heretofore been a matter of much contention in the House, in the days of party conflict, is thus expunged from the rules of the House.]

MONDAY, December 15.

Two other members, to wit: from Pennsylvania, JOHN ROSS, and from Mississippi, GEORGE POINDEXTER, appeared, produced their credentials, were qualified, and took their seats.

Amelia Island and Galveston.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the House of Representatives:

In compliance with the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 8th of this month, I transmit, for the information of the House, a report from the Secretary of State, with the documents referred to in it, containing all the information of the Executive, which it is proper to disclose, relative to certain persons who lately took possession of Amelia Island and Galveston.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, December 15, 1817.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
December 13, 1817.

The Secretary of State, to whom has been referred the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 8th instant, requesting the President to lay before the House any information he may possess, and think proper to communicate, relative to the proceedings of certain persons who took possession of Amelia Island, at the mouth of St. Mary's River, in the summer of the present year, and made an establishment there; and, relative to a similar establishment previously made at Galveston, has the honor to submit to the President the accompanying papers containing the information received at the respective Departments of State, the Treasury, and the Navy, upon the subjects embraced in the resolution.

The above documents and accompanying papers were ordered to be printed.

Expatriation.

Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana, offered the following resolution to the House:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of providing, by law, for the exercise of the right of expatriation; and that they have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. ROBERTSON said that, for a very considerable length of time, he had wished this question to be decided by that tribunal to whom the decision of it belonged. He had, some years ago, offered a resolution similar to this, which was then not adopted; whether on account of the war in which we were then engaged, or for what other considerations, he had never been able to decide. The question which had arisen during the late war made a decision of it necessary. It would be well recollected, that among the soldiers of the United States were many individuals, natives of Great Britain, who were taken prisoners of war, and, according to the doctrine of the British Government, an odious doctrine, reprobated, he believed, by every other Government, were treated as traitors fighting against their Government; and that, if this construction had been consummated, our Government had menaced severe retaliation. But, with what consistency could the United States take the ground of retaliation, when they themselves had never recognized, in regard to our own citizens, what we demanded of Great Britain in regard to hers? So far as proceedings have been had on this point, Mr. R. said he was led to believe this right had been denied to our citizens. He would not dwell on the particulars of the decision on this subject by Judge Ellsworth, some years ago, but merely state that Isaac Williams, a citizen of the United States, became a citizen of the French Republic, and was thereafter fined and imprisoned, by the decision of our courts, for making war on Great Britain, on the ground that he could not divest himself of the allegiance he owed to the United States. It was certainly proper, he said, that there should be some decision of the Legislature on a question of this nature and magnitude, which, at present, depended on the opinions of the Judiciary; and, as far as acts of Congress can regulate the judicial opinions, that such directions should be given on this head as he thought were obviously just and necessary. He had thought proper to make these remarks, because, although he believed the right to be clear, and that the Government would maintain it, as they ought to do, if they possessed the respect which is professed for the principles of liberty and for civil rights —a decision of the Legislature on the subject was more important at this moment, from considerations growing out of the present relations between the United States and foreign nations. By the existing treaty with Spain, a citizen of the United States, holding a commission under any Government at war with Spain, while we are at peace with her, is considered as a pirate. This extraordinary provision of the treaty must have escaped the attention of that power in our Government which makes treaties, or it would have been rejected, as well for its cruelty, as because it is an act of legislation to define and punish piracies, and not a power confided to the treaty-making authority. To say nothing more of that, however, Mr. R. observed, that he deemed it necessary to protect the citizens of the United States from punishment, due only to piracy, when found with commissions in their hands from any Government at war with Spain. He wished to see our citizens at perfect liberty to become citizens of what nation they chose, on such terms as that nation should prescribe. It would appear, from what he had said, Mr. R. remarked, that there was not that neutrality in our conduct towards the two parties, in the war between Spain and her colonies, which we all profess. In this respect, the parties were certainly not on the same footing; since a citizen of the United States in the employ of Spain against the colonies is not considered as a pirate, but engaged in the service of the colonies against Spain, he is. He did not know that this fact would have induced him to have brought the question before the House, but for the deep impression he felt of the justice and propriety of adopting the principle, abstracted from the existing state of things. But it was the more necessary to reduce the principle to legislation, because of the situation in which the want of it has placed us in regard to foreign nations.

The motion of Mr. ROBERTSON was adopted without opposition, and without a division; and Messrs. ROBERTSON of Louisiana, MASON of Massachusetts, POINDEXTER, ROSS, and FLOYD, were appointed the committee.

Pensions to Sufferers in War.

Mr. HARRISON, of Ohio, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire into the expediency of continuing the pensions which now are or have been heretofore allowed to the widows and orphans of the officers and soldiers who were killed or who died in the service of the late war, for a term of five years beyond the periods at which they shall respectively cease under the existing laws.

Mr. H. said, that, as the resolution only contemplated an inquiry, he would detain the House but a few minutes only, with the motives which induced him at this time to bring it forward. Some of the pensions which had been granted, said he, have already expired, and others will expire, probably, before the session of Congress closes. Amongst the latter is that which was granted to the widow and orphan of the late Brigadier-General Pike. In descending the Ohio River, said Mr. H., the eye of the inquisitive stranger is attracted by the humble dwelling which shelters the widow and orphan of that distinguished hero. Should his curiosity carry him further, and he should be induced to visit the abode of this interesting family, he would find, however humble the exterior, that neatness, frugal hospitality, and comfort, were to be found within its walls—that the lady had expended a proper portion of her pension in the pious purpose of educating her daughter. But, said Mr. H., if the visit should be repeated at the end of a year, and the law which the resolution contemplated should not pass, it would be found that the comforts of which he had spoken had fled, or that the means of procuring them were obtained by the personal exertions of the lady herself. From my knowledge of her situation, said Mr. H., I can state, with confidence, that her dependence for a comfortable support rests on the generosity—no, sir, not on the generosity, but on the justice of this nation; for, can there be, under Heaven, a juster claim than that which is presented by a widow, under such circumstances? In fighting your battles she has lost a husband—he has bled that his country might be great, might be free, might be happy. But our advantage has been to her an insuperable misfortune. It has thrown her

"On the wide world, without that only tie
For which she wished to live, or feared to die."

It is our duty to supply, as far as we can supply, the loss she has sustained. There are other cases, sir, which form the strongest claims upon the justice and the honor of the nation. Let me not be told, said Mr. H., that the Government has performed its contract by giving the five years' pension which was provided at the commencement of the war. Sir, the contract was all on one side, and it would have been immaterial what had been its provisions. The noble spirits of Allen, of Hart, and of Pike, would have met your enemy with as much zeal and devotedness as if the provision for their families had been such as they would have dictated; no personal consideration would have withheld them from the field of glory. But, said Mr. H., there are moments when the claims of nature will have their full effect. I have seen, said he, the wounded and expiring warrior in that awful moment, when the martial ardor which had filled his bosom had been suspended by the pain which he felt—when the sacrifice being made, naught of public duty remained to be performed—then it is, sir, that the thoughts of his family would fill him with the greatest solicitude. A beloved wife and children left friendless and unprotected—the latter without the means of education, and both without support. In such a situation, said Mr. H., I have heard, amidst the fervent aspirations to Heaven for their happiness, a consoling hope expressed that his country would not forsake them. Shall we, sir, not realize that hope? The country, said Mr. H., may be engaged in another war; if it should be the case, let us commence it with the benedictions of the widow and the orphan upon our heads. Let not their prayers ascend to Heaven charged with accusations against your justice and humanity. But, said Mr. H., I am anticipating a thing that cannot happen; the resolution will pass, as will a law that will be reported in obedience to it.

The motion of Mr. HARRISON was not opposed, and was adopted.

Internal Improvements.

Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, from the committee appointed on so much of the President's Message as relates to roads, canals, and seminaries of learning, made a report in part, which was read, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Friday next.

TUESDAY, December 16.

National Flag.

Mr. WENDOVER submitted for consideration the following résolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of altering the flag of the United States, and that they have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. W. said, in submitting this motion, that he should make but few remarks on this subject, not being a novel one; a bill relative thereto having been reported at the last session, but laid over from the pressure of business deemed of more importance. Had the flag of the United States never have undergone an alteration, he certainly should not, he said, propose to make a further alteration in it. But, having been altered once, he thought it necessary and proper that an alteration should now be made. It was his impression, and he thought it was generally believed, that the flag would be essentially injured by an alteration on the same principle as that which had before been made, of increasing the stripes and the stars. Mr. W. stated the incongruity of the flags in general use, (except those in the Navy,) not agreeing with the law, and greatly varying from each other. He instanced the flags flying over the building in which Congress sat, and that at the Navy Yard, one of which contained nine stripes, the other eighteen, and neither of them conformable to the law. It was of some importance, he conceived, that the flag of the nation should be designated with precision, and that the practice under the law should be conformed to its requisitions.

The motion was agreed to without opposition.

WEDNESDAY, December 17.

Another member, to wit, from North Carolina, JOSEPH H. BRYAN appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat.

Estimate of Appropriations.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication from the Treasury Department, which was ordered to be printed, with the accompanying documents:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
December 17, 1817.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith for the information of the House of Representatives, an estimate of the appropriations for the service of the year 1818, amounting to $10,925,191 62, viz:

For the Civil List - - - -	$1,070,708 02
For miscellaneous expenses - -	490,308 51
For intercourse with foreign nations	487,666 64
For the Military Establishment, including arrearages, and Indian department - - - -	6,265,132 25
For the Naval Establishment, including the marine corps - - -	2,611,876 20
	$10,925,191 62

The funds out of which the appropriations for the year 1818 may be discharged, are the following:

1. The sum of six hundred thousand dollars annually reserved by the act of the 4th of August, 1790, out of the duties and customs, towards the expenses of Government.

2. The proceeds of the stamp duties, and the duty on sugar refined within the United States.

3. The surplus which may remain of the customs and internal duties, after satisfying the pledge for which they are pledged and appropriated.

4. Any other unappropriated money which may come into the Treasury during the year 1818.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your most obedient servant,

WM. H. CRAWFORD.

The Honorable the SPEAKER of the House of Representatives.

FRIDAY, December 19.

Another member, to wit, from Delaware, WILLARD HALL, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat.

Surviving Revolutionary Soldiers.

The House having resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill concerning the surviving soldiers of the Revolutionary war,

Mr. BLOOMFIELD delivered his impressions in respect to the operation and scope of this bill. He made a statement to show what were his views of the probable number of applicants under this bill, if it should pass; and the annual amount of the expenditure it would occasion. The Jersey brigade, he said, consisted, during the war, of four regiments; there were forty officers to each regiment, making in the whole one hundred and sixty. On the 4th of July last, as he was enabled from personal knowledge to state, there were living but twenty of those officers, being precisely one-eighth of the whole number. Taking this fact for his guide, as the proportion of survivors, he said, there were in the Continental army sixty-eight battalions, of whom about seventeen thousand men were killed or died in the service; and at the close of the war, it was a well-known fact, the battalions did not average more in each than two hundred and fifty; making in the whole seventeen thousand men—of whom, say about one-tenth (being generally not of as regular habits as the officers) were living; that is, seventeen thousand. Estimating the proportion of applicants for the pension at one-sixth, would make three hundred and forty. The full pay of the Revolution, six and two-thirds dollars per month to each, of these, would amount to $2,295 per month. Of the officers, the whole original number he estimated at two thousand seven hundred and twenty; of whom, supposing one-eighth to have survived, as in the instance of the Jersey brigade, there were now living about one thousand three hundred and forty. Of this number, he supposed one-tenth of the whole would become applicants for pensions—say thirty-four; at the full subaltern Revolutionary pay of seventeen dollars per month, their pensions would amount to $578 per month. The monthly pension for both officers and soldiers, on this estimate, would be $2,873, and the annual amount only $34,376—an amount which must daily decrease. But, instead of full pay pension, the bill, as it now stood, provided only for half pay. Would this House be satisfied, Mr. B. asked, with giving to these men, borne down with age and service, a pension of three and a third dollars a month during the small remainder of their lives, whilst they had given the soldiers of the late war (no disparagement to them) eight dollars per month? He hoped not; and therefore moved to amend the bill so as that the amount of pension should be for every officer seventeen dollars per month, and for every soldier eight.

Mr. COLSTON objected to the qualification of indigence, required by the bill, to entitle the surviving Revolutionary officer and soldier to the benefit of its provision. Let not the soldier, said he, by whose bravery and sufferings we are entitled to hold seats on this floor, be required to expose his poverty to the world, and exhibit the proof of it, to entitle him to relief. The incorporation of such a provision in the bill he considered as degrading to the House. In what light was this bill to be regarded? Was it to be considered as an act of justice? It was less than justice, having suffered these meritorious men to have remained for years unrewarded, to offer to the poor remains of them the right to a pension during life, clogged with such conditions. As an act of beneficence, he should be ashamed to hear it supported on this floor. On this subject, Mr. C. said he hoped a liberal spirit would prevail; and that, for the short remnant of their lives a pension would be given to all who survived of the soldiers of the Revolution.

Mr. ORR accorded fully in the sentiment of Mr. COLSTON. On the first perusal of the bill, he was struck with the thought, what must be the feelings of the high-minded officer of the Revolution, compelled to produce in open court the proofs of his own indigence; and he hoped the House would amend that part of the bill.

Mr. HARRISON, of Ohio, avowed his high respect for the survivors of the Revolution, and his sincere desire to contribute to their comfort in old age. But, he said, the amendment now proposed went too far, because it would embrace every one who had shouldered a musket, even for an hour, during the Revolutionary war. As to those who had seen serious service, so far from having claim to the meed of liberality, the amendment would be but a measure of justice, as no bounty had been accorded to them. Persons, however, covered with scars and borne down by length of service in those days, ought not be confounded with those who had been called out for an hour or a day. Some of the militia, he thought, were as well entitled to this pension as any regulars, of whom the Jersey militia might be particularly mentioned. But he wished to have the operation of the bill limited to such as should have served six months or more.

MONDAY, December 22.

Another member, to wit, from Pennsylvania, ALEXANDER OGLE, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat.

Expatriation.

Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana, from the select committee to whom the subject had been referred, reported a bill providing the manner in which the right of citizenship may be relinquished.

[The bill proposes to provide that when any citizen, by application in writing to the district court of any district of the United States, in open court, and there to be recorded, shall declare that he relinquishes the character of a citizen, and means to depart out of the United States, he shall be thenceforth considered as having exercised the right of expatriation, and as being no longer a citizen of the United States; that such person shall be held as an alien forever after, and shall not resume the rights of citizenship without going through the same process of naturalization as other citizens.]

Surviving Revolutionary Soldiers.

The remainder of this day's sitting was spent in Committee of the Whole, on the bill concerning the surviving officers and soldiers of the Revolution. There was much debate, occasionally eloquent, but generally desultory, on amendments proposed to the bill, but involving also its principles.

Mr. STROTHER said, that he had not intended to trouble the House with any observations upon the passage of this bill; but he could not remain silent, when, by the proposed amendment, a feature was endeavored to be incorporated into it, which, to him, appeared to narrow the operation of the bill, and to strip it, at least, of one moiety of its merit. Is it just, or is it politic, he asked, to discriminate between the Continental line and the State troops, and the militia? What is the professed object of the bill? To provide for the indigent soldiers of the Revolution. What is the feeling or sentiment from which it springs? He said he had hailed the introduction of this bill as an auspicious circumstance—as a gratifying evidence of the re-connection of public feeling with the principles of the Revolution. If gratitude be the feeling or sentiment from which this bill springs, by what principle would you limit and confine it to the Continental line? Is the reason to be found in the bright page of your Revolutionary history, or in what celebrated system of ethics will you find its justification? If, said he, you look to the magnitude of the boon conferred, how awful is the debt of gratitude! Mark this mighty empire arising into existence from peril and from blood, and then sit down, if you can, and, by cool arithmetical calculation, draw a line of discrimination between those who gratuitously bestowed upon you that freedom and that prosperity you now enjoy. But why, said he, shall the militia be excluded the nation's bounty? Did they not assist in the conflict? Did they not, half armed and undisciplined, meet the invading foe, and assist in repelling him from your shores? The battle ground of Guilford speaks their eulogium; Bunker's Hill is the imperishable monument of their valor. If motive gives character to action, the indigent militiaman has the highest claim to the interposition of this Government. That love of liberty and country, which elevates man to his highest destiny, was the sole emulating principle which gave courage to their hearts, and strength to their arms, in the hour of battle. Here were motives as pure, and achievements as brilliant, as illustrate the proudest nations of antiquity. Sir, said Mr. S., it is with the deepest regret that I am driven to the comparison. I would ask that hand to perish, that would snatch one leaf from that laurel that adorns the brow of the Revolutionary Army; but it must be admitted that the Continental army had a mixture and compound motive; the holy flame that then electrified the country no doubt burnt bright in their bosoms; but they were surrounded by all the pride, pomp, and circumstance of glorious war; ambition had his prize in view, and avarice his reward. But why shall this invidious distinction be drawn in our legislative provisions? Let national pride, let national gratitude, obliterate it forever. Length of service, said he, is a criterion of merit equally fallacious and unjust. With the best possible disposition to render services, unfavorable circumstances may doom one soldier to waste his energies in inglorious ease, whilst others, favored by more auspicious fortune, may, within a comparatively short period, have frequently been led to battle, and, by their personal prowess, have contributed to the emancipation of their country. Within the experience of many members of this committee, these facts have occurred, and they are within the observation of all; shall we, then, he asked, with these facts ringing in our ears, and occurring recently before our eyes, admit a principle so deceptive and so inequitable? Sir, said Mr. S., I have viewed this bill in a different light; I have considered it emanating from feelings of mingled respect and sympathy; as a homage paid to that stoic fortitude and heroic courage that reclaimed a hemisphere from slavery; as a tribute of respect to sages who conceived and framed a Government, embracing in its gigantic arms an entire continent, protecting its inhabitants in the enjoyment of freedom and happiness. This House, said he, cannot more appropriately evince these feelings than by rejecting the proposed amendment. All who contributed to build up our magnificent political fabric, should be embraced in the wide circle of gratitude. Permit not him, who, in the pride of vigor and of youth, wasted his health and shed his blood in freedom's cause, with desponding heart and palsied limbs to totter from door to door, bowing his yet untamed soul to melt the frozen bosom of reluctant charity! No, sir, he said, the nation should seek out these noble ruins of that splendid period, and spread its charity around to warm and cheer them into a forgetfulness of their wrongs and their sorrows, in the evening of their days. Mr. S. concluded by remarking, that he flattered himself the amendment would not obtain. The object of the bill seems to connect gratitude and charity, service and distress. The beams of national charity should not be concentrated on the head of the enlisted soldier; the beams of national beneficence should equally visit the domicil of the militiaman, and convey comfort to his fireside.

Indemnity for Slaves.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the report of the Secretary of State on the petitions of Antoine Bienvenu, Peter Lacoste, and Jacques Villeré, citizens of Louisiana, made to the House the following report; which was concurred in by the House:

That the petitions and accompanying documents were, by a resolution of the 29th of January last, referred to the Secretary of State; that the Secretary of State has submitted to the House a report, (hereto annexed,) which the committee beg leave to adopt as a part of their report.

The Committee of Claims would at any time undertake with great diffidence, to discuss principles of national law, or settle questions of conventional right. But at this time it would, in their opinion, be peculiarly indelicate, if not premature, for Congress to adopt any measure whatever. It would seem to them more correct that the subject of the petitions should await the result of a negotiation now pending between the Governments of the United States and Great Britain. They therefore recommend to the House, the following resolution:

Resolved, That the petitioners have leave to withdraw their petitions and documents.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Dec. 12, 1817.

The Secretary of State, to whom, by a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 29th of January last, were referred the petitions of Antoine Bienvenu, Peter Lacoste, and Jacques Villeré, citizens of Louisiana, has the honor of submitting the following report:

The petitioners complain that when the British forces retreated from the Island of Orleans, at the close of the late war, they carried away a considerable number of slaves belonging to them; the restoration of which was, after the ratification of the treaty of peace, demanded by General Jackson, conformably to the first article of that treaty, of the British commanding officer, General Lambert, and by him refused; and they apply to Congress for indemnity for the loss of their property.

Subsequently to the reference of these petitions, a Message from the President to the Senate of the United States, was, on the 7th of February last, transmitted to that body, with all the documents then in the possession of this Department, relating to the subject of these petitions; a printed copy of that Message and of those documents is herewith transmitted, which it is respectfully requested may be received as part of this report. By them it will be seen that a different construction has been given by the British Government to that part of the first article of the Treaty of Ghent, which relates to the restitution of slaves captured during the war, from that contended for by this Government. That, according to their construction, the British Government have not considered themselves bound to make restitution of any of the slaves or other property thus taken and carried away; and that the difference of opinion between the two Governments remaining, after all the amicable discussion between them of which the subject was susceptible, a proposal was made, on the part of the United States, on the 17th of September, 1816, that the question should be referred to the arbitration of some friendly power. To this proposal no answer from the British Government has yet been received. Their attention to it was again invited by the late Minister of the United States in England, before he left London, and has been urged anew in the instructions to his successor.

All which is respectfully submitted,

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

The Case of Mr. Meade.

Mr. TRIMBLE, of Kentucky, offered for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before the House any information he may be able to communicate relative to the impressment and detention of Richard Cowles Meade, a citizen of the United States.

Mr. T. said that, having offered the resolution, it might be expected that he would give some explanation of the case to which it alludes. He had a right to presume that every member of the House had heard of the confinement of Mr. Meade. More than three years ago that gentleman had been incarcerated in a Spanish dungeon, where he had ever since remained. It was within his (Mr. T.'s) recollection, that many persons had expected that the last Congress would have caused an inquiry to be made into the subject; but, since that period, the case had assumed a new character, of most extraordinary complexion. It was well known, he said, that Mr. Meade is a citizen of the United States, and he believed, was, at one time, an accredited Consul, resident in some part of the Spanish dominions. Either character ought to have protected him from violence and outrage. But, unfortunately for him, they did not. The causes which produced his confinement were unknown to Mr. T.—they were probably buried in the vaults of the Inquisition. That, however, was of little consequence, if the facts which he was about to state were true; and that they are true was evinced, he said, by a document which he held in his hand, and which, he said, struck the mind with as much force as if it was marked with the characters of official certainty. I am prepared, said he, to admit, that if a citizen of the United States shall violate the penal or criminal code of any other country, he must submit to the punishment which may be inflicted on him; but such is not the case of Mr. Meade. It was not contended, he said, that the person in question had violated the letter or spirit of any part of the penal or criminal code of Spain—and, on the contrary, the document which he held in his hand afforded the highest evidence that there was no cause of complaint against him. Upon some urgent and vigorous remonstrances being made on this subject by our Minister, Mr. Erving, a public notorious royal order was issued. Mark me, sir, said he—a public notorious royal order, announcing to Spain, to America, and the whole world, that there was no cause for the detention of Mr. Meade, and directing his immediate releasement. How the aching heart of Mr. Meade must have throbbed and swelled, cheered with the prospect of leaving in a few hours his loathsome, pestilential dungeon, to breathe once more the free and wholesome air! How it must have sunk and died within him, when the doors of his "prison house" were unbarred by a meagre minion, who had come skulking through the vaults of those abodes of death, with another secret order! Mark me again, sir—another secret order issued at the same time, under the same royal signature, commanding his keeper to hold the prisoner at his peril. Yes, sir, one order, public and notorious for his releasement, and another secret order for confinement, of the same date, and under the same royal signature. If these facts be true, the case stands without a parallel in ancient or modern times. Even the case of Czerney George has no similitude; he was a monster, executed by the Turk, because he had, in cold blood, plunged his sabre through the heart of his own father. Whereas Mr. Meade is acknowledged to be an innocent victim, suffering under royal displeasure. I will not attempt, said Mr. T., to paint the horrors of a Spanish dungeon, or the sickenings of hope at protracted confinement. It is not my wish to excite public feeling, and I utterly disclaim all intention of connecting this subject with other questions, now under discussion, or which may fall under discussion, between this Government and Spain. Mr. T. averred also that he had entire confidence in the late and present Executive heads of the Government, and had no doubt that every thing which could be done, had been done, in behalf of Mr. Meade. But he held it the duty of this House to inquire into this (he would again call it) extraordinary case, and, if the facts and circumstances shall require it, make such expression of its opinion as will add weight and force to future Executive exertions. If the case were as well-founded as rumor told, he for one, was ready to volunteer his arm in defence of Mr. Meade, and breast the storm, unfearing consequences. For, said he, while I have the honor of a seat in this House, no lawless despot shall lay an angry finger on a fellow-citizen of mine, without the hazard of bringing that finger to the block. He was one of those, he said, who were willing to believe that we ought not, at this time, uselessly to embroil ourselves with any foreign power; and he was thoroughly satisfied that it is our best and wisest policy to husband our resources, our men, and our means, to meet the coming conflict with the only nation that dare strike us upon the land or on the water—the only nation that can send us a Hannibal, or whom we shall revisit with a Scipio—that nation who has already sacked our infant Rome, and whose proud Carthage we shall one day humble in the dust, and sweep with the besom of retributive desolation. But, said he, there are no present circumstances, or looked-for events, that ought to incline us to harden our ears, that we may not hear the calls of a suffering citizen, imploring our protection. Solon, I think it was, upon being asked, "What form of government is best?" replied, "That form in which the smallest insult offered to the meanest citizen is considered an injury to the whole community." Could a better maxim be adopted in a Government like ours? Is there any thing which so exactly accords with the principles of our constitution? This, it is true, is but a single instance of individual oppression; but the outrage done to the personal rights of the victim; the infraction of national law; and the affront, the insult offered to our Government, is exactly the same as if half a million had been incarcerated; for he held that our system of Government is the true poetic chain, which links us together as a band of brothers—and

> "If from that chain a single link you strike, > Ten, or ten thousand, break the chain alike."

We are bound, sir, said Mr. T., under our constitution, to protect the life, liberty, and property, of every citizen of our country. But where may he claim that protection? Or rather, where shall his right to claim it cease? Is it confined to the limits of the Union? or does it not extend to the remotest region of the globe, which is visited by our people? May the citizen claim it against the savages of the Western wilds, and is he not entitled to it among the still more lawless chieftains of a decaying, perishing, and ruined monarchy? It is not in this land of liberty that the citizen need call for protection; here it comes, as it were, unbidden, to encompass him about; but when oppression falls upon him in a foreign land, among strangers, friendless, and unprotected, his supplicating voice should not be heard in vain; for every thing which is obligatory in the social compact, or honorable in humanity, calls for and commands your protection, as if he stood upon the sacred soil that gave him birth. Who of us, said Mr. T., in the condition of Mr. Meade, would not ask this inquiry of this House? Which of us will refuse it? For the honor of my country, I hope there is not one.

The motion of Mr. T. was agreed to without opposition or further debate.

Revolutionary Survivors.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill concerning the surviving officers and soldiers of the Revolutionary war.

The debate continued on the main subject and on the proposed amendment of Mr. HARRISON. In this debate, Messrs. BLOOMFIELD, S. SMITH, HARRISON, COLSTON, BALDWIN, CLAGETT, HOPKINSON, RHEA, ROSS, and INGHAM, bore part.

The amendment proposed by Mr. HARRISON, was ultimately rejected; as also was a previous question for the rising of the committee, in order to postpone the subject.

The committee then went on further to amend the bill, on suggestion of various members. In the proposition and discussion of these amendments, Messrs. PETER, BLOOMFIELD, LIVERMORE, PARRIS, RHEA, BENNETT, BEECHER, HARRISON, TERRY, FORSYTH, SMITH of North Carolina, TAYLOR of New York, TALLMADGE, WHITMAN, CLAGETT, PALMER, and STORER, took part.

Among the successful motions, was one by Mr. PARRIS, to include the "officers and mariners who served in the navy of either of the States, or of the United States," thus placing the Revolutionary officers of the navy on the same footing as those of the army.

The Committee of the Whole rose, about four o'clock, and reported the bill as amended.

The House took up the amendments reported by the committee; when various propositions were successively made and discussed, to disagree to or amend many of them.

The House having at length gone through the amendments, the bill was ordered to be engrossed, as amended, nem. con., and read a third time to-morrow.

WEDNESDAY, December 24.

Surviving Revolutionary Patriots.

The bill providing for certain surviving officers and soldiers of the Revolutionary Army was read a third time.

A motion was made by Mr. LOWNDES to recommit the bill to a Committee of the Whole House, with instructions "to limit the benefit of the act to soldiers who were enlisted for a term of three years, or for the war, and who did not desert; and to officers who continued in the service of the United States to the conclusion of the war in 1783, or were left out of the service in consequence of disability, or in consequence of some derangement of the Army."

The question being stated on thus recommitting the bill, Mr. EDWARDS moved to amend the said instructions by striking out the words "three years," and to insert in lieu thereof the words "one year."

And the question being taken thereon, it was decided in the affirmative.

The question was then taken on the final passage of the bill, and decided in the affirmative without a division.

MONDAY, December 29.

Appointment of Members to Office.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 12th of this month, requesting to be informed whether any, and which of the Representatives, in a list thereto annexed, have held offices since the 4th of March last, designating the offices, the times of appointment and acceptance, and whether they were at that time so held, or when they had been resigned, I now transmit a report from the Secretary of State, which contains the information desired.

JAMES MONROE.

DECEMBER 29, 1817.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Dec. 26, 1817.

The resolution of the House of Representatives of the 12th of this month, requesting the President to communicate to that House whether any, and which of the Representatives named in the list thereto annexed, have held offices since the 4th of March last, designating the offices, the times of appointment and acceptance, and whether they were at that time so held, or when they had been resigned, having been referred to this department, the Secretary has the honor respectfully to report to the President as follows:

John Holmes, of Massachusetts, Commissioner under the 4th article of the Treaty of Ghent, appointed 16th February, 1816, resigned 24th November, 1817.

Samuel Herrick, of Ohio, Attorney of the United States, appointed 19th December, 1810, resigned 29th November, 1817.

Daniel Cruger, of New York, postmaster at Bath, appointed 29th June, 1815, resigned 1st December, 1817.

Elias Earle, of South Carolina, postmaster at Centreville, appointed in April, 1815, resigned 12th June, 1817.

Thomas H. Hubbard, of New York, postmaster at Hamilton, appointed 11th March, 1813, resigned 23d October, 1817.

Samuel C. Crafts, of Vermont, principal assessor for the sixth Collection district, appointed 4th January, 1815, resigned 5th June, 1817.

George Robertson, of Kentucky, principal assessor for the seventh Collection district, appointed 4th January, 1815, resigned 5th June, 1817.

George Mumford, of North Carolina, principal assessor for the tenth Collection district. No resignation has been received from Mr. Mumford.

Levi Barber, of Ohio, receiver of public moneys at Marietta, appointed 3d March, 1807, resigned 1st December, 1817.

John F. Parrott, of New Hampshire, naval officer for the district of Portsmouth, appointed 23d April, 1816, resigned 15th November, 1817.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Referred to the Committee of Elections.

Commutation Bill.

The House, on motion of Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, resumed the consideration of the bill to commute the bounty lands of the soldiers of the late army. The question being on concurring in the amendments reported to the House by the Committee of the Whole—

Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana, rose for the purpose of offering an amendment, which would essentially change the features of the bill; in doing which, he entered somewhat into an examination of the merits of the principle of the commutation, which he decidedly approved. This amendment, in substance, authorizes every soldier, on surrendering his warrant at the land office to be cancelled, to receive a certificate of the quantity of land surrendered; and where patents have issued, the patentee to surrender his patent to the Commissioner of the General Land Office within —— months after the passage of this act, in order to avail himself of the provisions thereof, and deposit at the same time an affidavit that he has not transferred or sold such patent to any person whatever, and receive a certificate therefor; and for these certificates such soldier or his agent shall receive certificates of stock bearing an interest of six per cent. per annum, redeemable at the pleasure of the Government, or within five years, at the rate of one dollar per acre for the land for which the warrant or patent has been surrendered, &c. Mr. R. thought the bill important, both as it regarded the soldier and the United States, but infinitely more important to the interest of the latter. It was all-important, he argued, that these lands should be taken out of the hands of speculators, and be redeemed by the nation. His amendment offered conditions to the soldier much more liberal, at the same time that it would be more convenient to the Government than the provisions of the present bill. The interest of both parties would be preserved, and the community rescued from that speculation which would, without this bill, certainly take place. Mr. R. dwelt some time on the policy of this measure—the expediency of which he illustrated by several arguments—and on the advantages of the change which he proposed in the bill.

The amendment offered by Mr. R. having been read—

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, the proposed amendment was ordered to be printed, and the whole subject to lie on the table.

Georgia Militia Claims.

On motion of Mr. COBB, of Georgia, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill providing for the payment of the claims of certain detachments of the militia of Georgia, for services in defence of that State, in the years 1793 and 1794.

Mr. COBB observed, that the filling the blank necessarily involved the merits of the bill, for that, before the committee could be required to fill the blank with a certain sum, they should be satisfied whether any thing was due. He hoped he should be able satisfactorily to convince the committee of the justice of the claim, and that the sum proposed was the proper amount to be appropriated.

Mr. C. said, that the pacification of the Indian tribes, which was anticipated by the treaties made with them between the years 1787 and 1792, was not accomplished. In the year 1792, the tribes upon the Northwestern frontiers of the United States, from British intrigues, as was then and yet is believed, assumed an attitude of widely extended hostility. Nor was it long before their threatenings terminated in a war, so dreadful in its character, that the people of the Northwest yet have cause to remember it with grief and sorrow. The tribes upon the frontiers of the State of Georgia, as savage in their character, and more formidable in point of numbers, were not much less inclined to hostility. They were subject to the same influence which had been exercised upon their Northern brethren, aided by that of Spain, with which power the United States were at that time in warm dispute, about the navigation of the Mississippi River, and for other causes. The intrigues of Spain were at that time well known, and scarcely denied, as the public documents of the day amply testify. Of this, any gentleman could satisfy himself by consulting the volume of secret documents, lately published. From these causes, Mr. C. said, in the years 1792–'3, the situation of the inhabitants upon the Western frontiers of Georgia, was alarming to an indescribable degree. Suffice it to say, as had once before been said upon the same subject, that the peaceable citizen knew not, when he retired to repose, that he would ever awake; or, if he did, that he might not be roused by the horrid yells of the savage warwhoop, and but to behold his helpless family the bleeding victims of the Indian tomahawk and scalping knife.

It was not to be expected that the Executive of Georgia would calmly behold the blood-chilling scenes of murder and depredation, at that time but commencing upon the frontiers of the State. Had he done so, he would have merited and received the curses of his countrymen and posterity. Fortunately, the Executive chair of the State was then filled by one who was ever feelingly alive to the sufferings of his fellow-citizens. He now reposes in the grave! But his virtues and his patriotism are yet remembered, and his loss deplored. I allude, said Mr. C., to the late Governor Telfair.

Early in the year 1792, he made the necessary communications to the War Department. On the 27th of October of that year, the Secretary at War, by letter, gave him a most ample discretionary power, as the extract following will show: "If the information you may receive, shall substantiate clearly any hostile designs of the Creeks against the frontiers of Georgia, you will be pleased to take the most effectual measures for the defence thereof, which may be in your power, and which the occasion may require." It is impossible that words better suited to conferring an ample discretionary power could have been used. The Governor of Georgia is constituted the judge of the danger and of the amount of the force. The state of the frontiers required that such a power should be conferred, at that particular time, and it was conferred. It was necessary, because of the uncertainty of the extent to which the Indians would carry their hostility. It was necessary, because of the difficulty, and trouble, and expense, of bringing a militia force into action, none of which should be encountered, if to be avoided without danger.

In acting under this power, the Executive of Georgia acted with caution and prudence. The power was conferred in October, 1792. From that time, until the month of April, 1793, the dangers increased, and acts of depredation and murder multiplied on the frontiers. Longer delay of action would have been criminal. On the 23d of April, 1793, Governor Telfair addressed the following letter to John Habersham, then the agent of the United States for furnishing supplies in Georgia: "Sir, the very critical situation to which the frontier settlers are reduced, from the late murders and depredations committed by the Indians, renders it indispensable that means be taken to guard against their inroads. I have made the communications to the War Department, and, in the interim, have to request your issuing orders to the contractors to provide rations for such part or parts of the militia of this State as may be called into service, to be furnished at the several stations and places of rendezvous. In order that you may be informed how far such a measure is correspondent with the system adopted by the General Government, I herewith furnish a certified copy of a clause of a letter from the Secretary of War, dated 27th October, 1892," (the one already read,) "on the subject of Indian affairs." Upon the receipt of this letter, with the extract referred to, the agent, Mr. Habersham, had not a doubt as to the powers of the Governor. He conceived them to be so ample, so unbounded indeed, that he did not hesitate a moment to give to the Governor an assurance, that his requisition for supplies should meet with prompt attention. The reply of Mr. Habersham, dated on the same 23d of April, will at once prove this. "Being of opinion," says he, "that I shall be justified by the aforesaid clause in doing so, I shall immediately give directions to the contractor, who is now here, to furnish supplies to such of the militia as may be drawn out under the sanction of your Excellency, and will communicate the same to the Secretary of War, and the commanding officer of the federal troops in this State without delay." Under this power, and under these arrangements with the officers of the United States, the Governor of Georgia proceeded to call the militia into service. Need it be again said, how properly?

Mr. C. said that it was greatly to be regretted that the pay-rolls, which only would afford evidence of the precise force called into the field, and their time of service, had been destroyed in the conflagration of the public buildings in this city by the British in the year 1814. He was happy, however, to have it in his power to assure the committee, that, from information which he had received, and which he was disposed to credit, a duplicate of the pay-rolls was yet in existence in the State of Georgia. For all the purposes of correct legislation, there was sufficient evidence to be found in certain estimates, which have not been destroyed, and which were calculated from the pay-rolls before their destruction. From these the names of most of the officers, with the number (without the names) of their men, and the length of their terms of service, could be ascertained. The estimates, together with a letter from the Secretary at War to the Governor of Georgia, show that, at one period, there were from eight hundred to one thousand two hundred militia in the field. The estimates also proved the fact, that the militia were mostly detached for short terms of service, and were discharged when the danger of the frontiers no longer required their services.

Even upon the supposition, that the full number of twelve hundred men had been kept in service from April, 1793, until June, 1794, (at which day they were disbanded,) he thought that he should be able to show to the committee, that the force was not disproportioned to the danger which threatened. The frontiers of the State of Georgia extended along the borders of two nations of Indians, at that time equally hostile. The whole extent of the exposed frontier was upwards of four hundred miles, from the Tugeloo River around the western parts of the State, to the mouth of the St. Mary's River. It is well known, that all that British and Spanish intrigues could do, was done to excite both these nations to a war. North Carolina, South Carolina, and the territory which has since been created into the State of Tennessee, were engaged in an active war, as well of defence as invasion, with the Cherokees and Upper Creeks, to whose ravages the upper parts of the State of Georgia were equally as much or more exposed. On the southern frontier were the Lower Creeks, who had already commenced the work of death and slaughter. The frontier, in its whole length, was but thinly inhabited. Add to all these considerations the fact, that the Governor of Georgia was confined to defensive operations only, and was restricted from prosecuting the war by invading the Creek nation. The fact will be learned from the letter of the Secretary of War to the Governor of Georgia, dated the 30th May, 1793. Had the wishes of Governor Telfair been attended to, upon this subject—had he been permitted to carry the war into the heart of the enemies' country, as he one time prepared to do, and by which only can an Indian war be effectually terminated, this application for so large a sum would not now be made at the hands of Congress. From this measure he was however turned by the positive orders of the War Department in September, 1793. But, under all these circumstances, Mr. C. thought that the committee would be convinced, that a less force than the one employed, would have been ineffectual even for the purpose of invasion; and he thought that any one, at all acquainted with Indian warfare, would be convinced, that it would be less effectual for defence. He was also willing to submit to the committee, whether the Governor of Georgia exercised the discretion and the power conferred upon him in an incautious or imprudent manner.

Soon after the militia was called into service, the power of the Governor of Georgia was suspended, by a letter addressed to him from the Secretary of War, dated on the 30th May, 1793. This letter is of the most extraordinary character. It declared, "that, from considerations of policy, at this critical period, relative to foreign powers, and the pending treaty with the northern Indians, it is deemed advisable to avoid, for the present, offensive expeditions into the Creek country. But, from the circumstances of the late depredations on the frontiers of Georgia, it is thought expedient to increase the force in that quarter for defensive purposes. The President, therefore, authorizes your Excellency to call into and keep in service in addition to the regular force stationed in Georgia, (which at that time could not have exceeded one hundred, and were of no use,) one hundred horse and one hundred foot, to be employed under the orders of Colonel Gaither, in repelling inroads, as circumstances shall require." One hundred horse and one hundred foot to repel the inroads of two of the most savage and warlike tribes of Indians upon the whole continent, on a frontier extending upwards of four hundred miles! Sir, said Mr. C., the destruction and overthrow of such a force would have been but a pastime with the tribes. But it is not now my design to question the propriety of this policy. Before, however, the order could be executed, and the troops disbanded, on the 10th day of June, 1793, only ten days thereafter, the Executive of the United States seems to have been sensible of its impropriety, and accordingly, in a letter to the Governor of Georgia, he says—"The State of Georgia being invaded, or in imminent danger thereof, the measures taken by your Excellency may be considered indispensable. You are the judge of the danger, and will undoubtedly proportion the defence to exigencies. The President, however, expresses his confidence, that as soon as the danger which has induced you to call out so large a body of troops, shall have subsided, that you will reduce the troops to the existing state of things, indeed to the number mentioned in my letter of the 30th ultimo, duplicates of which have been forwarded, provided the safety of the frontiers will admit the measure." If any doubts could have existed of the power given to the Governor of Georgia, before the receipt of this letter, they were put to rest thereafter. By this, he was expressly made the judge of the degree of danger, and of the number and extent of the force. It contains an acknowledgment of the fact, that a large body of troops had been called into service, but considers the measure as having been indispensable. It expresses a hope that the force will be reduced, yet leaving the Governor to judge when the safety of the frontiers will admit the reduction to take place.

After the receipt of this letter the Governor could not have mistaken his powers. To afford complete evidence, however, of this fact, Mr. C. called the attention of the committee to a letter of the same date, (10th June, 1793,) from the War Department to the Governor of South Carolina, in which he is requested, "that, in case the frontiers of Georgia should be seriously invaded by large bodies of Indians, he would, upon the request of the Governor of Georgia, direct such parts of the militia of South Carolina to march to the assistance of Georgia, as the case might require; for the expenses of which the United States would be responsible." Here again is the Governor of Georgia recognized, as being the judge of the necessity of the call, and clothed with power of making the request of the Executive of South Carolina. But, it also contains evidence of another fact, that the detachment of the force by the order, or at the request of the Governor of Georgia, was at the expense of the United States.

The report of the committee at this session, upon the claim, says, that there is no evidence that this power was conclusively withdrawn from the Governor of Georgia, until February, 1794. There is, however, a letter of the 19th July, 1793, which Mr. Dearborn, Secretary at War, in his report, seems to think contained in it enough to amount to an order, withdrawing the power. This letter was sent by Constant Freeman, who had gone to the State of Georgia as agent of the War Department, for the express purpose of superintending all matters in which that department was concerned on that frontier. This letter contains an express order. Although the Secretary at War must have been apprised of the Governor's proceedings to a period as late as June, 18th, of which date he acknowledges to have received letters from the Governor, yet does he bestow no censure for measures already adopted. His power is not withdrawn. The judgment and discretion which he had previously been required to exercise, was not questioned. On the contrary, from the month of September, 1793, until February, 1794, although the Department must have known the numbers and proceedings of the militia, no order was sent to disband the men. On the 22d February, 1794, a positive order was sent, and before 1st of June thereafter, the whole force called out, except certain specified corps, were dismissed. Even this order contains an expression, significant of the belief of the War Department, that the United States were liable for the expenses of the militia in service previous to that time. For it declares, that the United States would not, thereafter, be pledged for the expenses. This can mean nothing else than that the United States held themselves previously pledged; especially as, until that period, the issue of supplies of provisions had never been prohibited. That the Governor of Georgia did not consider his powers withdrawn is evident. The militia were retained until Governor Telfair went out of office, and for some months after Governor

Matthews came into it. Even if the letter of 19th July, 1793, should be considered as an order to discharge the force called out, yet another argument in favor of this claim is to be derived from these facts. The claim is made by the individual persons performing the services, and not by the State. The Governor had power from the General Government to call them into service in the first instance. It was the duty of the militiaman to obey—it did not belong to him to call for the orders issued to his superiors, that he might judge whether his superiors had pursued them; nor ought he to be deprived of his pittance of pay, if his superiors have either neglected or exceeded their orders. If the power by which he was called out was, in the first instance, sufficient, his retention in services is not his fault, nor should he be the loser.

Titles of Nobility.

Mr. EDWARDS offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before this House information of the number of States which have ratified the 13th article of the amendments to the Constitution of the United States, proposed at the second session of the 11th Congress, [prohibiting any citizen of the United States from accepting or retaining any title of nobility, pension, office, or emolument, without the consent of Congress, from any foreign Prince or Power, &c.]

Mr. EDWARDS stated that his motion was induced by some doubts whether the article referred to had been ratified by a sufficient number of the States to make it a part of the constitution, although it appeared as such, he perceived, in the copies printed for the use of the members of the House; and it was desirable that a fact so important should be placed beyond question. The motion was agreed to without opposition.

Pensions to Wounded Officers.

The following resolution, submitted by Mr. COMSTOCK, was read and committed to the Committee of the Whole to which is committed the resolutions submitted by Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, on the 9th of December last:

Resolved, That it is expedient to provide, by law, for placing on the pension list the officers of the Army who have been wounded in battle during the late war with Great Britain.

Mr. COMSTOCK said he did not rise to say much on the resolution he had just had the honor to present. He did not think the occasion required him to go into the subject at any considerable length. But he deemed some explanation of the motives which had induced him to this measure, due to the subject, to the House, and to himself. He hoped, therefore, to be indulged while he proceeded to make a few observations. The House, he said, had not yet to learn that wounded officers of the Army were not placed on the pension list by common usage and design. If a contrary practice had, in a few instances, obtained, as he was informed it had, and some wounded officers of the Army were found on the pension-roll, the fact could be accounted for only in this way: A few wounded officers had availed themselves of the pension laws before the reduction of the Army, shortly after the close of the war. When this reduction was made, a very small number of these were retained in service; no reference having, he presumed, been had, on this occasion, to the list of pensioners. Mr. Speaker, said Mr. C., the services and sufferings of the Revolutionary officers and soldiers have ever been duly appreciated by the people and by their Representatives. It would be casting a dishonorable imputation upon the virtuous and enlightened citizens of the United States, to suppose that they could be unconscious of the exalted merit of those who have endured for them nakedness, starvation, and toil, and braved so many dangers in fighting their battles. Nor did they brave only the dangers of the field; they subjected themselves to the fate of rebels, had the contest been disastrous. Their conduct must have called down upon them the unmingled fury of the regal Government under which they were held. It is true, indeed, said he, that the Revolutionary officers and soldiers have not, in all cases, been sufficiently rewarded. This has been owing partly to the want of means in the Government, and partly, he feared, to an improper procrastination. But I rejoice, said Mr. C., that the day of retribution has at length arrived. On the recommendation of a President whose blood was freely shed in the arduous contest which established our independence, and inspired with the sentiments and feelings of the venerable reporter and advocate of a bill to reward the few survivors of that contest, we are about to accord to them that assistance which they need, and to which they are entitled by every principle of justice and of gratitude. Mr. C. said he anxiously improved this auspicious period in our history, to invite the House to the subject in question. Mr. Speaker, continued he, it will be recollected that a proposition was made a few sessions since, to bestow a gratuity in land upon the officers of the late army, according to their respective grades.

Some honorable gentlemen were, at that time, unwilling to confer this gratuity, without discrimination, upon those officers who entered the Army just before the termination of hostilities, and who had been constantly employed in the recruiting service, as well as upon those who had endured the privations and perils of the field, in rendering long and signal service to their country. None were found, I believe, said Mr. C., that felt disposed to withhold the bounty of their Government from the latter class of officers; all were ready to reward exalted merit. For myself, said he, it would ever gratify the finest feelings of my heart to aid the passage of any law necessary to do them justice. This, however, said he, may be considered a digression; he merely suggested it to show that no such objection could be sustained against the resolution, or against a bill of which it might be the foundation. The wounded officers of your army have manifested the physical and moral qualities necessary in the soldier. They have largely shared the sufferings and dangers incident to their profession. They have not wasted their time in the pleasures of the ball-room, and in the amusements of fashionable circles, remote from fatigue, alarm, and conflicts. They have relinquished their employments and professions, sacrificed their means of acquiring wealth, and, foregoing the endearments of domestic life, have sought the tented field. They have met your enemy, trodden the bloody arena, sustained your eagles, and achieved victory in the jaws of death. They have borne from the plain of battle the laurels of conquest, but have returned, seamed with scars, disfigured by frightful wounds, or deprived of their limbs. In these consist their pretensions as soldiers. In these they exhibit the mournful, yet proud, monuments of their valor and devotion to their country. When contemplating this subject, said Mr. C., a number of names are presented to my view, which I will beg leave to pronounce in your hearing. Among the wounded officers of your army, I behold the names of Majors Larabee, Wetmore, and Birdsall, with Lieutenants Shaler and Wilcox. Major Larabee lost his left arm at the battle of Brownstown, under the command of General Miller. This General, distinguished in so many engagements, I leave, said Mr. C., to the pen of the faithful historian; suffice it to say that his fame is more imperishable than brass or marble. The sensation which the battle of Brownstown produced throughout the Union can never be forgotten. Our affairs, at that time, wore rather an unfavorable aspect. When dangers thickened around his Spartan band, their unconquerable spirit rose commensurate with the crisis. They manifested a contempt for danger, and an invincible determination to conquer or to die. They attacked and routed the allied forces of the enemy, drove them from their lodgments, and left the field in triumph. Some of our countrymen were slain; but with the loss of an arm Major Larabee survived, and has ever since continued in the service. The amputation of his limb has not lessened his usefulness. The reports of the Army sufficiently evince his active service. Major Wetmore lost his right arm, in a bold and dangerous enterprise, on the Niagara station, in the first campaign, under the command of an honorable gentleman of this House. Though he has lost a most useful member, he has lost none of that proud sensibility which characterizes the American soldier. He has constantly served, with honorable distinction, in various capacities in the Army. I think, said Mr. C., that I was introduced to this young man when he could reach to me his right hand in the salutation of friendship; but this he can do no more forever. Major Birdsall was dreadfully wounded in the face when the night assault was made on Fort Erie. It had become his duty to dislodge the enemy from the momentary possession of that bastion which was afterwards blown up. A few moments after this awful catastrophe, when he was standing on a twenty-four pounder, very near this fatal spot, dispensing orders to his troops, and cheering them to victory, a ball entered his mouth, carried off almost one-half of his lower jaw, and lodged in the lateral and hinder part of the neck. It has, very recently, been extracted. Language cannot express the sufferings he had sustained. Repeated and extensive ulcerations had supervened. The left shoulder, from the continuity of its parts with those wounded and ulcerated, had fallen below its natural position. The dressings for the wound must be removed and renewed several times a day; certainly as often as food is taken, and sometimes more frequently. The constant oozing of the saliva, through the unclosed wound, soon wets not only the dressings, but also the collar and cravat. But, sir, said Mr. C., I must not be too technical and minute in description upon this occasion. We see, however, that sufferings, expense, and trouble have not driven Major Birdsall from the service. He continues, with his acknowledged zeal and ability, to discharge its duties with universal approbation. With Lieutenants Shaler and Wilcox, who were wounded in the campaign of 1814, I have not, said he, the pleasure to be acquainted, nor do I know their particular history. But they are in the Army; and their wounds clearly indicate that they have sought the post of honor, and challenged the esteem and reward of their country. The former has lost his left, and the latter his right arm.

But, Mr. Speaker, the allowing of an officer pay and pension at the same time, may be conceived inadmissible. It may be said, that an officer entitled to a full pension according to his rank, must be totally disabled, and by consequence incompetent to afford sufficient service to his country. Mr. C. said, the words "total disability," used in the pension laws, are indefinite in their meaning. The phrase, he said, was obviously relative. If the words were taken in their most extensive and unqualified sense, they would import death itself, or something approaching near that state. For, if a man possessed only a very small share of corporeal and mental power, he could exercise it in some way towards procuring a livelihood. Nevertheless, an officer deprived of an arm, leg, or eye, is totally disabled in the view of the laws, judging from the interpretation they have received in practice, and is therefore entitled to a full pension, in proportion to his grade. But will it be contended that these injuries, essential as they are, disqualify an officer to discharge the duties devolved upon him? I trust not, sir, said Mr. C. I do not conceive that the being able to shoulder a barrel of cider, or to chop off logs, is an important qualification in an officer. Lord Nelson did not possess the physical ability necessary to accomplish such things when he fought those battles that have ranked him among the most illustrious of naval heroes, and gilded the pages of British history.

Sir, said Mr. C., would a pension make the condition of the officers I have named more eligible than if they had never been wounded? Surely not. What value shall be put on the wounds of these officers? What is the amount of the inconvenience, expense, and torture, which they have borne, and continue to sustain? Would they have bartered their active limbs for a pension? No, sir; they risked more than their limbs, when, inspired by nobler motives, they took up arms and fought for their country! Their talents and good conduct have continued them in the Army. They are able to serve you in peace or in war; and, should you place them on the pension roll, how can it be shown that this act of sheer justice ought to exclude them from a participation in military employment and promotion?

Mr. Speaker, the war is ended; the din of arms does not continue to salute our ears; our eyes are no longer pained with beholding garments rolled in blood. We are prone to forget these things; but the wounded soldier, and those who depend on him for protection and support, have much reason to remember them. Though our wounded officers of the Army are not disqualified for military service, their habits, and the loss of former business and employments, have disqualified them for other pursuits.

Mr. Speaker, let us accord honor and assistance to the brave!

> "All things are common, but the warrior's fame:
> That glows eternal in the mouths of men."

In anniversary orations and songs we are called "a band of brothers." Let us evince by our conduct the sincerity of our fraternal affection. I am unwilling to join in these professions, if they are unmeaning. It is not enough to say to a naked and hungry brother, "Be thou clothed and fed." Tears of sympathy should bedew our cheeks, and streams of munificence should issue from our hands. Sir, said Mr. C., it is not among the least blessings of a republican Government, that its burdens are equally borne, and its advantages equally enjoyed. Let us, Mr. Speaker, do equal and exact justice to every class of citizens. Then our free institutions, based in the affections of the people, shall manifest to the latest ages the memorials of Columbian wisdom and valor. I hope, said Mr. C., that the resolution will be referred, and that something may result from it beneficial to the wounded officers of the Army, and honorable to the nation. I hope that Government will at least place them above embarrassment, and enable them to support themselves, and those whom Providence may have committed to their care and protection. It must gratify every benevolent heart to see the children of the wounded defenders of their country's rights enjoying those social advantages which the gallantry of their fathers has nobly contributed to secure and perpetuate.

Ohio Contested Election.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, from the Committee on Elections, to whom was referred the petition of C. Hammond, contesting the election of Mr. HERRICK, a member of this House from the State of Ohio, on the ground of his having held an office under the United States, subsequent to the fourth day of March last, made a report; which was read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole. The report is as follows:

That on the 19th December, 1810, Mr. Herrick was appointed Attorney of the United States for the district of Ohio, which office he accepted, and held until his resignation thereof, on the 29th November, 1817. In October, 1816, he was elected one of the Representatives of the State of Ohio for the Fifteenth Congress. The result of the election was publicly announced on the 7th January, 1817, in the presence of the Senate of that State. On the 15th September, 1817, the Governor executed a certificate of Mr. Herrick's election, according to the law of Ohio, which was received by him on or about the 30th day of the same month. Mr. Herrick, therefore, continued in office almost nine months after the fourth of March last, and two months after receiving the certificate of his election. It does not appear, on the part of the memorialist, and it is denied, on the part of Mr. Herrick, that he performed any act as Attorney of the United States, after the said 30th September. He, however, continued in office, was liable to perform its duties, and was entitled to its salary, until his resignation. Congress met December 1, 1817, and Mr. Herrick took his seat on that day in the House of Representatives.

The 6th section of the first article of the constitution provides that "no person holding any office under the United States shall be a member of either House, during his continuance in office." The incompatibility is not limited to exercising an office, and at the same time, being a member of either House of Congress; but it is equally extended to the case of holding; that is, having, keeping, possessing, or retaining an office under such circumstances. If the membership of Mr. Herrick commenced either on the 4th of March or the 30th of September, 1817, he has vacated that membership by holding an office incompatible therewith.

We do not find that the question of incompatibility has been agitated in the House of Representatives on more than two occasions. The first case was that of John P. Van Ness, which occurred during the second session of the Seventh Congress. The Committee of Elections were then instructed to inquire whether Mr. Van Ness, one of the Representatives from the State of New York, had not, after his election, and after he had occupied a seat of a member, accepted and exercised the office of a major of militia, under the authority of the United States, within the Territory of Columbia. Mr. Van Ness freely admitted the fact, as alleged, and thereupon the House unanimously resolved that he had thereby forfeited his right to a seat as a member of the House.

The other case was that of Philip Barton Key, decided at the first session of the Tenth Congress. Mr. Key's seat was impeached, among other grounds, upon this: that, at the time of his election, and until a few days, either before or after he took his seat, he held, from the British Government, in his own right and name, the half-pay pension of a captain of infantry. The facts were briefly these: Mr. Key served as an officer in the British army, without the limits of the United States, from 1778 until 1783, when the corps to which he belonged was disbanded, and the officers placed on half-pay. The pension was paid, either for the benefit of himself or his assignee, until the month of December, 1805, when he received six months' half-pay: in January, 1806, he wrote to his agent in London, directing him to resign his claim to half-pay, and also to rank, if any could be supposed to exist; but it did not appear that any thing had been done in pursuance of that letter, nor indeed that it ever had been received by his agent.

On the 6th of October, 1806, Mr. Key was elected a Representative of the State of Maryland, for two years, commencing on the fourth of March, 1807. On the 24th of October following, he addressed a letter to Mr. Erskine, then His Britannic Majesty's Ambassador at Washington, referring to the letter written to his agent, and repeating his resignation in a formal manner. This letter was not delivered to Mr. Erskine until the 28th or 29th of October, which was two or three days after the meeting of Congress, and after Mr. Key had taken his seat in the House of Representatives. Upon these facts the House decided that Mr. Key was entitled to his seat.

In regard to the several cases of Messrs. Turner, Dawson, and others, mentioned in the answer marked C, filed by Mr. Holmes, on the part of Mr. Herrick, we think a single remark sufficient. It does not appear that the House of Representatives was made acquainted with the existence of these cases. It cannot, therefore, be considered to have acquiesced in that of which it was ignorant.

The decisions of the House of Commons, under the statutes 5 William and Mary, chap. 7; 11 William III., chap. 2; and 12 and 13 William III., chap. 10, may serve to shed some light upon the subject under consideration. The first of these statutes enacts that no member of the House of Commons shall, at any time, be concerned, directly or indirectly, or any other in trust for him, in the framing, collecting, or managing any of the duties granted by that or any future act of Parliament, except the commissioners of the Treasury, and the officers and commissioners for managing the customs and excise. The second act extends the disqualification to officers of the excise, declaring them incapable of sitting, voting, or acting as members; and the last mentioned act applies the same provisions to all officers of the customs.

Many members of the House of Commons were, at different times, expelled for violations of these statutes; but the facts are reported in terms so general, that it is impossible in most cases to determine whether the offence was committed before or after the member took his seat in the House. We find, however, two cases where the particulars are stated. The first case was decided on the 13th February, 1698, under the act above mentioned of the 5 William and Mary. It is the case of Mr. Montagu; and it is stated as follows by Hatsell, in his precedents of proceedings in the House of Commons. The new Parliament was made returnable on the 24th of August, 1698, and was directed to sit for the despatch of business on the 29th of November. Mr. Montagu had been a commissioner of stamp duties, but, in the commission which passed in September, 1698, he was left out; it appeared that he had acted under the former commission till the 4th of October, 1698. But, having informed the House that he did not qualify himself as a member till the 29th of November, and so conceived himself not to be within the law, he is, upon the question, called in to take his place, and a committee is appointed to draw up and state the matter of fact. It does not appear that the committee ever made report.

The other case is reported as follows: On the 5th of February, 1708, Sir Richard Allen was, on the hearing of his petition, declared to be duly elected for Dunwich. On the 7th of February he surrenders an office in the customs for life, to which he had been appointed in May, 1678. On the 8th of February this surrender is enrolled, and on the 9th of February he desires the sense of the House, before he takes his seat, on the clause of the 12 and 13 of William III., chap. 10, which relates to the officers of the customs; and, upon reading the letters patent and surrender, he is permitted to take his seat.

Persons elected to the House of Commons become at one time members for certain purposes, and at another time for other purposes. Thus, immediately upon executing the indenture of return by the sheriff or other returning officer, the person elected becomes entitled to the privilege of franking, although the day at which the Parliament is made returnable may not have arrived. Yet he is not a member, for he may thereafter be a candidate for election in another district, at any time before the Parliament is made returnable, and the return actually filed in the Crown Office. From the time last mentioned, he becomes a member so far that he cannot be a candidate for another district, but yet may thereafter hold an office incompatible with membership, and upon resigning his office, he may immediately qualify and take his seat in the House. It has often been decided by their Committee of Elections, that a person holding an office incompatible with membership is, nevertheless, capable of prosecuting his claim to a seat. After examination of all the Parliamentary registers, histories, and journals within our reach, we have found no case where a person elected to the House of Commons was brought in on a call of the House, before he had voluntarily appeared, qualified, and taken his seat, nor do we find any instance of a person having been expelled until after such time.

A very particular case occurred on the 10th of February, 1220: Sir John Leech having been duly elected a member of the House of Commons, and appearing to take the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, was asked whether he had not already sat in the House of that Parliament in violation of the statute. He confessed that, on the Wednesday morning previous, he did sit in the House a quarter of an hour being unsworn. For this offence Sir John was not expelled, but it was resolved that he was disabled to serve in the House; and a new writ of election was issued to supply the vacancy, in the same manner as if no election and return had taken place. The same course of proceeding has been pursued when a person, duly elected and returned, comes into the House and refuses to be sworn. Such was the case of Mr. Archdale, in the year 1698, who, being elected and returned, came into the House of Commons and said he was ready to serve, if his affirmation of allegiance could be accepted instead of his oath. The House resolved that it could not. Mr. Archdale, still declining to take the oath, was refused admittance to a seat, and a new writ was issued to supply his place. This case is more peculiar, because a person elected to the House of Commons cannot relinquish his right to a seat either before or after qualification, otherwise than by accepting an incompatible office. But by refusing to be sworn, he may do that indirectly which he is not permitted to do directly. We have seen several similar cases which occurred in the Colonial Assembly of New York, but not now having access to the journals, we are unable to report the particulars.

Persons elected and returned to the House of Commons may be chosen members of committees before they appear and qualify. But it is allowed for a reason similar to that which, in courts of law, permits a declaration to be filed de bene esse before the defendant appears in court. In both cases the act is conditional; and it is ineffectual, unless the condition of appearance be performed.

The practice of this House, which does not allow the appointment of persons to be members of committees, until they shall have taken their seats, is obviously more reasonable and convenient than the other. It was decided, as early as the first session of the Second Congress, in the case of John F. Mercer, who was chosen to supply a vacancy in the representation of the State of Maryland, occasioned by the resignation of William Pinkney, that a representative elect might decline his election before taking a seat, and before the first session of the Congress to which he was elected. We do not find that the question has since been agitated, although similar cases have often occurred. Our rule in this particular is different from that of the House of Commons; it is also better, for it makes our theory conform to what is fact in both countries, that the act of becoming in reality a member of the House depends wholly upon the person elected and returned. Election does not of itself constitute membership, although the period may have arrived at which the Congressional term commences. This is evident from the consideration that all the votes given at an election may not be received by the returning officer in season to be counted, whereby a person not elected may be returned, and take the seat of one who was duly elected. Neither does a return necessarily confer membership, for if he in whose favor it be made should be prevented taking a seat at the organization of a House of Representatives, he might find, upon presenting himself to qualify, that his return had been superseded by the admission of another person into the seat for which he was returned.

At an election, held in the State of Georgia, in October, 1804, Thomas Spalding was duly chosen a Representative to the Ninth Congress; but because the votes of three counties were not returned to the Governor within twenty days after the election, Cowles Mead received a certificate, and took his seat. Mr. Spalding afterwards presented his petition. The House vacated Mr. Mead's seat, and admitted Mr. Spalding.

In April, 1814, Doctor Willoughby was elected a Representative of the State of New York to the Fourteenth Congress; but by reason of a clerical error, of certain inspectors, in returning certificates of votes to the office of the county clerk, General Smith was declared duly elected, and a certificate of election was accordingly delivered to him; but he having omitted to take a seat at the commencement of the session, was, on the ninth day thereafter, declared not entitled, and thereupon Doctor Willoughby was admitted in his stead.

Several other cases might be cited where persons were returned, who never in fact became members, and where others became members who were not returned. Neither do election and return create membership. These acts are nothing more than the designation of the individual, who, when called upon in the manner prescribed by law, shall be authorized to claim title to a seat. This designation, however, does not confer a perfect right, for a person may be selected by the people destitute of certain qualifications, without which he cannot be admitted to a seat. He is, nevertheless, so far the representative of those who elect him, that no vacancy can exist until his disqualification be adjudged by the House. Yet it would be easy to state cases where he would not be permitted for a moment to occupy a seat, notwithstanding the regularity of his election and return. To no practical purpose could he ever have been a member. So also if a person duly qualified be elected and returned, and die before the organization of a House of Representatives, we do not think he could be said to have been a member of that body, which had no existence until after his death. We say which had no existence; for we consider that conceit altogether fanciful which represents one Congress succeeding to another as members of the same corporation. It has no foundation either in fact or in the theory of our Government. Each House of Representatives is a distinct legislative body, having no connection with any preceding one. It commences its existence unrestrained by any rules or regulations for the conducting of business, which were established by former Houses, and which were binding upon them. It prescribes its own course of proceeding, elects its officers, and designates their duties. Even joint rules for the government of both Houses of Congress are not binding upon a new House of Representatives, unless expressly established by it. Although the Fourteenth Congress had never assembled, the Fifteenth would have met under the constitution, clothed with every legislative power, as amply as it was enjoyed by the Thirteenth. The constitution does not define the time for which Representatives shall be chosen. It is satisfied, provided the choice take place at any time in every second year. The rest is left to the discretion of each State. Accordingly, in some States Representatives are usually chosen for one year and seven months, and in other States for a longer time.

The privilege of exemption from arrest, granted by the constitution to Representatives before a meeting of the House and after its adjournment, furnishes no argument in favor of their membership at such times. Exemption from arrest is a privilege as old as the Parliament of England. There it is extended not only to members, but to their servants, horses, and carriages. Our constitution adopts the very words of the common law, but restricts the privilege to members. In both countries the object is the same, not the benefit of the member, but of the public service. It is an essential incident to the right of being represented, and a consequence of that right. But that membership is not coextensive with the enjoyment of that privilege is manifest, from the consideration that such a construction might make the members of one Congress continue in office, not only after the Congress had expired, but also after the next Congress was actually in session. This construction, therefore, is not only absurd, but it serves to illustrate the fallacy of that suggestion which fancies the Representatives of one Congress succeeding to the seats of their predecessors as members of the same corporate body.

The privileges of franking letters and exemption from militia duty are not granted by the constitution. They are established by law, and liable to be changed at the will of the Government. They have been extended, and may be restricted as public convenience shall require. Previous to the last Congress, the privilege of franking was not enjoyed until after the commencement of each session. But as that does not prove negatively that persons elected to the House of Representatives were not members before that time, so the existing law does not prove affirmatively that they are. It is true that the words, "members of the House of Representatives," are used as descriptive of the persons to whom the privilege is granted, but it certainly was used without intending thereby to express an opinion, much less to decide, when membership commences, and probably without in anywise adverting to that inquiry. The late war had created claims in every part of the country, which it was found convenient to send by mail to those who were elected to Congress in the several districts, previous to their leaving home. The law was passed with a view to the convenience of these public claimants, as well as to that of the Representatives elected. We have seen that in England this privilege is enjoyed before the commencement of membership, and probably for a reason similar to that above mentioned.

It is not now necessary to inquire what construction ought to be given to the act which exempts "members of both Houses of Congress" from the performance of militia duty. We do not know that it has ever received a judicial exposition, and we presume that the practice under it, by the officers of the militia, furnishes no very high authority on the constitutional question before us.

In regard to the danger apprehended from Executive influence in the concerns of legislation, we might rest satisfied with the remark that the business of forming a constitution is not confided to us; ours is a more humble duty, it is to expound the text by a fair interpretation; we can neither add nor diminish; the object of our inquiry is, not what ought to be, but what is.

Whoever looks into the constitution will find provisions to guard the entrance of the legislative hall against those whose personal and immediate interest would be advanced, by perpetuating offices and increasing salaries; but he will find none for the purpose of excluding the influence of Executive patronage. The framers of the constitution either did not apprehend danger from that source, or they thought it impracticable to prevent it without hazarding still greater mischief. The great offices of the Union are objects of high and honorable ambition; they are left as open to the members of this House as to others, and they can only be obtained through Executive favor. Nay, laws may be passed on the last day of a Congress creating offices and fixing their salaries, and on the next day the members, by whose votes they were created, may be appointed to fill them. The only antidote provided against an abuse of this pervading influence is the elective franchise. No dependant on the Executive can take a seat in this House. If any member become such, his seat is vacated, his power returns to the people. By a faithful and intelligent exercise of it, they may correct errors and punish delinquency. This is the regenerating principle of the constitution. If this remedy fail, it will be in vain to look for another. The constitution was provided for a brave, wise, and virtuous people. If the citizens of the United States ever cease to deserve this character, our present political institutions will be found unsuited to their condition. This is the only constitutional answer we can give to the suggestion of possible danger from Executive influence.

In fine, we have examined the memorial of Mr. Hammond with deliberate attention, and are of opinion that Mr. Herrick has not rendered himself incapable of being a member of this House, by reason of having held the office of Attorney of the United States after the 4th of March and until the 29th of November last, and respectfully submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That Samuel Herrick is entitled to a seat in this House.

TUESDAY, January 6.

National Flag.

Mr. WENDOVER, from the committee appointed to inquire into the expediency of altering the flag of the United States, made a report, which was read; when Mr. W. reported a bill to alter the flag of the United States; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The report is as follows:

That they have maturely considered the subject referred to them, and have adopted, substantially, the report of the committee to whom was referred the same subject at the last session of Congress, as forming a part of this report. The committee are fully persuaded that the form selected for the American flag was truly emblematical of our origin and existence as an independent nation, and that as such, it having met the approbation and received the support of the citizens of the Union, it ought to undergo no change that would decrease its conspicuity, or tend to deprive it of its representative character. The committee, however, believe that an increase in the number of States in the Union since the flag was altered by law, sufficiently indicates the propriety of such a change in the arrangement of the flag as shall best accord with the reasons that led to its original adoption, and sufficiently point to important periods of our national history.

The original flag of the United States was composed of thirteen stripes and thirteen stars, and was adopted by a resolution of the Continental Congress on the 14th of June, 1777. On the 13th of January, 1794, after two new States had been admitted into the Union, the National Legislature passed an act that the stripes and stars should, on a day fixed, be increased to fifteen each, to comport with the then number of independent States. The accession of new States since that alteration, and the certain prospect that at no distant period the number of States will be considerably multiplied, render it, in the opinion of the committee, highly expedient to increase the number of stripes, as every flag must, in some measure, be limited in its size, from the circumstance of convenience to the place on which it is to be displayed; while an increase would necessarily decrease their magnitude, and render them proportionably less distinct to distant observation; this consideration has induced many to retain only the general form of the flag, while there actually exists a great want of uniformity in its adjustment, particularly when used on small private vessels.

The national flag being in general use by vessels of almost every description, it appears to the committee of considerable importance to adopt some arrangement calculated to prevent in future great or expensive alterations. Under those impressions, they are led to believe no alteration could be made more emblematical of our origin and present existence, as composed of a number of independent and united States, than to reduce the stripes in the flag to the original number of thirteen, to represent the number of States then contending for and happily achieving their independence, and to increase the stars to correspond with the number of States now in the Union, and hereafter to add one star to the flag whenever a new State shall be fully admitted.

These slight alterations will, in the opinion of the committee, meet the general approbation, as well of those who may have regretted a former departure from the original flag, as of such as are solicitous to see in it a representation of every State in the Union.

The committee cannot believe that in retaining only thirteen stripes it necessarily follows they should be distinctly considered in reference to certain individual States, inasmuch as nearly all the new States were a component part of, and represented in, the original States; and inasmuch, also, as the flag is intended to signify numbers, and not local and particular sections of the Union; nor can the committee view the proposed inconsiderable addition to be made on the admission of a new State in the light of a departure from that permanency of form which ought to characterize the flag of the nation. The committee respectfully report a bill.

Compensation to Members, &c.

On motion of Mr. HOLMES, of Massachusetts, the several orders of the day preceding the bill to fix the compensation of the members of the Senate and House of Representatives, were postponed, and the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the said bill.

[The bill provides that the daily compensation of the members, during their attendance on Congress, shall be nine dollars, and the allowance for travelling to and from the seat of Congress, at the rate of nine dollars for every twenty miles of the distance.]

Mr. ROSS, of Pennsylvania, by way of trying the sense of the committee on the subject, moved to strike out the word nine and insert the word six, as the amount of daily compensation.

The question on this motion was loudly called for, indicating a disposition to take the sense of the House without debate.

Mr. DESHA said he should support the motion made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, however unfashionable it might be, which was to strike out the word nine and insert six, and, he suspected, should be found in a small minority; but that should not prevent him from discharging his duty. It is a little mortifying, said he, to see such extreme anxiety manifested on the occasion. Does it look dignified in this body, because they are immediately interested in this measure, to see them urge it forward to the exclusion of all other business that is entitled to precedence under the rules of the House? I sincerely wish that we may not have the same scene acted over again, that was acted the first session of last Congress, when the compensation bill, of famous memory, was on the carpet. This bill contemplates giving the members nine dollars per day, and nine dollars for every twenty miles in travelling to and returning from the Seat of Government. Do the gentlemen seriously believe that the people will submit to this without a murmur? If they do, I suspect they will be most egregiously mistaken.

Nine dollars per day! We commence our sessions at twelve o'clock, and have generally terminated them this session at about three, amounting to about three dollars per hour. Would not the honest and industrious farmer or mechanic, who rises early and works late, and, by his greatest exertions from one end of the year to the other, considers he is doing a good business, if, not getting rich, he can save at the end of the year, clear of all expenses, between fifty and a hundred dollars; I say, would not such men think three dollars per hour high pay, and ought not the opinions of such men to be respected? They certainly ought.

Mr. LITTLE, of Maryland, then moved to strike out "nine" and insert in lieu thereof "eight" dollars as the daily pay.

The question on reducing the daily pay from nine to eight dollars, was decided in the affirmative—yeas 99, nays 79.

So the daily pay was fixed at eight dollars.

WEDNESDAY, January 7.

Contempt of the House.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, rose, and addressed the House in the following words:

Mr. Speaker, I lay before the House a letter addressed and delivered to me by a person called Colonel John Anderson. That man has mistaken me much. Wherever I am known, at this place and in the country from whence I came, no attempt of the kind would have been made. I feel it a duty to lay the letter and the statement thereon, made by myself, before the House. My feelings are too much excited, nor would it be my duty, to make any remarks on the subject. It is for the House to determine what shall be done.

The papers handed by Mr. WILLIAMS to the clerk were then read, as follows:

WASHINGTON, Jan. 6, 1818.

HONORED SIR: I return you thanks for the attention I received on my claims to pass so soon. Mr. Lee will hand you some claims from the River Raisin, which will pass through your honorable committee; and I have a wish that the conduct of the British in that country may be related in full on the floor of Congress; which will give you some trouble in making out the report and supporting the same. I have now to request that you will accept of the small sum of five hundred dollars, as part pay, for the extra trouble I give you; I will present it to you so soon as I receive some from Government. This is confidential, that only you and me may know any thing about it; or, in other words, I give it to you as a man and a mason, and hope you belong to that society. Sir, should it happen that you will not accept of this small sum, I request you will excuse me; if you do not accept, I wish you to drop me a few lines; if you accept, I wish no answer. I hope you will see my view on this subject—that it is for extra trouble.

I will make ont a statement, and present the same to the committee, which will be supported by General Harrison, Colonel Johnson, Mr. Hulbard, Mr. Meigs, Postmaster General, Governor Cass's report as commissioner, and others. Relying on your honor as to keeping this a secret, and your exertions in passing those claims as soon as possible, I need not inform you that we are as poor unfortunate orphan children, having no representation in Congress—so must look on your honorable body as our guardians. Pardon this liberty from a stranger.

I am, with high esteem, your most obedient and humble servant,

JOHN ANDERSON.

The Hon. LEWIS WILLIAMS.

After breakfast this morning, George, a servant, came into the dining room, and told me that a gentleman was in my room waiting to see me. I stepped into my room, and Colonel John Anderson was there. He handed me a letter, observing at the same time, that he had prepared that letter for me, and that, perhaps, it would require some explanation. I read over the letter with attention; and, having done so, observed to Colonel Anderson it was a very surprising communication. I then started to Mr. Wilson's room, immediately adjoining my own. When in the act of opening my own door, he begged I would not show the letter. I made no reply to this, but stepped into Mr Wilson's room, and asked him to do me the favor to walk into my room. This Mr. Wilson did, following on immediately behind me. After we had got into my room, in the presence of Colonel Anderson, I handed the letter to Mr. Wilson, and, observing that it was a very extraordinary communication, requested him to read it. When Mr. Wilson had read, or was nearly done reading the letter, I told Colonel Anderson that I repelled with indignation and contempt the offer he had made to me in the letter. Colonel Anderson said he asked my pardon; that it was designed only as a small compensation for the extra trouble he expected to give the Committee of Claims in examining the claims from the Michigan territory, and exposing the conduct of the British during the war; that it was foreign to his intention to attempt any thing like a bribe, and requested me to burn the letter, or to give it to him. I told him I should do neither; that his offence was unpardonable, such as I could not forgive, and ordered him to leave the room instantly. Col. Anderson then begged pardon, and asked forgiveness with excessive earnestness. I told him I would listen to none of his apologies; that his offence was an attack upon the integrity of Congress generally, and upon mine personally and particularly; that no one should ever have my pardon, or expect my forgiveness, who should suppose me capable of such an influence as he had attempted to practise upon me. Again I told Colonel Anderson to leave my room. He advanced to the door, where he stood for some time, endeavoring to obtain my pardon, as he said. I told him it was in vain to ask it; that, as a member of Congress and of the Committee of Claims, it was my duty to examine his claims, and, if just, support them; if unjust, oppose them; that his offer was an attempt to influence my mind in opposition to my duty, and, as such, could not be forgiven. He then desired me either to burn the letter or give it to him. I replied that I should do neither, and again ordered him to leave my room. Whereupon, he did leave the room. Mr. Wilson, after talking on the subject of the letter for some time, suggested to me the propriety of calling in Mr. William P. Maclay. I stepped to his room; but, as Mr. William P. Maclay was not in, I asked Mr. William Maclay, a room-mate of Mr. William P. Maclay, to come to my room. He complied with my request; and, shortly after he arrived in my room, Mr. William P. Maclay also stepped in. These gentlemen, Messrs. Wilson, William Maclay, and William P. Maclay, were in my room at the time the servant called to Mr. Wilson, and said a gentleman was below wishing to see him. Mr. Wilson walked out of the room, and was gone a few minutes. After he returned, he observed that Colonel Anderson was the person who had sent for him; that Colonel Anderson's business was to obtain his interference to put a stop to further proceedings on the subject of his letter to me. The precise conversation between Mr. Wilson and Colonel Anderson can be related by the former with minuteness.

LEWIS WILLIAMS.

JANUARY 7, 1818.

The papers having been read through, Mr. W. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, referred to in the above narrative, handed in a statement of the facts which fell under his observation, entirely corroborating those stated by Mr. WILLIAMS, as far as they came under the observation of the former.

Mr. FORSYTH, of Georgia, moved that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Speaker do issue his warrant, directed to the Sergeant-at-Arms attending the House, commanding him to take into custody, wherever to be found, the body of John Anderson, and the same in his custody to keep, subject to the further order and direction of this House.

Mr. HARRISON, of Ohio, rose in consequence of his name having been referred to in Colonel Anderson's letter. He had met with Colonel Anderson, he said, in the course of his military service, and had always heard him regarded as a highly respectable man; and well knowing his services, and the sufferings of his family, during the war, he had felt a warm interest in his favor. In the course of this morning, Col. Anderson had sent for him and his friend, Colonel Johnson, out of the House, and, with all the agitation belonging to terror or to conscious guilt, had informed them of his having done an act which he feared would be regarded, as Mr. H. was sure it would by every member, as calling for the severest animadversion. They had informed him, Mr. H. said, that they would not justify his conduct; nor, were it brought before the House, could they say any thing in extenuation of it.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, expressed his sincere regret on account of the occurrence which had just taken place, not on account of the individual implicated—though, surely, he was to be pitied—but on account of the gentleman from North Carolina, who, on this occasion, had taken that course dictated by a just sense of his own honor and the dignity of his official station; and on account of the suffering inhabitants of Detroit and Michigan, generally, that they should have misplaced their confidence in one whom, until this day, Mr. J. said, he had himself held in the highest estimation. It must have been infamy of motive, or the grossest ignorance of the nature of the Representative character, that could have produced this unwarrantable conduct.

Mr. TERRY, of Connecticut, inquired whether, according to our forms of proceedings, and to our constitutional provisions, a general warrant, as proposed, could be issued? Was it not opposed, in itself, in its nature, to the principles of civil liberty?

The SPEAKER observed that, in the practice of the House, happily, instances were extremely rare where such a warrant became necessary; no such case had occurred within his observation. But there could be no doubt, when an offence was committed against the privileges or dignity of the House, it was perfectly in its power to issue a warrant to apprehend the party offending.

Mr. FORSYTH turned to a case on record—and he was sorry there was such a case on record—where this proceeding had taken place, in the year 1795, in which a bribe in land had been offered to one or more members. Mr. F. then conformed his motion to the terms of that precedent, as above stated, from which it had before a little varied.

Mr. LIVERMORE, of New Hampshire, asked, for information merely, whether the facts on which the warrant was to be issued, should not first be substantiated by oath. The statement came, he knew, from a most respectable source; but was not an oath necessary to justify such a warrant?

The SPEAKER said—Certainly not.

The question on Mr. FORSYTH's motion was then taken, decided in the affirmative, and ordered to be entered unanimously.

The warrant was forthwith issued.

Compensation to Members.

The question on the passage of the bill was decided in the affirmative—yeas 109, nays 60; so the bill was passed, (at eight dollars per day, and eight dollars mileage,) and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

THURSDAY, January 8.

Another member, to wit, from New York, DAVID A. OGDEN, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat.

Case of John Anderson.

The SPEAKER having apprised the House that the Sergeant-at-Arms had taken the body of John Anderson, pursuant to the warrant to him directed, and held him in custody, Mr. FORSYTH, of Georgia, submitted for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That a Committee of Privileges, to consist of seven members, be appointed, and that the said committee be instructed to report a mode of proceeding in the case of John Anderson, who was taken into custody yesterday by order of the House; and that the same committee have leave to sit immediately.

Mr. BEECHER, of Ohio, rose in opposition to this proceeding. The offence of this man, in every sense but a legal one, he was not dispose to deny. But it was another question, whether the House was justified in the course it was about to pursue. Was any authority therefor given in the constitution? None. Was any law to be found on the statute-book giving it? None. The mode of punishing bribery was, to resort to a court of justice, and there only could it be punished. In this House, he said it was impossible to proceed correctly in a trial for an offence of this character; and the trouble proceedings of this kind would impose on the House, and the evil of delay they would cause in their ordinary legislative business, afforded strong reasons, if others were wanting, to consult their authority, and see whether in fact the House possessed any authority to act on the case. The fifth section of the first article of the constitution, he said, provided that each House might determine the rules of its own proceedings; but no part of the constitution gave to the House authority to arrest and bring forward any individual for improper conduct to any member of this House. The courts of the country had made, in their practice, what is called a common law; but Mr. B. said, if there existed any common law to justify these proceedings of the House, it was unknown to him. The great powers assumed by the Parliament of Great Britain in this respect, had been a matter of great complaint in that country; and he presumed it would not be contended that the practice of that body was to form a rule of conduct for this House. Neither, Mr. B. said, did he think it essential that this House should possess the power of arresting and bringing individuals to trial before us; the courts of justice being open to prosecution and redress for any injury of this sort. The House, as any other legislative body, possessed inherently the power to protect itself from indecorum and insult; but it had no power to confine and commit individuals for acts done elsewhere. He did not believe the House possessed authority to arrest an individual in this case, any more than for an assault and battery on a member at any distance from the Seat of Government—a power which, he contended, the House did not possess. In another part of the constitution, he said, particular privileges were accorded to members; and the enumeration of particular powers, in any instrument of that character, was an exclusion of all others. For other injuries received, than those in violation of that clause of the constitution, Mr. B. said, members have the same redress as any other individuals. Mr. B. said he did not believe the House ought to have the power it was about to exercise; the constitution had not given the House any such power, nor had it been conferred upon them by any law.

Mr. FORSYTH said, if the position of the gentleman was correct, the House had already violated the constitution. The object of the proposed appointment of a committee was to inquire how the House ought now to proceed. If the committee concur with the gentleman from Ohio, they would report that the individual now in custody ought to be discharged; if otherwise, they would report what further course the House ought to pursue. But, Mr. F. said, admitting that all the gentleman had said was true, it was no reason why this committee should not be appointed. Mr. F. did not wish to be understood as doubting the power of the House, because he believed it had full power to proceed; and he knew that this House and the other branch of the Legislature had, in other cases, exercised similar powers. Until he was convinced, by solemn investigation, that the House did not possess the power, he would not, for one, consent to refrain from its exercise in the present case.

Mr. LIVERMORE, of New Hampshire, hoped, he said, that but one resolution would pass the House on this occasion, and that this one should be, that John Anderson be discharged. First, he said, on account of the irregularity of the proceeding in the first instance. Our ideas, said he, of Congressional privileges, appear to rest on our knowledge of British Parliamentary privileges, which, he conceived, were widely distinct in their natures. In Great Britain the Legislature possesses all power; and almost every act of the Parliament becomes a part of the constitution of the land. That is an unlimited Legislature. The Congress of the United States, he said, was differently constituted. In a case of this kind occurring in Great Britain, an oath would not be required; but, said Mr. L., we are, in this respect, restricted in our power, by the express declaration in the constitution, that no warrant shall issue except sustained by oath. This provision, he said, being contained in the fourth article of the amendments to the constitution, had more weight with him than if contained in the original instrument, having been the result of the after-thought and mature deliberation of the nation. Far be it from him, Mr. L. said, to suggest that full faith should not be given to any thing advanced by the honorable member from North Carolina; as a man he believed him implicitly, but as a member not at all—no more than, as a judge, he would believe a man in court without an oath. The word of the Chief Justice of the United States himself would not be taken in court except on oath. Mr. L. said he greatly respected the gentleman he had referred to, but he did not consider the House at liberty to take a step which would compromit the meanest man in the United States, except on the oath of his accuser. Besides, said Mr. L., we have no authority over John Anderson, admitting the charge against him to be substantiated. There is no statute of the United States, though there are in most of the individual States, declaring bribery an offence. Far be it from me to contend that this body cannot protect itself; that we can do by our own rules and regulations, but we cannot extend them beyond the verge of this House. The Sergeant-at-Arms might command the whole military force of the United States, could it possibly become necessary, to put out of this House a man disturbing its peace. Mr. L. said he knew very well there was a precedent on record of a course similar to that now proposed; and he also knew that the most eminent men of the United States deprecated that decision when it took place. When the subject was before the Congress, in 1800, he believed those who favored the proceeding sustained themselves on the authority of the practice of the British Parliament; they were a high-handed party majority, full of British notions and fond of British precedents. Those who were opposed to that course were the whole body of the Republican members, with the great Jefferson at their head. Mr. L. hoped, he repeated, that but one resolution would pass on this occasion; and that it should be, that the warrant for the apprehension of John Anderson had been irregularly and improperly issued, and that he be therefore forthwith discharged.

Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, said he should not do his duty, if he did not, on the present question, give the gentleman from Georgia his hearty support; not that he was certain he should give him the same support in all his views of this subject. The proper course, in the opinion of Mr. T. would be, to provide by a general law for the punishment of contempts against either House of Congress; but, he asked, was it not the duty of the House on this, and on every other occasion, to deliberate in that manner which afforded the best lights on any subject, and which it became the dignity of the House to pursue? No matter how light the subject might be that was proposed to the consideration of the House, he should not choose to act on it, without calling on some committee of the House to take it into their particular consideration, and to produce a clear and connected view of it. And was this an occasion on which, by a hasty procedure, to depart from that course? Would the House at once declare that its members might be approached by the vilest miscreants on the face of the globe, and that it could take no steps to protect their rights? Is any member prepared to say, that there exists in this House no power to repel the approaches of bribery and corruption? The constitution creating this body is a dead letter —is mere waste paper—said Mr. T., if we have no power to protect ourselves from violence of this description in the exercise of our duties. That part of the constitution giving to Congress all power necessary to carry into effect the delegated powers, has no value if it does not apply to the present case. For his part, Mr. T. said, he had no manner of doubt as to the power of this House to protect itself, and none of the expediency of the course now proposed. But, at the same time, he doubted the propriety of suffering the laws to remain in their present situation, so as to compel the House to act in this way. Until a general law should pass, Mr. T. said, he had no doubt the House had the power within itself to punish any person who should attempt to bribe one of its members. The proper course, he conceived, would be, warned by this incident, to appoint a committee to report a bill to punish such offences, &c. He should not commit himself at present as to the final course for the House; but it appeared to him, that every member, from the necessity the House was under of protecting itself, would wish to see that course pursued which would best promote a due consideration of the subject —which was the usual process of referring the subject to a committee.

Mr. HOPKINSON, of Pennsylvania, rose in support of the proposition before the House. This question, he said, was not a new one; it had been heretofore solemnly debated and adjudged; and all the objections now expressed had been brought forward in their greatest force, without effect; and the precedent then established was entitled to respect. In that case to which he referred, it was well known a full opportunity was given for the freest discussion; the parties arraigned at the bar having been heard by their counsel on this question. But, Mr. H. said, the weight of that precedent was attempted to be destroyed in a most extraordinary manner by the honorable gentleman from New Hampshire, who had intimated that the House at that day did not decide the question on a knowledge of the provisions of the constitution, but on party principles. Mr. H. begged the gentleman from New Hampshire to tell the House how he knew the motives of the members of that Congress; how he acquired the power to enter their hearts, and see that they did not decide this question on our own laws, but on those of a foreign country? Why did he seek to condemn them and their decision, by a sort of allusion, which, Mr. H. said, as an argument, would not be listend to on this floor? That respectable and enlightened Congress, Mr. H. said, had decided the question before them on the principles of our own constitution and law; if their decision was corroborated by the practice of the Legislature of any other country, there was nothing in that circumstance to weaken the force of the precedent. But the Republican members opposed that decision! Are questions of this sort, Mr. H. asked, to be decided by the particular political denominations of those who voted pro or con? Is that to be the rule by which decisions on such questions are to be received or regarded as precedents? If so, as gentlemen took the liberty sometimes of exchanging sides in politics, that which was law to-day might not be to-morrow; and the question would be forever unsettled. The question now raised, Mr. H. considered as having been decided by an authority which, though not decisive, was yet entitled to the highest respect, and ought to be respected. The observations of the gentleman from New Hampshire having been disposed of, which ought never to have been made, Mr. H. proceeded to notice some other views which had been thrown out. It had been objected to the legality of the procedure, that the statement on which the warrant was founded, was not on oath. Was not the representation of a member of this House, he asked, a sufficient ground of proceeding? The character of this House must be sunk to a low ebb, if the representations of its members were not to be received as true. In the case of Randall and Whitney, the proceedings of the House had been similar to those of this day; information of the facts was given by members in their places, and the House proceeded, as in the present case, without calling on the members to take the book and testify that what they had stated was true. In such cases, said Mr. H., we have ever been guided by precedent, and we have done right. But, it was said by the gentleman from Ohio, that there was nothing to be found in the constitution to justify this proceeding. When, Mr. H. said, the constitution gave being to this body, it gave to it every attribute necessary to its security and to its purity. The courts of justice, which had been mentioned, do exercise similar power; any attempt to obstruct the due course of justice, or to corrupt its source, is an offence punishable in a summary manner. It was equally necessary such a power should reside in this House; because, if persons hanging about this hall, with their private claims, and besetting the paths of the members, offering them bribes for their votes and influence, were to be referred to the courts of justice for their punishment, there was no protection for the independence, none for the feelings, none for the character of this House. If we are careful that the laws be purely administered, ought we not to be equally so that they are purely made? Is the juror who administers the law to have protection, and the legislator who makes the law to have none? That the courts have the power to punish contempts, is a matter, said Mr. H., which could not be doubted here; and that the Legislature possesses the same power was to him clear, and for the same reason. Adverting to the provision of the constitution, which privileged members of Congress from arrest during their attendance at the session of their respective Houses, and on going to and returning from the same; if the gentleman will tie us down to the letter of the constitution, said Mr. H., how would he punish a man who should arrest a member contrary to this provision? Would he sue him at law? and where do you find in the constitution any thing by which you shall know how to proceed to punish him? Would not the gentleman do it in the way in which we are going on? And why? Because, said he, we possess the power to protect ourselves in the exercise of our duties. How would the gentleman proceed in the case of the arrest of himself and half a dozen of members, whose votes would turn the scale on a pending question of the highest moment? Discharge the members, and they might be arrested again, if there was no summary process against the offender. If there was no redress in such a case, but to turn the person offending over to suit or indictment in the courts, the constitutional provision was a mere illusion. But gentlemen themselves did not agree. One, said he, refers the House for redress of their complaint, in the present case, to the courts of justice; the other says that bribery is no offence, there being no law to punish it; of course the courts are not open to the complainant. So that, between them, Congress is in a strange predicament. We are, without remedy, at the mercy of every infamous man, who is disposed, either for the purpose of private malice or personal emolument, to play off his arts against the Representatives of the people. Mr. H. concluded by saying, that he hoped the House would decide that it had the power, not only to protect its existence, but to preserve its character so pure and unsullied as to be exempted even from suspicion.

Mr. FORSYTH rose to correct an extraordinary mistake which the gentleman from New Hampshire had fallen into in regard to the precedent to which he had referred. That precedent was found in the Journal of the year 1795, before the division of parties, which has since existed, had taken place. It was not, therefore, a party question, but a great constitutional point, which was then decided. On referring to the Journal for the final vote, it appeared that seventy-eight members had voted in the affirmative, and but seventeen against it. For another fact he was indebted to the information of a gentleman who was in a situation to have known it, that, of those seventy-eight, thirty-nine were subsequently on the Republican side of the question, and known as Republicans in the great parties into which the country soon after divided. Among these were some of the names most dear to the Republican party, and by this he meant no reflection on those who differed from them on that question. He need only refer to the names of Gallatin, Giles, Baldwin, Findlay, and many others of the same grade—and were not these Republicans? They were; and each would bear a comparison with any man who had ever since called himself a Republican. They were the master spirits who headed the Republican party when it became one, and guided it in all its movements. But, Mr. F. said, he should be glad to find out how the gentleman discovered the great name of Jefferson to support him in his doctrine? That great man was not then a member of Congress; nor, Mr. F. said, did he know that he had expressed any opinion on the question. He did not find in the Manual composed by him any expression of an opinion that the constitution had been violated by that decision. There was a statement of the arguments on both sides of that question; but so far from expressing the opinion that the constitution had been violated, the Manual considered the question as unsettled. It was settled, then, on the ground that this body, and all others, corporate as well as individual, had the right to protect themselves from insult and violence. How, Mr. F. asked, would gentlemen proceed to punish an individual in the gallery of this House, who should consider it a great theatre, and exercise the privilege which insolent persons use in the gallery of a theatre, of disturbing the audience and annoying the performers? Suppose some person who was unfriendly to a member speaking, or who did not like the monotonous tone of his voice, should amuse himself by throwing nuts or apples at his head; by hissing on the one hand, or applauding on the other; by what authority would the House exercise the power of driving him away, or taking him into custody? Could any one doubt the power? But was it to be found, in so many words, in the constitution? Gentlemen might say, this would be within our own walls, and therefore a different case from that now under consideration. Mr. F. regarded them as standing on the same footing; within and without, here or in any part of the city, if a member was insulted in the discharge of his duty, this House had, in his opinion, the right and the power to punish the offender. He hoped, at all events, the House would make the inquiry, and not stay its proceedings in this case, until something stronger had been alleged against them than any thing he had heard.

Mr. PITKIN, of Connecticut, said he did not rise to debate the power of this House; for, he said, unless the House had some power to protect itself and its members in their persons and integrity, from violence or insult, they might as well adjourn and go home. But he rose to refer to one or two cases which had occurred subsequently to that which had been particularly referred to, to see how far the House had proceeded. A case had occurred, in 1810, of an assault and battery on a member of this House, not within the walls of the House, not during its sitting, and originating in circumstances having no relation to his duty as a member of the House; but, while here attending his public duty, that gentleman had been considered as under the protection of the authority of the House, and the House had accordingly taken cognizance of the assault; and justly—for, if the House had not power to protect its members while going and coming therefrom, it was in vain for them to attend here. In another case, a committee had been appointed to inquire into the promulgation of certain secret proceedings of the House. The individual promulgating them was brought to the bar of the House, and compelled to answer the questions propounded to him. If he had refused to answer the questions put to him, undoubtedly he would have been committed to prison for that contempt. Having no doubt of the power of the House in this respect, he hoped the House would act as proposed.

Mr. LIVERMORE again rose. He said he should suppose that no one had understood him to say that the Republicans were right or wrong, or that the Federalists were right or wrong, or to draw any distinction between the parties into which the country had been divided. He respected good men of all parties, and none other but good men of any party. He had said that an oath was necessary to support a warrant, and produced the constitutional provision, "that no warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation." How am I answered? Why, that every member of this House is entitled to such high credit, that his word is as good as any other man's oath. The Chief Justice of the United States is sworn to support the constitution, and to administer justice; but, he is not therefore sworn to every thing, and his mere word would not be taken in this matter in controversy in any court. But, it seemed, that the rights of individuals were to be uprooted, and an express provision of the constitution disregarded, on the word of a member, because he was sworn to support the constitution. Mr. L. said he had as high an opinion of the credit to which members of this House were entitled, as any man could have, but he could not, in such a case as this, believe them, except on oath, considering himself bound to protect the rights of every individual in the United States, &c. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. L. continued, had found fault with some of his expressions. A man cannot take his words out of his mouth, look at them, put them in again, and speak as he could wish; and Mr. L. said he might have gone further than he intended. Whether those who established the precedent of 1795 were Republicans, or be they whom they might, they had acted on precedents drawn from the British Parliament, a body whose powers in this respect were not analogous to those of the Congress of the United States. The Parliament of Great Britain is a perpetual convention, of which every law and practice becomes a part of the constitution. But we are a limited Legislature, and the constitution controls us. And when such a question as this is presented, how shall we get over it? Mr. L. disclaimed any intention to accuse those who established the precedent in the case of Whitney and Randall of having acted wrongly, against conviction. God forbid he should have said so; but, if he had been a little warm on the subject when up before, perhaps the gentleman from Pennsylvania (whom no man respected more than he) had warmed himself as well as the gentleman from New Hampshire. Let that gentleman, however, reconcile the proceedings of Congress to that provision which he had referred to. It was no way to put a man down to say, that one man's word is as good as another man's oath. It was saying what the constitution had not left the House at liberty to say. But, it was asked, could Congress do nothing to protect themselves? Must they be trampled on, and spit upon, without remedy? Mr. L. said he had admitted before, and he now repeated, that the Sergeant-at-Arms, within the House, might command the whole force of the country, the Army and Militia, and, supposing such a case possible, might bring a seventy-four up the Eastern Branch to fire upon the Capitol; but the House had not the extensive power for which gentlemen now contended. Suppose he were to rise and say, that, as he was coming here, the Governor or Chief Justice of New Hampshire had offered him a bribe; would this House send out its warrant and bring him here? Would this be constitutional? He hoped not. If the procedure would not be warrantable as to such men, neither would it to the meanest man in the State, for no man there was a slave; and Mr. L. would not stretch the power of the Government to oppress the meanest or the greatest.

Mr. SERGEANT, of Pennsylvania, said, as the motion now before the House, was merely for the appointment of a committee of inquiry, he could see no reasonable objection to it. The matter proposed to be inquired into was not, he said, a question merely between the individual accused and the House; but it was one in which the nation was interested; and the House would commit as great an error if they neglected to inflict a proper punishment on the offender in such a case, as if they were to inflict punishment where no offence had been committed. The immediate question was not, whether the members of the House were assailable by bribes; whether their feelings were to be wounded with impunity; whether they were liable to the arts of seduction; but it was a general question whether the House would or would not inquire what authority it had to punish those offending in this respect. If we have the authority, said Mr. S., we are bound to inflict punishment in the case before us; for if the offence supposed to have been committed shall be proved, can any case occur hereafter more requiring the exercise of the powers of this House. If you will not exercise what power you possess now, there is no species of attempt which may not be made with impunity on the honor or on the feelings of this House; there is no practice, however corrupt, which may not be attempted. For upon whom was this attempt made? Upon a member who is at the head of the Committee of Claims, that committee whose business it is to determine between the claims of individuals and the interest of the United States, coming in conflict before them; in doing which the chairman of that committee has to contend, on the part of the United States, against the interest, urged in every possible shape, of the individuals whose claims are preferred to this House. And would the House allow the member who occupies that station of sentinel at the door of the Treasury, to be placed in a situation to be exposed to all the gross and corrupt attempts which may be made on him, if they are permitted to be made with impunity? Surely not. If, then, Mr. S. repeated, the House would not, in the present case, exercise the power of punishing for contempt, there never would occur one in which it would.

There were, Mr. S. said, in the present, as there must be in all similar cases, two offences committed; the one, a crime for which the individual might be handed over to the courts of justice for the punishment; the other an offence against this House, for which the individual might be proceeded against and punished in a summary manner. He did not say that both these courses might not be pursued. But he did admit that the question whether the House should or should not interfere, was at all times a question on which a sound discretion must be exercised when the case arises. In this way he would answer the gentleman from New Hampshire, who had supposed extreme cases. This House, said Mr. S., may certainly in such cases rely on its own discretion, that it will not be impelled into a course which is unjust. The case now before the House was not such a case, however, but one of a totally different character. If the House proceeded no further now, the privileges of the House were surrendered in every case, unless for what should be done in the face of the House. If the doctrine of the gentlemen from Ohio and New Hampshire prevail, said Mr. S., we shall be assailable at our door, on the staircase, everywhere until we come into this House, and this House is organized. Was this possible? And yet, he said, he did not suppose cases as extreme as those put on the other side.

Mr. BALL, of Virginia said, if this proposition to appoint a committee had been made in the first instance, he should have had no objection to the proposed inquiry. But he was under the impression that this inquiry into their power ought to have been had before the warrant was issued. Suppose this person had been in a distant part of this country, in the District of Maine, for example: would this House arrest him, bring him here, and then inquire whether they had power to do so or not? Would not this be a grievance of the highest character against the laws of the land, and against the constitution itself? Supposing, after putting a person, accused of contempt, to all this inconvenience, and holding him in durance, it should appear that he was not amenable to the authority of this House; would not this proceeding have been manifestly wrong, and an oppression of the citizen? Had we not better, said Mr. B., suffer a thousand insults, than trample on the personal liberty of the citizen? The liberty of the citizen was guarded by the express provisions of the constitution; and he would not, he said, exercise any authority restraining it, unless unsupported by the constitution. That was his guide; he had taken an oath to support it, and that instrument provided that no warrant shall issue, unless supported by oath. The warrant against John Anderson had, therefore, issued in contradiction to the constitution. The proper course would be to discharge him from the warrant which had been illegally issued; to investigate the subject; and, if it should be decided that he was amenable to the House, then to arrest him and punish him, but not, otherwise, to proceed further in the business.

Mr. TERRY said that, on this occasion, it appeared to him, to use a vulgar adage, gentlemen leapt before they came to the stile. With respect to the constitutional provision for the protection of individuals, if a warrant contrary to law was before a court of justice, where strict law prevails, the court would not ex officio quash it, if the party concerned submitted to it. It was proper, Mr. T. said, that Colonel Anderson should have the opportunity of objecting to it. If he did so, Mr. T. reserved to himself the right to decide whether the warrant had been issued constitutionally or not. In the present state of the proceedings, he said, the House ought not to decide: if conscious of his offence, the individual might not think it advisable to object to the authority of the House.

Mr. COMSTOCK, of New York, said he did not rise to detain the House, but to say that he thought, unless this or a similar resolution passed, (for appointing a committee,) the patience of the House would be put to a severer test than it had yet been, by the protraction of a debate arising from the want of a definite proposition before the House, which it would be the business of a committee to present. Many observations, it appeared to Mr. C., had escaped gentlemen in the course of the debate that had already taken place, which might have been offered with more propriety when this man should be brought before the House, and exhibit the evidence, if he has any, to extenuate his guilt. It would then be more proper than it was now to comment on his character and on all the circumstances of the transaction. At present, Mr. C. said, he would forbear any remarks on that head; he thought that enough had been disclosed to justify what had been already done.

The resolution was finally agreed to, and Messrs. FORSYTH, HOPKINSON, TUCKER, SERGEANT, JOHNSON, of Kentucky, PITKIN, and TAYLOR, were appointed a committee accordingly.

John Anderson's Case.

Mr. FORSYTH, from the committee appointed to-day, made a report recommending that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That John Anderson be brought to the bar of the House, and interrogated by the Speaker, on written interrogatories, touching the charge of writing and delivering a letter to a member of the House, offering him a bribe, which, with his answers thereto, shall be entered on the minutes of the House. And that every question proposed by a member be reduced to writing, and a motion made that the same be put by the Speaker, and the question and answer shall be entered on the minutes of the House. That after such interrogatories are answered, if the House deem it necessary to make further inquiry on the subject, the same be conducted by a committee to be appointed for that purpose.

Mr. TUCKER read a resolution that the Speaker be authorized to inform the accused that that he might ask counsel, &c.

Which was superseded by an intimation from the Speaker, that he should consider it a duty, if no objection was made, to give the accused information on this head.

The Sergeant-at-Arms was then directed to bring his prisoner to the bar of the House.

On his appearance, the SPEAKER directed a chair to be given to him, and addressed him to this effect:

"John Anderson, you are no doubt aware that you are brought before this House in consequence of having written and delivered to a gentleman, who is a member and chairman of a committee of this House, a letter, of the contents of which you are apprised. Before I proceed to propound to you any interrogatories on this subject, I will apprise you that, if you have any request to make of the House; if you wish for counsel, for reasonable time, for witnesses, for any of those privileges belonging to persons in similar situations, the House is disposed to grant it. If you do not wish for time, for counsel, or for witnesses, the Speaker will proceed to put to you such interrogatories as may seem proper."

To this the prisoner at the bar replied in substance, although indistinctly, that, in his peculiar situation, he desired the assistance of counsel; he desired time until to-morrow, and the opportunity of summoning witnesses to testify to the character he had sustained through life.

Whereupon the Sergeant-at-Arms was directed to take the prisoner from the bar.

Some conversation took place as to the precise mode of proceeding, which resulted in drawing up a resolution that the Speaker be authorized to inform the accused that the House comply with his requests.

And then the Sergeant-at-Arms withdrew from the bar with his prisoner.

The House adjourned at a late hour.

FRIDAY, January 9.

Another member, to wit, from Rhode Island, JAMES B. MASON, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat.

Case of John Anderson.

Mr. SPENCER offered for consideration the following preamble and resolutions:

The House of Representatives, entertaining great doubts of its possessing the competent power to punish John Anderson for his contempt of the House, and his outrage upon one of its members:

Resolved, That all further proceedings in this House against the said John Anderson do cease, and that he be discharged from the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Resolved, That the Attorney-General of the United States be directed to institute such proceedings against the said John Anderson for his said offence as may be agreeable to the laws of the United States and of the District of Columbia.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the punishment of any contempt of the Senate or House of Representatives of the United States, and of any breach of the privileges of either House.

Mr. SPENCER, of New York, observed, that in submitting the resolutions which had been read, his object was to procure a decision of the House on the abstract question of its right to proceed in the case of Colonel Anderson. He had offered them in this stage of the proceedings, because no opportunity had yet been given to take the sense of the House, and with a view also of preventing the influence of those feelings, which the demerits of the case might excite, in producing a decision that calm and deliberate reason might not sanction. It was more consistent, also, with the dignity of the House, that we should retrace its proceedings, if they were wrong, from our own impulse, rather than be compelled to do so on the motion of the accused or his counsel.

Mr. S. unequivocally condemned the conduct of the accused; and his indignation at the enormity of the offence had, he confessed, carried him too far, in endeavoring to punish it. The only apology I have to offer, said Mr. S., is to be found in that universal burst of feeling which spread through the House on the disclosure of the base transaction. But time for reflection has succeeded to the impetuosity of feeling; and, being perfectly convinced that we were wrong, I take the first opportunity to acknowledge my error, and to expiate it, by submitting the resolutions on your table.

In deciding this question, we act as judges, and we must demand the very letter of the law to authorize our decision. With the propriety, or expediency, or necessity of having some law on the subject, we, as judges, have nothing to do. We act not as legislators, but in a judicial capacity, in a cause between us and the accused; and we are as strictly bound by the law of the land as any court of justice can be. Let us, then, search for that law. If it is to be found at all, it is either in the constitution, in the laws of the United States, or in the law of Parliament. The friends of the procedure have been in vain called upon to point out the express power given by the constitution. So far from doing so, they have not, as yet, answered the objections which the constitution itself interposes. The 4th article of the amendments provides, "that no warrant shall issue but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation," and that it shall describe the person to be seized. In the present case, a warrant has been issued, directing a person to be seized, without being supported by oath or affirmation. But we have been told, that the clause is only intended to regulate courts of justice. There is no such limitation in the amendment; but, admit it, and what is gained? The issuing of process to bring in a party to answer is in itself a judicial act; all our proceedings in the case are founded upon the idea of our being a court for this purpose. By the 5th amendment it is provided that no person shall be held to answer for an infamous crime unless on indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia when in service. If any doubt should exist as to the universality of the prohibition, the excepted cases which it mentions shows conclusively that it was intended to apply to all others. Here there is no presentment, and no one will contend that it is one of the excepted cases. The same amendment provides that no person shall be compelled to be a witness against himself in a criminal case. We are about to propound interrogatories to this man; if he refuse to answer them, what are you next to do? Will you treat the refusal as another contempt, and punish him for it; and thus compel him to bear witness against himself? Or will you persist in making a vain effort at power, when you know you must retire discomfited and disgraced? The 6th amendment provides for the trial by jury. In no sense of the word can this House be deemed a jury; we are not returned by an Executive officer; we possess not the qualifications of jurors, and the right of challenge of course could not be allowed.

From this examination, it results, then, that if we proceed against this man for a crime, as some have contended, our measures are wholly unconstitutional, illegal, and void. If we proceed against him at all, it must be for a contempt amounting to a breach of the privileges of the House. The most diligent research has not enabled me to discover either the word or the idea of a contempt as applied to Congress, in either the constitution or laws of the United States, and I venture to affirm that neither of them is to be found there.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kentucky, declared that he should support the resolutions offered to the House. His only objection was to the expression of doubt contained in the preamble; he felt no doubt, and thought the prisoner should be instantly discharged. It might indeed produce some mortification for the House now to retrace its steps, and to make a public acknowledgment of its imbecility, but he thought this course much preferable to an assumption of the constitutional powers now contended for. He himself participated in the mortification, but felt the necessity of giving the most prompt correction to the error which had been committed in issuing the warrant. It was much better now to arrest the proceedings, than to conduct the case through an examination, and be compelled to adopt that course; an idea then might justifiably arise, that the discharge was produced by a belief that the man was innocent, or that the case did not merit punishment. It should be placed on its true ground; the prisoner should be immediately discharged from a want of power in this House to punish. If this power be possessed, it is indeed most novel and extraordinary. In every other case, an act which is punishable, must, by a previous law, have been declared an offence. In this, the guilt of the individual does not rest on any statute previously passed and promulgated, but on the feelings and passions of this House. In vain do we demand the law, which has declared the act an offence at the time of its commission. In vain may the citizen look for the rule of his conduct in the statute book of his country. There is no law declaring the act we are about to punish, a contempt or an offence of any kind; our opinion of its criminality has been locked within our own breasts, and never can be constitutionally declared except by a law of Congress. No other tribunal has ever yet dared to assume such a power, and if it be exercised, no citizen in this country can be safe. But if the doctrine is recognized that we can declare an act after it is committed an offence, according to our views of the privileges of the House, or the nature of contempts, we are at once plunged into a sea of perplexity. There is no subject on which the varying minds of men can differ more. That act which one will declare the grossest contempt, will, by another, be thought perfectly harmless. We shall have no previous standard by which we can measure the act; the fact of its being an offence will depend on the wide and differing views of members of this House. If we reserve to ourselves the power of declaring every paragraph in the newspapers defamatory or libellous, as our feelings may direct, and which no law has forbidden, we are indeed possessed of powers of which the people of this country have little thought, and which, by reading the constitution, they can never find.

If, however, it should be conceded that this was an offence, unless there has been a punishment previously affixed by law, we are still powerless, and must arrest these proceedings. By what authority can we award any punishment, or imprisonment, in preference to any other? There is none in the constitution, and there is no law on the subject. What necessary connection is there between contempt and imprisonment? They seem to be spoken of as if one was a necessary consequence of the other. It arises, Mr. Speaker, from the provisions of the common law, and the usages of the British Parliament, which are fastened about our recollections, and are difficult to be shaken off. We forget that the powers of the House of Commons depend on precedents formed by their own decisions, and ours only on special grants in the constitution. This House alone cannot create a punishment which has not been affixed by law; by both branches of the legislature. An apt illustration of the idea is found in the provisions of the constitution, which define treason, and empower Congress to prescribe the punishment. If this power had never been exercised, and no statute had been enacted to declare the punishment, no court in this country could have created one. No judge would have dared to pass a sentence of death, or imprison for a day. The vilest traitor that ever lived, can be punished only according to law in this land. The same observations apply to piracy, and felonies, committed on the high seas. Until Congress shall exercise the powers given by the constitution, and define the crimes and declare the punishment, no tribunal in this country can supply the defect, and dare to punish according to the common law, or in any other way. If we can impose a penalty, which has not been assigned to a specific crime, there is then no boundary to our powers. When we determine that this House possess the power of punishment, then the species or degree is only matter of selection. Who can prescribe the limit? We have no standard to regulate or bind our power, but our own feeling. We can range through every gradation of punishment, from a simple reprimand to death. And when the principle of punishment is decided, we may tomorrow be boldly debating whether we shall reprimand, imprison, brand, or gibbet this man. If this resolution be rejected, we shall, in effect, decide that the House of Representatives possess the power not only of declaring any act an offence, but of selecting and inflicting a punishment heretofore unknown to the laws, and even to ourselves. These are indeed tremendous powers, and such as I believe have never been granted.

Mr. FORSYTH, of Georgia, said, it is admitted that we have power to suppress disorder in the gallery, to remove the offender from the hall. Is not this removal of a citizen of the United States, of a freeman, from your gallery, in which, while it continues open, he has as much right to sit there as we have to sit here, a punishment for a crime or contempt which he has committed? Is it not, if not justified by law, an assault, and false imprisonment, for which the officer acting under your orders is answerable, by suit and by indictment? Whence arises the power? Will gentlemen point to the clause of the constitution which confers it? Here then is a case in which, from the necessity of the case, no gentleman will venture to deny the existence of the authority to punish, and the propriety of its exercise. But does it stop here? Are we permitted to remove the nuisance only beyond the walls of this room. Extends it no farther? Cannot our deliberations be interrupted at the door, and on the staircase? The same reasoning will apply to all portions of the House and to the street. Does it stop here? Will you permit the beating of drums and the firing of cannon under your windows, in the street, in front of this hall? Can we not remove such nuisances, and prevent their recurrence, by the punishment of those who caused them, for their contempt to this body? Certainly no one can deny it. We have, therefore, by admission, the power within and without these walls. Where is the limit, Mr. F. said? It was limited only by the jurisdiction of the United States, because to the extent of the jurisdiction was the necessity of the legitimate exercise of the power.

Mr. F. did not conceive those clauses of the constitution, quoted by the gentleman from New York, applicable to the present case. The person in custody is charged with a contempt, punished summarily in all cases—not for an offence indictable and punishable by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings. Every gentleman, whether of the profession of the law or not, will know the distinction, and that these clauses of the constitution were framed without any view to the exercise of this power to punish contempts, and without any intention to prevent its exercise.

But we are told, that this miserable man is called here to answer to some unknown law. He was somewhat at loss to understand the force of the remark; if it was meant to convey the idea, that there is no law of Congress defining the bribery of a member of Congress as a crime, and affixing an appropriate punishment, it was true. But if it meant, what it can only mean, if used with an application to this case, that we propose to make an action, in itself innocent, criminal, and punishable, Mr. T. said, he must express his astonishment at the declaration. Ignorant indeed must be that man, who does not know that this action was not criminal in the highest degree. Every man carries in his own bosom a faithful monitor, instructing him how enormous is such an offence. He has committed an offence against a law known to him and to all mankind, for which, Mr. F. trusted, he would be punished as far as the power of the House would permit.

Mr. F. said, the gentleman from New York acknowledged the force of percedents in judicial proceedings; there they are highly useful landmarks, not to be departed from without danger; but in legislative proceedings they are dangerous things. Mr. F. could not perceive the propriety of the distinction. A precedent in one place is omnipotent; in another a succession of precedents are to be disregarded. The judgments pronounced in similar cases, by the House of Representatives, were assailed, on the ground that they were established under the influence of passion. The gentleman, Mr. F. apprehended, had not examined the history of the cases to which he referred; he would find that they were established on due deliberation. If he would compare the conduct of this House, and that of the House of Representatives in '96, in the case of Randall and Whitney, he would find that sufficient cooling time had been furnished the House of Representatives before the commission of the fact. This House, yesterday, under the influence of violent indignation, adopted unanimously the proposition to arrest the offender. To-day we are cool enough to examine with critical accuracy and scrutinizing care, into the extent of our constitutional authority to protect ourselves from the approaches of corruption, or the assaults of violence, while in the performance of our public duties. In the case of Randall, the offender was brought day after day before the House; he had counsel who defended his cause, and urged all the suggestions in his favor which his case would justify. He was, by a majority of four to one, deliberately condemned and deliberately punished, by a confinement of three weeks, for the contempt he had committed.

Mr. BARBOUR, of Virginia, said, that he was induced to ask the indulgence of the House whilst he submitted his view of this subject, not only because there was a great constitutional question involved, but because he had acquiesced in the issue of the warrant, upon which he was now decidedly of opinion that the House ought no further to proceed.

We are called upon, said he, to decide this question: whether the House of Representatives have the power to punish the person at its bar, for an attempt to bribe the chairman of one of its committees. After the most mature deliberation which he had been able to bestow upon the subject, he said he was satisfied that the House had not that power; that he would endeavor to state, as succinctly as he could, the reasons upon which that opinion was founded.

The attempt imputed to the person at the bar of the House, and about which there was no doubt, in point of fact, seemed to him to present itself in these two points of view: First, as a crime, to be punished because of its own enormity; secondly, as a breach of the privileges of a member of this House. As to the first proposition there could be but one opinion. The act complained of is one of the most abhorrent kind; but the word crime, ex vi termini, imported a violation of some law, either in the omission of some act enjoined by it, or in the commission of some act forbidden by it. That law must have been enacted by the legislative power—that is, by the consent of the two Houses of Congress. Now, as it was conceded on all hands that no such law had passed, as it was clear that no such law could now pass, so as by an ex post facto operation to relate back, and embrace this case; as, too, the execution of a law, by the infliction of punishment, belonged to judicial cognizance, the conclusion followed, too clearly to require further comment, that the act committed, or attempted to be committed, could not be punished by this House as a crime within itself. He spoke not here of the common law, which punishes crimes against the laws of morality—that law did not exist in relation to the United States; and if it did, this was not the tribunal to enforce it. We come now, said Mr. B., to the great question in this case, it is this: Was the attempt complained of a breach of the privileges of a member of this House? He said he would attempt to show that it was not.

If, indeed, this question was to be decided by the Lex Parliamentaria of Great Britain, he would not undertake to say what might be the decision; but, said he, we have a much better and surer guide—we have the Constitution of the United States to point out the course which we ought to pursue. It was that instrument, he said, which called into existence every department of the Federal Government, and which created this House as a branch of one of those departments; it was that which marked out the powers of the Legislature as a whole, and the powers of this House as a constituent part, as well as the privileges of its members.

By reference to the constitution, it would be found that the matter of privilege was not left to construction. The framers of that instrument were deeply versed in the nature and history of Parliamentary privileges. They knew that, though they were undefined, because they had been said to be undefinable, they were marked with one strong characteristic feature—that they had perpetually advanced, that they had never retrograded. They, therefore, in the sixth section of the first article of the constitution, had accurately defined the privileges of members; they made them to consist, first, in a qualified exemption "from arrest during their attendance at the session of their respective Houses, and in going to, and returning from, the same;" and, secondly, "that for any speech or debate in either House, they shall not be questioned in any other place." Here, then, was the extent of our privileges.

He thought that, according to this universal principle of construction, that the mention of one thing was the exclusion of another, it was obvious that the constitution had intended to restrain privilege, and tie it down to the particular cases stated in the section which he had just cited. But to put this subject in a point of view, if possible, still stronger, he begged leave to refer the House to the third section of Jefferson's Manual, in which will be found an enumeration of the privileges claimed by the British Parliament. That enumeration embraced, besides many others, the two cases mentioned in the constitution. Hence it must be most obvious, that the constitution did not intend to adopt the Parliamentary law upon the subject of privilege; because, as that covered a much larger ground, if it had been intended to have given the whole, it is difficult, if not impossible, to assign a reason why it should have been thought necessary, by special enumeration, to have given a part.

There was no man in the House, he said, who could hold the attempt which had been made in greater abhorrence than himself; but whilst he considered it a daring attempt at wickedness, an outrageous insult to the feelings of the member, and as calculated to excite the detestation of all good men, yet it was not, as he thought he had proven, a breach of privilege. If it were not, then there could be no principle on which the House could pretend to take cognizance of it. There were many insults which might be offered to the members of this House, for which they had no remedy but those which were open to every other citizen. And, indeed, he referred the House to the same section of the parliamentary manual, to which he had before called their attention, to show, that, in a case of acknowledged breach of privilege, as, for example, the arrest of a member, the effect of such unauthorized arrest is, that the member is entitled to be discharged, and the persons concerned in the arrest, are liable to action or indictment for their injurious violation of the member's privilege; but he did not believe that even in that case, the House could inflict any punishment on the persons concerned for a contempt itself. But gentlemen had taken another ground in debating this subject; they had said that the mere creation of a legislative body, ipso facto, imparted to that body certain rights, and, amongst others, the right of self-defence; that as they had the power, so it was their duty to keep themselves pure; and for that purpose, to punish any attempt upon the integrity of its members. This reasoning, said Mr. B., is too broad. Congress is the creature of the constitution; it has, therefore, as he had observed in a former part of his argument, just those powers, and those only, which the constitution had given it; and whatever powers are not given, we must be content to think were not thought necessary. To Congress, composed of the two Houses, it had given the legislative power which it granted. But this was clearly no act of legislation; first, because it was a proceeding proposed to be carried on by one branch of Congress; and, secondly, because it did not propose to provide a punishment for future cases, but to inflict it upon one which had already occurred. But, besides the legislative power granted to Congress, as composed of the two Houses, there were certain powers granted to each of the Houses respectively. Let us then see what are given to the House of Representatives. They are all to be found in the second and fifth sections of the first article. He said there was no power given the House affirmatively to inflict punishment upon persons not members for any offence either against the House or its members. Was it to be inferred from the powers which were given? So far from it, he said, that he thought the inference deducible from the nature of the powers given almost irresistible, that such power was not intended. The great argument had been that the creation of the Legislature imparted to it certain inherent powers as a part of its nature and existence. Now, sir, said he, let me ask, what power could be more inherent, in a legislative body, than that of appointing their own Speaker? And yet this power is expressly given. What could be more inherent than the power to determine their own rules of proceeding? And yet this was expressly given. What could be more inherent than the right of punishing one of its own members for disorderly behavior? And yet this was expressly given. He asked whether the giving powers like these, which, if there be any such thing as inherent powers, would have been so considered, did not incontestably prove that the constitution meant not to leave this subject to doubtful construction, but, on the contrary, to give to the whole of the legislative body which it created, as well as to its several parts, the laws of its and their existence, and to impart to them, by grant, the powers necessary to the performance of their several functions. Sir, the framers of the constitution meant to guard as carefully against the latitudinous construction which might be given to indefinite powers, as they did against indefinite privileges; they therefore determined to bring down both power and privilege to a constitutional standard, so that they might be easily measured. It would have been a vain thing to have circumscribed Congress in its legislative power, if the two Houses which compose it had been left, like the British Parliament, to range at large, in the wide field of inherent powers, and indefinite privileges. If, said Mr. B., the House had power to take cognizance of this case, and to punish it, where would they stop? This insult or this attempt upon one of the members was committed, not in this House, but in the District of Columbia. Suppose it had been committed in an extreme part of the United States, would our jurisdiction have reached the offender there, and should our Sergeant-at-Arms have been sent to arrest him? The consequences to which this doctrine would lead, seemed to him to show that it could not be sustained. Nor, said he, is there so much danger to be apprehended from the contrary doctrine, as gentlemen seem to suppose; he thanked God the attempts which had been made were but few, and in each instance had failed; if they should hereafter be repeated, he hoped and believed there was a long, very long, tract of future time between us and that period when they should prevail; if any attempt of this kind fail, the man who makes it is foiled in his wicked effort, and covered with disgrace; if unhappily it should ever succeed, we have a constitutional remedy at hand: by expulsion, we may drive from us the unworthy member, and, having cut off the gangrenous limb, the rest of the political body will be restored to health. True, sir, the expulsion of a member requires the concurrence of two-thirds; but does any gentleman doubt for a moment, but that if the acceptance of a bribe were proven, two-thirds, aye, three-thirds, would instantly unite in a vote for the expulsion of him who should have accepted?

Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, said there was one thing, at least, in which he would most heartily concur with the gentleman from New York, who had offered these resolutions to the House; that, the exercise of the power of committing for a contempt of this body, was of so embarrassing a character; and was, in some respects, so little consonant with the general principles to which we yield our assent, that it was desirable another mode should be adopted of punishing offences of so deep a dye, without bringing the offender for his trial and punishment before the body whose privileges had been infringed, and whose dignity had been insulted. It was for this reason, that, on a former day, he had intimated an intention of submitting to the consideration of the House a resolution similar to one of those now under consideration, directing a bill to be reported for the punishment of the offence of bribing, or attempting to corrupt a member of Congress. It was for this reason also, that, however heinous the offence of the party whose case was now before the House, he was, on the present occasion, disposed to manifest towards him the greatest moderation and forbearance. He was so averse to the exercise of a power to punish, where the offence and the punishment are so undefined, and where the tribunal which judges cannot fail to be animated with indignation against the offender, that he was inclined, on the present occasion, to dismiss the party, after the offence had been inquired into, without farther punishment than the reprimand of the Speaker; and to provide for any future case by the enaction of a law imposing penalties adequate to the offence.

But, while he was disposed to this course, he could not assent to the proposition of the gentleman from New York, which disavows any authority in this House to punish the offence, as a contempt. It appeared to him essential that this power should exist in the House of Representatives, though it might be wise in them to relieve themselves for the future from the embarrassment of exercising the privilege themselves, by providing for its punishment by law. While he could not doubt of the constitutional powers of the House on this occasion, he would ask gentlemen what would be our situation, if we were without such powers? What would be the effect of promulgating to the world that the House of Representatives was, at all times, to be approached with impunity by the vilest corruption? That bribes might be offered, without hazard, by the most infamous of mankind, and that the constitution had left this body without the means of preserving pure the fountains of legislation, and of protecting itself from so vile a contamination! He should hesitate much before he should adopt a proposition which might lead to such dangerous results; and he should be diligent in examining the principles of the constitution before he could give his assent to a doctrine which would sap the purity of this body, for the preservation of which that constitution was so solicitous.

Nor was he disposed to coincide in the opinion of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. BARBOUR,) that, as it is at least doubtful whether we possess the power asserted, we should decline the exercise of it. He was not satisfied that there was a reasonable doubt of our powers. Ingenuity may throw obscurity and difficulty around every proposition. Nor did he perceive what part of the constitution prescribed to us as a rule, to reject the exercise of every power where doubt could be thrown around it. On the contrary, in taking the solemn oath to support the constitution, to which another gentleman had so emphatically alluded, he felt himself equally bound to preserve to the Federal Government, and to this body, their just powers, as to guard against encroachment on the rights of the State, or an extension of the powers of the Union. It was equally the duty of every member of this body to prevent the most vigorous and useful branches from being lopped off, as to array himself in opposition to every assertion of unconstitutional powers. Upon all occasions of this kind, however doubtful and embarrassed might be the question, it was the solemn duty of every member to examine it according to the best lights which Heaven has given him, and to pronounce fearlessly the result. It was this course he should endeavor to pursue in presenting a very few remarks on the constitutional powers of this House.

There were, he observed, two kinds of powers granted by this constitution: enumerated powers, and incidental or accessory powers; the first expressly specified in the constitution, the latter falling under the general grant of all "necessary and proper powers;" which terminates the enumeration of the powers conferred on the General Government. The latter, indeed, would have existed independent of that clause, since, according to the principles of common reason, when a power is given to do an act, a power of employing the means necessary to its execution is also given, by implication.

While, therefore, it is readily admitted, in relation to these two classes of powers, that the power now asserted is not expressly given, it is confidently alleged to be fairly incidental to the power of legislation; and it will be contended —That the power to punish bribery of a mem ber of this House, is vested somewhere in the Federal Government; and, that this power of punishing belongs to the House of Representatives, independent of the other branches of Government.

That a legislative body should exist without any power to punish the offence of bribing its members, is a proposition which seems too monstrous to be alleged. Hence it is that gentlemen seem disposed to acknowledge a power in the Legislature to pass a law which shall prescribe a punishment for the offence, though they deny the power of this House to proceed to consider and treat it as a contempt. And where, let me ask, can gentlemen who are so technically accurate in the construction of the constitution, discover that clause of the instrument which expressly grants the power to enact such a law? There is none. The boundaries of the constitution cannot be laid down with mathematical precision, by the square and compass. They must be ascertained by the principles of sound reason and common sense, and by the exercise of a just discretion. While, therefore, we cannot discover the power even to legislate on this subject, in the express provision of the instrument, it is doubtless fairly incidental to the power of legislation. It is inconceivable that the convention which framed the constitution should have intended the creation of a legislative body, which should be without the power of self-protection; without the right to assume to itself freedom from disturbance; without the means of securing order in its deliberations; and without the privilege of preserving itself entirely free from the influence of fear, or the corruptions of gold. Some of these incidents to legislation, gentlemen have been compelled to admit. In what a situation should we be, if our deliberations were to be affected by the hisses or the applause of the gallery; if an obnoxious member were to be put down by the threats or tumult of the audience, and a favorite speaker cheered on a favorite subject by shouts of approbation? Can gentlemen deny that we have power to prevent these things? The gentleman from Virginia appears to confine us, even under these circumstances, to the remedy of excluding those who are riotous. Within the walls alone have we power to act, and then only power to exclude —not to punish. Suppose, then, the rioter returns, or betakes himself to the street, and throws stones at your windows. He is without your doors. Have you no power over him? Have you not accessarily even those powers which every court of justice possesses, without the express provisions of law? If you have not, the situation of this body is deplorable indeed. If you have, where will you draw the line of distinction? What is more important, even in the order and decorum of the House, than the preserving the mind of every member free from the suggestions of fear—the seductions of profit —the grovelling desire of gain—the influence of corruption? What shall we say if an attempt be made to control, by threats or by a challenge, the free and deliberate exercise of his judgment, by the representative of the people? Though the challenge be given without the walls, is not its effect to be felt within; and is it not this (and not the place where the act is done) which must be considered as determining the powers of Congress? The principle on which it can interfere in any case, is the right to prevent its deliberations from being disturbed; and whether this disturbance be produced by an act in the gallery, in the street, in the highway, or in the closet, the body must equally have the power to secure to itself the exercise of free will in the discharge of its legislative functions. And if these principles be correct—if they justify a right to punish occasional disorder, how much more important the privilege of preventing the inroads of corruption, at the same time so insidious and so fatal?

Mr. Mercer rose immediately after Mr. Tucker, and addressed the House in substance as follows:

The resolutions on your table, Mr. Speaker, involve the decision of three distinct propositions. Has this House the power to punish contempt? Is the act charged upon the prisoner a contempt? Have the proceedings of the House been such as to warrant his further prosecution?

Does this house derive from the constitution the power of punishing a contempt? My honorable colleague, who just preceded me, in a spirit of accommodation, I have no doubt, has proposed to introduce a bill to punish by law an attempt to bribe a member of Congress. If the power of punishing such an act is comprehended among the privileges of this House, the wisdom of any such law may well be questioned. Were the contemplated law restricted to a description of that particular species of contempt to which our consideration is now turned, it would not lead to the inference that this House recognized no other. And if, to obviate this difficulty, a complete enumeration were attempted of every possible insult to the privileges, rights, and dignity of this House, the proposed law would be swelled to the size of the largest volume on your table. It may also be doubted whether a right which this House does not derive from the constitution can be created or protected by an act of ordinary legislation. Those gentlemen who are desirous for a law to define the privileges of this House, and to provide for punishing the contempt of them, admit their existence, as well as the power of this House to punish their violation, by the mode of reasoning which they have adopted.

Before I inquire into the origin of this power, allow me to disavow every feeling which could militate against the most deliberate and impartial exercise of my judgment. I cannot but deplore the unhappy situation of the prisoner, whose head is bleached by the snows of many winters, and who, if really guilty of the atrocious act imputed to him, is an object of still greater commiseration, as his turpitude is without the extenuation of youth or inexperience.

Sir, said Mr. M., I never beheld a criminal arraigned at the bar of justice without this feeling, nor have I found it difficult to obey the legal injunction to believe the innocence of the accused until he has been heard in his defence and judicially convicted. This maxim of Christian charity it comprehended in that admirable system of practical wisdom which has been repeatedly referred to in this discussion; a system matured by the experience of ages, adopted by the universal assent of the people of the United States, and denominated the common law.

It is to this system that I resort for the authority of this House to punish a contempt; to define the act to be punished; to determine the mode of proceeding against the accused; and, if guilty, to ascertain the quality, and measure the extent of his punishment.

And I do so, not because the common law confers these powers on this House, but because it defines that written constitution from which we derive them.

Sir, there is not an entire article, not a solitary section, scarcely a line of that instrument, which can be correctly understood or practically enforced, without a recurrence to this law.

If you desire to know the import of an English word, you turn to the lexicographer of England; for a phrase of statutory law you consult the statute which contains it, and the precedents by which it has been expounded. The terms of the common law must be also defined by a recurrence to the law itself, comprised in the treatises and illustrated by the history of the nation from whom we derive it.

The constitution not only uses the terms and phrases of this law, but expressly recognizes its existence. The seventh article of the amendments provides, that "in suits at common law, when the value of the controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved: and no fact tried by a jury shall be otherwise re-examined in any court of the United States than according to the rules of the common law;" of that law which gentlemen have asserted to have no existence under this Government, and against which the honorable member from New York would inspire us with apprehension and alarm.

I appeal to my colleagues, if this constitution had been formed contemporaneously with that of Virginia, would not the same power to punish contempts attach to the House of Representatives and Senate of the United States, as unquestionably belongs to the corresponding branches of the General Assembly, the House of Delegates and Senate of Virginia? From the form of the Speaker's chair to the power of expelling a member, the character and authority of the House of Delegates is derived, without any express constitutional provision, from the House of Commons, the archetype of the popular branch of every State Legislature, as it is of this House.

The force of the argument which this analogy furnishes, is not impaired by the consideration that the Federal Constitution is of more recent structure. It is the act of the people of the United States, as itself proclaims; and, referring expressly to the common law, in one of its articles, unintelligible throughout, except by the aid of that law, we have a right to resort to its maxims in the present inquiry. If this power is essential to the House of Commons, so it must be presumed that the people of these States regarded it to be, and so must we consider it in relation to the two Houses of this Legislature.

It has been urged that many extravagant doctrines would arise from this source of constructive authority. Where, it is asked, shall this House stop in its use? The Revolution of 1776 answers this question. It necessarily lopped off the regal and aristocratical branches of this law. This limitation of the common law relieves the rule of construction, for which I contend, from all that could alarm our fears. It is founded, I am inclined to believe, in judicial decisions throughout the United States. By the unanimous judgment of the General Court, the highest criminal tribunal of Virginia, the principle has been extended so far as to authorize a defendant, indicted for a libel at common law, to give the truth in evidence. This House derives, therefore, from the common law, no privileges which it ought not to possess.

One of my colleagues has contended that all the privileges of this House are expressly enumerated by the sixth section of the first article of the constitution, and restricted to exemption from arrest, in certain specified cases; and from responsibility elsewhere for any speech or debate in the House. And hence, with great apparent plausibility, he infers that the House possesses no other privilege, and has authority to punish no other contempts, except such as are committed in violation of these. I answer to this argument, it has already been contended by the honorable member who last addressed the House, that this clause of the constitution may be justly regarded as the result of that extreme caution which induced the convention to insert in it what might otherwise have been inferred; a caution which is discernible in other parts of this instrument. To the illustration which he has furnished, many others may be added; as, for example, the very first article of the amendments. The greater part of these are designed to serve the purpose of a bill of rights, for which so many opponents of the constitution had most zealously contended. It cannot be presumed that if this amendment had not been made a part of the constitution, Congress would have prohibited the free exercise of religion, have abridged the freedom of speech, or obstructed the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition for a redress of grievances. I am, however, led involuntarily to another explanation of the expediency of expressly incorporating in the constitution the two privileges to which my colleague has referred; an explanation, which is in strict harmony with all the views that I have taken of the general power of this House to punish contempts of its privileges. Every other privilege of this House, except those which are enumerated, will be found to be consistent with the obvious and equal rights of the people. The enumerated privileges are limitations of those rights, and, but for the express grant of them by the people, it might have been doubted whether the character of our republican institutions did not forbid their exercise. In fine these enumerated privileges protect the members of this House, against the common and dearest rights of the citizen—the rights of property and reputation. The privileges for which I contend would protect the House from their injuries, from fraud, violence, and injustice.

Mr. Robertson supported the resolutions.

Mr. Ervin, of South Carolina, next rose, and said,

I beg leave now, sir, to call your attention to what I conceive to be the privileges of the House, and the powers of the House to punish for a breach of those privileges. The first great power which it possesses is an inherent power of self-defence, analogous to the fundamental natural right which every man possesses of defending himself. It is in both cases merely defensive. The natural right results from man's relative situation in this state of existence. The duties which he owes to his God, his neighbor, and himself, beget, rather let me say, impose on him this power; nay, the obligation of self-defence is necessary to a complete discharge of those great duties. In like manner, every article in your constitution which confides a trust or imposes an obligation to perform for the good of the people acts of legislation, creates and gives this power to enable you to perform those acts, and discharge, with due faith, the high trust which has been confided to you; and as, in the exercise of the natural right, a man is justified to make use of any force necessary to repel a personal injury, so, likewise, in the exercise of your inherent power, this House is justified to prevent or remove any annoyance within or without the walls of this House, which would tend to disturb its deliberations, or prevent it from the due performance of any of its duties. But, sir, you would not in either case be justified to make use of any force or restraint by way of punishment; for, in the case of the natural right, the use of any force, other than that which is necessary to overcome the offending force, would constitute an act of aggression. So, the exercise of force by the House, in the way of punishment, would not be justified by the inherent power, it being merely defensive. The exemption from arrest, and the privilege of not being questioned in any other place for any speech or debate in either House, constitute more of your privileges; for, although they tend to promote the immediate benefit of members in their individual capacity, they are yet the privileges of the House; and the House can, in both cases, punish any member who should waive his privilege without their consent.

These, sir, are, in my estimation, the legitimate and constitutional privileges of Congress; and yet, sir, for the want of legal provision, they may with impunity be trampled on and set at defiance, not only by the defendant at your bar, but by any man in this great community. Is it correct, sir, to say that this inherent right extends beyond the limits which I have assigned it? That, by virtue of our election, we are politically amalgamated, and that the reception of an insult on the shores of the Atlantic would tremble along the sympathetic line, and agonize your feelings beyond the mountains? No, sir; I contend that out of the boundaries of this District we have no protection, no privilege, except those granted by the first article of the sixth section of the constitution, other than the protection of other great and good men—that of virtue, and the privilege of convicting falsehood with truth, and confounding guilt by innocence. Mr. Speaker, behold the delicacy of our situation! A man arraigned at your bar for a most atrocious insult, and yet we have not the power to punish him. Although armed with plenary sovereignty, and the exclusive powers of legislation in all cases whatever in this District; although invested with authority to make all laws which may be necessary and proper to carry into execution all our powers, and to punish the breach of any of our privileges, yet we suffer these powers to slumber in criminal repose. As we pass along the streets, scorn may point the finger of contempt at us, defamations may teem from the press, arraigning the correctness of our conduct, and impeaching the purity of our intentions; nay, impudence and insolence may beard us at the very threshold of the great council of the nation, and without the provisions of law we cannot punish. Much has been said, sir, about State Legislatures, the judges of the United States, and State judges, possessing the power of punishing for contempt. I can speak with confidence in relation to this power in the State which I have the honor of representing. There, the Legislature, the judges, and even the justices of the peace, possess this power, not by arbitrary assumption, but by the provisions of the constitution and the principles of the common law, made of force in that State by an act of the colonial government, and which act is recognized and continued in force by a provision in the constitution of that State. In relation to the judges of the courts of the United States, we all know that they derive their power from an act of Congress which recognizes the principles of the common law. And I think, upon inquiry, it will be ascertained that the Legislatures and judges of the several States possess this power by some provision in their laws or constitutions. Numerous precedents have been appealed to. I shall not suffer my mind, sir, to be governed, nay, influenced, by any precedents which, in my judgment, sanction error. It is, moreover, contended that, admitting there is no express provision in the constitution which gives, without the aid of legislation, a power to punish in case of a breach of privilege, yet that this House, on account of the difficulty of annexing a punishment adequate to every breach of privilege, does possess a discretionary power ex necessitate rei. Mr. Speaker, it is no compliment to say that I would as lief trust this dangerous power in the possession of this honorable body as in any other known to our institutions; for in every case in which corruption has dared to approach you with its impurity, or raise its detestable glance to the elevation of your virtues, you have uniformly repelled it with indignant contempt. But, sir, I am unwilling to trust this power with any man or body of men. The time may come when our political virtue may have passed away; when corruption may have sapped the foundation of our boasted institutions; when the independence of this House may be lost, and seen bowing, with sycophantic smiles, at the shrine of Executive favor; nay, sir, when the very exertion of the physical force of the people will but operate to their own destruction. It is on these accounts that I wish all our proceedings may be sanctioned by law and constitution. I feel a desire that gentlemen who advocate this power would pause a moment, and analyze its character. It is plenary sovereignty, armed with powers, legislative, judicial, and executive. It is a power capable of passing laws ex post facto; of declaring that act criminal, ex re nata, which before was innocent. It is a power unknown and undefined, which lies dormant until, in a moment of angry feeling, it proclaims its laws, which are carried into execution by infuriated justice. Odious tyranny! Most frightful despotism! More terrible than the laws of Caligula, or the rescript of the Roman Emperors.

SATURDAY, January 10.

John Anderson's Case.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following letter and enclosure, yesterday received by him from John Anderson:

JANUARY 9, 1818.

SIR: Unwilling to be deprived, by any circumstances whatever, of an opportunity to explain to the honorable House of Representatives the motives which have actuated my recent conduct, I beg leave to announce my wish to waive, with that object, any constitutional or other question which may have arisen.

I enclose a letter which I had the honor this morning to prepare for the consideration of the House.

I am, sir, with profound respect,

JOHN ANDERSON.

HON. HENRY CLAY,
Speaker of the House of Reps.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 9, 1818.

SIR: Considering the honorable body before whose bar I am shortly to appear as the guardian of those rights which, as a citizen, I possess, and relying upon the generous feelings of its members, I have been induced to forego the privilege extended to me of employing counsel, lest it might be supposed that I was inclined to shelter myself by legal exceptions. As the novelty of my situation may, however, tend to surround me with embarrassment, it is my wish, should the rule of proceeding adopted by the House not oppose the course, that such questions as I have reduced to writing, be propounded to the respective witnesses by the Clerk, and that he should read the explanation and apology which I have to make.

JOHN ANDERSON.

HON. HENRY CLAY,
Speaker of the House of Reps.

The letter having been read—

Mr. FORSYTH rose to move that these resolutions be laid on the table. We owe it, said Mr. F., to our own dignity, to the dignity of the members of this House, that the investigation of the offence of John Anderson should proceed. The inquiry which has arisen into the extent of the privileges and powers of the House may be resumed afterwards, and decided. But let us see, said he, what will be the consequence of our proceeding in the present course, and being diverted by this inquiry from the examination of the accused. A person offers a bribe to a member of this House, the House orders the offender into custody—the letter of the accused, which is the foundation and the evidence of the charge, refers to certain officers of the Government, and members of this House, as prepared to support the claims to which he alludes. Instead of calling this person before us, and seeing how far we can substantiate the charge, the proceeding is stopped, by the resolutions before us, and the protracted debate which follows. May not this course, said Mr. F., put a strange construction on the matter? Malicious persons may say, and there are many such, it is the intention of the House to stifle a dangerous inquiry, not to settle an important constitutional question. To avoid any possibility of such an imputation, let us, said Mr. F., suspend the consideration of these resolutions, and proceed in the examination of the accused.

Mr. PITKIN observed, that the object of the resolutions was, to turn the accused over to the Executive officers; if they pass, the United States Attorney would be directed to prosecute him. But why not, before this, said Mr. P., bring the accused before us, and hear his explanation on the subject? An additional reason for this course, Mr. P. thought, was the request of the accused to come before the House. After examining and hearing him, Mr. P. said, the House could decide whether they ought to pass the resolutions, and turn him over to another tribunal.

Mr. SPENCER said, the remarks of Mr. PITKIN applied only to the second resolution, and not to the first; and he hoped the motion would not be agreed to. He did not, he said, possess such a feeling of dignity as to do, or persevere in any thing which he thought improper; and in the conscientious discharge of his duty he should never look beyond the walls of the House for his motives. In this case, however, said he, malice itself could not impeach the motives of the House; for a proposition to direct the officers of the United States to proceed against the accused, could not, by any ingenuity, be construed into a disposition to stifle the inquiry. He therefore hoped the House would proceed and determine the abstract principle, without any reference to the merits of the case, and without considering whether John Anderson can make an acceptable apology or not.

Mr. HARRISON was in favor of laying the resolutions on the table, and proceeding immediately to the examination of the accused. It was not to be supposed that, because he was one of those referred to by John Anderson, as willing to support his claims, that he felt the slightest wish to avoid an examination of that individual. Mr. H. said, so far from disclaiming a readiness to support the claims of which Anderson is the agent, he felt bound in the strongest manner to aid them. Independently of a conviction of their justice, Mr. H. said, those claims came from a people and a Territory for which he felt a peculiar interest. He was therefore unconscious of any appearance of impropriety in being included among those whom the accused named as disposed to aid in his suit before the House.

Mr. FORSYTH replied to Mr. SPENCER, that all must know the extent of human malignity. Every one acquainted with our political history must, he said, be sensible how far the motives and the conduct of this House may be questioned and misrepresented; and he knew that the ingenuity of malice was such that it could, and probably would, impute false and impure motives to the course which the House was pursuing; and his object was, by going at once into an investigation of the matter, to leave no pretext whatever for a misconstruction of the conduct of the House. The gentleman admitted there was no law under which the person accused could be indicted; to refer him to the Attorney-General or District Attorney then was idle; we know no investigation can take place.

Mr. HOPKINSON was unfriendly to the motion to lay the resolutions on the table. After all, it was a mere question of order in the proceeding; but, he said, as the question had already been discussed much at large, and as it must be decided in the end, he thought it was better to do so now, after having gone so far into it, than afterwards to have all that has been done to go over again. At any rate, Mr. H. hoped the House would not abandon the question without bringing it to a decision. A strong reason for prosecuting the inquiry now before the House was, Mr. H. said, that a majority of the gentlemen who delivered their sentiments were on one side; and those on the other side, he said, ought to have an opportunity of submitting also their views of it. He had no idea that the House wished to shrink from an investigation of the latter, whatever appearance it might have, or might be given to it.

Mr. POINDEXTER said, that although he denied the power of the House to punish the individual who had been arrested under the warrant of the Speaker, and whose case was under consideration, he should vote to lay the resolutions offered by Mr. SPENCER on the table. The letter addressed by the accused to the Speaker, which had been read for the information of the House, proposes, on his part, submission to the authority of the House, with a view to explanations and apologies, which he says he is prepared to make. I am willing, said Mr. P., to afford him this opportunity. If the House should be satisfied, after hearing the excuse which may be made by the accused, for his extraordinary conduct, or the apology which he may offer in mitigation of the offence, we shall be enabled to waive for the present a decision of the great constitutional question which has been raised on this occasion, and which is calculated to embarrass the proceedings, and occupy much of the time of this body. With a hope that this might be the result of the proposed explanation, and that suitable provision may be made by law for similar cases, should they hereafter occur, and thereby remove the embarrassment which we experience in the case now under consideration, Mr. P. said he should support the motion to lay the resolutions on the table.

Mr. DESHA was in favor of laying the resolutions on the table. John Anderson prayed to be heard; and if we find, said Mr. D., that he can exonerate himself from the offence, I wish it to be done; because this debate may continue yet many days, all which time the accused must remain in custody, if not heard before. After his examination the discussion can be resumed, and the question settled.

Mr. RICH inquired whether the accused had expressed a wish to be heard at once. If so, Mr. R. was willing to lay the resolutions on the table, and hear him; but, if not, he was opposed to the motion.

Mr. BEECHER remarked, that one reason with him for not wishing to lay the resolutions on the table was, that he had no idea of receiving a petition from a man who was held in custody. Mr. B. was not disposed to hold the accused in custody a moment longer than he had the right; but he was in favor of first trying if the House possess that right or not. I am not willing, said Mr. B., to get rid of this question by permitting the party to come in here, and give evidence against himself, or by allowing him to come forward and admit our jurisdiction in the case.

Mr. PINDALL made a few remarks in coincidence with those of Mr. POINDEXTER, of which he expressed his approbation.

The motion to lay the resolutions on the table was decided in the negative—ayes about 30.

MONDAY, January 12.

Case of John Anderson.

The following resolutions moved by Mr. RHEA, by way of amendment, being yet under consideration:

"Resolved, That this House possesseth competent power to punish for contempts of its authority.

"Therefore, Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to conduct John Anderson to the bar of the House."

Mr. RHEA, with a view to put his amendment in a shape more acceptable to gentlemen, modified his motion for amendment, so as to make the first resolution read as follows:

"Resolved, That this House possess adequate power to punish for contempts against it."

Mr. PITKIN assigned the reasons why he wished to avoid placing on the Journal any thing affirming the authority of the House on the one hand, or denying it on the other: and, to escape the alternative presented to the House by the proposed resolution and amendment, he moved to postpone indefinitely the consideration of the main question and the amendment proposed thereto.

After some questions to the Chair and explanations therefrom, respecting the effect of such a postponement, that effect was pronounced from the Chair to be, to place the question in the state in which it was when the motion of Mr. SPENCER was first made; and, if this course was pursued, that the House would be at full liberty to take any course in respect to John Anderson, which, in its opinion, was within the scope of its constitutional powers.

Mr. RICH, of Vermont, said he hoped that the motion of the gentleman from Connecticut would not prevail; for, after the very able and long discussion which this subject had undergone, it was due to this House and the nation that the sense of the House should be taken on some proposition distinct from the case of John Anderson, in order (if he might be allowed the expression) that the law may be settled in relation to the principle, so far as it could be done, by a solemn decision of the House. With a view to that object, said he, it was my intention, could I have obtained the floor, to have moved an amendment to the amendment offered yesterday by the gentleman from Tennessee. I therefore hope the motion for a postponement will be rejected, that I may still have an opportunity to submit an amendment, having for its object a disavowal of the right to try and punish for offences, and a declaration that the House will abstain from no measures which may be necessary to preserve its deliberations free from interruption, and its members and officers from insult or injury. In order, then, that the House may be informed of the amendment I propose to offer, should an opportunity be afforded me, I will read in my place the one I had prepared.

[Here Mr. R. read the proposed amendment, and concluded by saying]—

I hope, sir, the subject will not be passed by without a distinct decision of the House upon the principle, aside from all considerations of the guilt or innocence of John Anderson.

After explanatory remarks from various members, among whom were Messrs. RHEA, TALLMADGE, BALLARD SMITH, and CULBRETH—

The question was taken on postponement, and decided in the affirmative—for indefinite postponement 117; against it, 42.

The propositions before the House were indefinitely postponed.

Whereupon, Mr. TALLMADGE offered the following resolution for consideration:

"Resolved, That John Anderson be forthwith brought to the bar of this House."

The question was then taken on the motion that "John Anderson be forthwith brought to the bar of this House," and decided in the affirmative, by yeas and nays—118 to 45.

Whereupon the Sergeant-at-Arms brought the prisoner to the bar, and the SPEAKER propounded to him the following interrogatories, to which he made the replies thereto:

1. Do you acknowledge yourself to be John Anderson? Answer. Yes.

2. Did you write and deliver to Lewis Williams, a member of this House, the letter of which a copy has been furnished to you by the Clerk? Ans. I did.

3. From what part of the city did you write the letter? Ans. I wrote it at Mr. Bestor's, where I board.

4. What is the amount of your own claims, which you are attempting to liquidate? Ans. About $9,000.

5. What is the amount of others which you are soliciting? Ans. About $21,000.

6. Have you any interest in the latter? Ans. None of a pecuniary kind, but am influenced in their pursuit by motives of charity.

7. Had you any authority from the persons you represent to make the offer contained in your letter? Ans. I have a general power-of-attorney to do for them as I would do for myself, but had no instructions to make that or any other offer.

8. Are you acquainted with any persons now in the city soliciting the claims of others? If so, name them. Ans. I am. There is a Mr. Pomeroy, who is soliciting his own claim, and Col. Watson, who is a general agent.

9. Have you made any other offer to any person? Ans. No.

10. Did you consult or advise with any person before you wrote and delivered the letter. Ans. I did not.

11. Who is the Mr. Halbard you mention in the letter? Ans. He is a gentleman I became partially acquainted with during the troubles at the River Raisin. I have not seen him since that time till I arrived in this city at the commencement of the session of Congress, and did not recognize him until he made himself known to me.

12. Has he any claim to solicit? Ans. None to my knowledge.

13. Have you any witnesses to examine, or defence to make, in justification or explanation of your conduct? If you have, the House is now ready to hear you.

The prisoner at the bar then called upon his witnesses, viz: Gen. Harrison, Col. Johnson, members of the House; Mr. R. J. Meigs, Postmaster General; Capt. Gray, Mr. Cyrus Halbard, Capt. Larrabee, Col. Joseph Watson, Mr. John H. Piatt, Capt. S. D. Richardson, Mr. Pomeroy, Lieut. Conway; who, all being previously sworn, delivered in their testimony.

The testimony was uniform, as far as the knowledge of the witnesses extended, in giving the accused a high character for probity, correct deportment, and patriotic conduct. It is too diffuse for publication.

SATURDAY, January 17.

John Anderson's Case.

John Anderson was then remanded to the bar of the House, and proceeded in the further examination of his witnesses.

General P. B. Porter, William O'Neale, and W. P. Rathbone, were then examined as witnesses in behalf of the accused, whose testimony was to the same effect as that given yesterday.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, was then called upon by the accused, who put to him this question:

Question. Did I ever directly or indirectly, by any verbal communication, offer you any reward or inducement, to influence your good opinion in favor of my claim, or of any other claims?

Answer. You never made me any verbal offer of the kind.

John Anderson. That is all I wished the House to know from your testimony.

Mr. Williams. I presume, if you had made me any such offer, the House would have known it, without your asking it.

On further questions by the SPEAKER to John Anderson, it appears that the accused is a native of Scotland, came to this country at three years old, and is a naturalized citizen.

The SPEAKER then said, he had been instructed to propound to the prisoner the following interrogatory, to which John Anderson made the reply subjoined:

Question. In writing the letter to Lewis Williams, a member of this House from North Carolina, in which you offer to him the sum of five hundred dollars, for services to be performed by him in relation to claims for losses sustained during the late war, had you or had you not any intention to induce him to support your claims against his own convictions of their justice, or to interfere with the discharge of his legislative duties, or to offer any contempt or indignity to the House of Representatives?

Answer. No, sir—I call God to witness to that, which is the most sacred appeal I can make. I repeatedly assured him, that the offer was made without any wish to influence his opinion in any degree.

The accused was then questioned whether he had other witnesses to examine; he replied in the negative. The SPEAKER then called upon him for the defence which he had intimated it was his intention to offer.

The prisoner, then addressing the Chair, with much earnestness, in a brief manner, stated the same palliations of the offence with which he stood charged, as are explained more at large in the following address, which he concluded by delivering to the Clerk, by whom it was read:

"Arraigned at the bar of the highest tribunal of the nation, for an alleged infringement of its privileges, an attack upon its dignity, and the honorable feelings of one of its members, to express the sincere regret I experience, and to apologize for the error I have committed, ought not to suffice. To that body and to myself, I owe an explanation of the motives which governed my conduct. That I have been found in the ranks of our country's defenders, is known to many; and that I have sustained a character unblemished by any act which should crimson my withered cheeks, has been amply proven to you, by men, whose good opinions are the greatest boon of merit. The commencement of the late war found me environed by all the comforts of life; blessed with a sufficiency of property to enable me to wipe from the face of distress the falling tear, and to flatter myself that want was not to salute me before the return of peace. The fallacy of my hopes has been too clearly demonstrated, by the ravages of the war on the borders of Raisin, (my residence,) and the destruction of all the property which my industry had amassed. After having seen the streets of Frenchtown overgrown with grass; sighed unavailingly over the ashes of my own and my neighbors' houses, and witnessed their necessities; reduced to sustain life by means of wild animals, (muskrats,) whose very smell is repulsive to the stomach; I gladly hailed the beneficence of my Government in the enactment of the law, usually called the property act, and, in the month of January, 1817, I took leave of my friends and fellow-sufferers, and repaired to this city to manage their claims; on my arrival, I found that the act under which they expected relief had been suspended, and I was forced to return with this unwelcome information; tears of disappointment suffused the countenances of every one—my heart sympathized with theirs, and I then determined to prosecute their claims to a result. With this view, I had been in this city more than a month; over-anxious to accomplish my object, exalted with the success which had attended some of the claims, and convinced that the Committee of Claims was overwhelmed with business, my inexperience in reference to legislative proceedings induced me to suppose that, to insure despatch, I might without impropriety approach the chairman of the committee with a proposal to compensate him for extra trouble. That I have erred, grossly erred, I am convinced, and my only consolation is, that error is no crime, when it is of the head, not of the heart. Had I acted with less precipitation, and consulted the views of others, I should not at this time find myself in the disagreeable dilemma that I am. I should have acted more consistent with myself. Whatever semblance my request of secrecy may assume, I can with truth aver that its basis in my mind was a desire that those for whom I act should have to acknowledge their increased gratitude for the promptitude with which their claims should have been acted upon.

It cannot be denied, that, after being assured that my own claims would be allowed, I had less cause to think of obtaining by corruption the payment of claims which I almost knew the justice of Congress could not refuse in the sequel. Despatch, then, was all I wished for—all I could gain;—and I think that the world and this honorable body will admit that the benefit of the relief would be in proportion to the time which should elapse in affording it; at least, that in this view it would be appreciated by those who have yet fresh in their recollection that a husband, a wife, a father, a child, a brother, or sister, was tomahawked, shot, or burned alive, by the savage enemy, their hearts inhumanly torn from their bodies, and whilst yet smoking with the vital heat, were triumphantly exhibited to their weeping eyes. Let it be recollected that they have witnessed, whilst wandering without shelter, and almost unclothed, the heart-rending scene—dead bodies exposed to the voracious appetites of the swine, and these animals eagerly contending for a leg or an arm! Lest this picture may be supposed to be exaggerated, I annex the correspondence which took place between the Hon. A. B. Woodward and General Proctor, in the year 1813, and shortly after the event occurred. Let it be known that most if not all the articles they could collect from the ruins of their houses were generously—most generously—appropriated in the purchase of prisoners of war, for the purpose of screening them from the bloody tomahawk; that these purchases were made under such circumstances as not to entitle them to reimbursement under the "Act relating to the ransom of American captives of the late war." And let it also be known that such are the sufferings, such the merits of the claimants I represent. And I feel confident that the clouds of indignation which for a moment threatened to burst over my frosty head will be dispelled by the benign influence of philanthropy—an influence which has ever, and I trust ever will, characterize my conduct.

"That I should be anxious to afford a prompt solace to the sufferings of my fellow-citizens will not be wondered at, when it is known that they extended every kindness and protection to my family, (from whom I was separated during the most of the war,) and at a time when the Indians were accustomed to dance before the door of my house, calling upon my wife to come out and select her husband's scalp.

"Relying upon the maxim, that 'To err is human, to forgive divine,' I throw myself upon the indulgence of this honorable body, and the magnanimity of the honorable gentleman whose feelings I have had the misfortune to wound. If my services form no claim to indulgence, perhaps my sufferings and those of my family may. I stand here to meet all the consequences of an error committed without any sinister intention.

"In conclusion, I must be permitted to remark, that, during my confinement, from which I have forborne to adopt any legal measures to extricate myself, the only feelings of pain which have had access to my breast were those produced by the knowledge that an opinion was prevalent, that, presuming on the misfortunes of my fellow-sufferers, I had bought up their claims at a very reduced price. If this honorable body would permit, I would, under the solemnity of an oath, call upon God to bear testimony that this opinion is without basis.

"JOHN ANDERSON.

The prisoner being asked if he had any thing further to say, and answering in the negative, was taken from the bar, and the House proceeded to deliberate on the course now proper to be pursued.

One motion, on which the yeas and nays were taken, is worthy of particular notice. It was made by Mr. POINDEXTER, to strike out of that passage which charged John Anderson with being guilty of a contempt against the privileges of the House, the words the privileges of; thus denying the House to have any privileges not conferred on them by the constitution. This motion was negatived—108 to 54.

The will of the House was ultimately consummated by the passage of a resolution, in the following words:

"Resolved, That John Anderson has been guilty of a contempt and a violation of the privileges of the House, and that he be brought to the bar of the House this day, and be there reprimanded by the Speaker for the outrage he has committed, and then discharged from the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms."

Whereupon, John Anderson was brought to the bar of the House, and addressed by the SPEAKER, as follows:

"John Anderson: You have been brought before this House upon a charge of having committed a breach of its privileges, in attempting to bribe one of its members, filling a high and responsible situation. The House has patiently heard you in your defence, and, in proportion to the pleasure which it has derived from the concurrent testimonies in support of your character and good conduct heretofore, is its deep regret that you have deliberately attempted to commit a crime so entirely incompatible with the high standing you have heretofore maintained. You have the less apology for the attempt which you made, because you had yourself experienced the justice of this House but a few days before, by the passage of two bills in your favor, founded on petitions presented to the House. Your attempt to corrupt the fountain of legislation—to undermine the integrity of a branch of the National Legislature—is a crime of so deep a dye that even you must acknowledge and be sensible of it. And if, John Anderson, you could have been successful in such an attempt—if it were possible that Representatives of the people could have been found so lost to their duty as to accept your offer—you must yourself see the dreadful consequences of such a deplorable state of things: In your turn you might fall a victim; for your rights, your liberty, and your property, might in the end equally suffer with those of others. The House has seen with pleasure, that, at a very early period after making your base offer, you disclaimed, with symptoms of apparent repentance and contrition, any intention to corrupt the integrity of a member; and, in directing me to pronounce your discharge, the House indulges the hope that, on your return home, you will be more fully convinced of the magnitude of your offence, and by the future tenor of your life endeavor to obliterate, as far as it may be possible, the stain your conduct on this occasion has impressed on the high and honorable character you appear to have previously sustained. You are discharged from the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms."

Whereupon, John Anderson was discharged from custody, and the House adjourned to Monday.

TUESDAY, January 20.

General Kosciusko.

Mr. HARRISON submitted the following resolution; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed, jointly with such committee as may be appointed on the part of the Senate, to consider and report what measures it may be proper to adopt to manifest the public respect for the memory of General Thaddeus Kosciusko, formerly an officer in the service of the United States, and the uniform and distinguished friend of liberty and the rights of man.

Mr. HARRISON accompanied his motion with the following observations:

The public papers have announced an event which is well calculated to excite the sympathy of every American bosom! Kosciusko, the martyr of liberty, is no more! We are informed that he died at Soleure, in France, some time in October last.

In tracing the events of this great man's life, we find in him that consistency of conduct which is the more to be admired as it is so rarely to be met with. He was not at one time the friend of mankind, and at another the instrument of their oppression;—but he preserved throughout his whole career those noble principles which distinguished him in its commencement—which influenced him at an early period of his life to leave his country and his friends, and in another hemisphere to fight for the rights of humanity.

Kosciusko was born and educated in Poland, of a noble and distinguished family—a country where the distinctions in society are perhaps carried to greater lengths than in any other. His Creator had, however, endowed him with a soul capable of rising above the narrow prejudices of a caste, and breaking the shackles which a vicious education had imposed on his mind.

When very young, he was informed by the voice of fame that the standard of liberty had been erected in America—that an insulted and oppressed people had determined to be free, or perish in the attempt. His ardent and generous mind caught, with enthusiasm, the holy flame, and from that moment he became the devoted soldier of liberty.

His rank in the American army afforded him no opportunity greatly to distinguish himself. But he was remarked, throughout his service, for all the qualities which adorn the human character. His heroic valor in the field could only be equalled by his moderation and affability in the walks of private life. He was idolized by the soldiers for his bravery, and beloved and respected by the officers for the goodness of his heart, and the great qualities of his mind.

Contributing greatly, by his exertions, to the establishment of the independence of America, he might have remained, and shared the blessings it dispensed, under the protection of a chief who loved and honored him, and in the bosom of a grateful and affectionate people.

Kosciusko had, however, other views. It is not known that, until the period I am speaking of, he had formed any distinct idea of what could, or indeed what ought, to be done for his own. But in the Revolutionary war he drank deeply of the principles which produced it. In his conversations with the intelligent men of our country, he acquired new views of the science of government and the rights of man. He had seen, too, that to be free it was only necessary that a nation should will it, and to be happy it was only necessary that a nation should be free. And was it not possible to procure these blessings for Poland? For Poland, the country of his birth, which had a claim to all his efforts, to all his services? That unhappy nation groaned under a complication of evils which has scarcely a parallel in history. The mass of the people were the abject slaves of the nobles; the nobles, torn into factions, were alternately the instruments and the victims of their powerful and ambitious neighbors. By intrigue, corruption, and force, some of its fairest provinces had been separated from the Republic, and the people, like beasts, transferred to foreign despots, who were again watching for a favorable moment for a second dismemberment. To regenerate a people thus debased—to obtain for a country thus circumstanced the blessings of liberty and independence, was a work of as much difficulty as danger. But, to a mind like Kosciusko's, the difficulty and danger of an enterprise served as stimulants to undertake it.

The annals of these times give us no detailed account of the progress of Kosciusko in accomplishing his great work, from the period of his return from America to the adoption of the new constitution of Poland, in 1791. This interval, however, of apparent inaction, was most usefully employed to illumine the mental darkness which enveloped his countrymen. To stimulate the ignorant and bigoted peasantry with the hope of future emancipation—to teach a proud but gallant nobility that true glory is only to be found in the paths of duty and patriotism—interests the most opposed, prejudices the most stubborn, and habits the most inveterate, were reconciled, dissipated, and broken, by the ascendency of his virtues and example. The storm which he had foreseen, and for which he had been preparing, at length burst upon Poland. A feeble and unpopular Government bent before its fury, and submitted itself to the Russian yoke of the invader. But the nation disdained to follow its example; in their extremity every eye was turned on the hero who had already fought their battles—the sage who had enlightened them, and the patriot who had set the example of personal sacrifices to accomplish the emancipation of the people.

Kosciusko was unanimously appointed Generalissimo of Poland, with unlimited powers, until the enemy should be driven from the country. On his virtue the nation reposed with the utmost confidence; and it is some consolation to reflect, amidst the general depravity of mankind, that two instances, in the same age, have occurred where powers of this kind were employed solely for the purposes for which they were given.

It is not my intention, sir, to follow the Polish chief throughout the career of victory which, for a considerable time, crowned his efforts. Guided by his talents, and led by his valor, his undisciplined, illy-armed militia charged with effect the veteran Russian and Prussian; the mailed cuirassiers of the great Frederick, for the first time, broke and fled before the lighter and appropriate cavalry of Poland. Hope filled the breasts of the patriots. After a long night, the dawn of an apparently glorious day broke upon Poland. But, to the discerning eye of Kosciusko, the light which it shed was of that sickly and portentous appearance, indicating a storm more dreadful than that which he had resisted.

He prepared to meet it with firmness, but with means entirely inadequate. To the advantages of numbers, of tactics, of discipline, and inexhaustible resources, the combined despots had secured a faction in the heart of Poland. And, if that country can boast of a WASHINGTON, it is disgraced also by giving birth to a second Arnold. The day at length came which was to decide the fate of a nation and a hero. Heaven, for wise purposes, determined that it should be the last of Polish liberty. It was decided, indeed, before the battle commenced. The traitor Poniski, who covered with a detachment the advance of the Polish army, abandoned his position to the enemy and retreated.

Kosciusko was astonished, but not dismayed. The disposition of his army would have done honor to Hannibal. The succeeding conflict was terrible. When the talents of the General could no longer direct the mingled mass of combatants, the arm of the warrior was brought to the aid of his soldiers. He performed prodigies of valor. The fabled prowess of Ajax, in defending the Grecian ships, was realized by the Polish hero. Nor was he badly seconded by his troops. As long as his voice could guide, or his example fired their valor, they were irresistible. In this unequal contest Kosciusko was long seen, and finally lost to their view.

"Hope for a season bade the world farewell,
And Freedom shriek'd when Kosciusko fell."

He fell covered with wounds, but still survived. A Cossack would have pierced his breast, when an officer interposed. "Suffer him to execute his purpose," said the bleeding hero; "I am the devoted soldier of my country, and will not survive its liberties." The name of Kosciusko struck to the heart of the Tartar, like that of Marius upon the Cimbrian warrior. The uplifted weapon dropped from his hand.

Kosciusko was conveyed to the dungeons of Petersburg; and, to the eternal disgrace of the Empress Catharine, she made him the object of her vengeance, when he could be no longer the object of her fears. Her more generous son restored him to liberty. The remainder of his life has been spent in virtuous retirement. Whilst in this situation in France, an anecdote is related of him which strongly illustrates the command which his virtues and his services had obtained over the minds of his countrymen.

In the late invasion of France, some Polish regiments in the service of Russia passed through the village in which he lived. Some pillaging of the inhabitants brought Kosciusko from his cottage. "When I was a Polish soldier," said he, addressing the plunderers, "the property of the peaceful citizen was respected." "And who art thou," said an officer, "who addresses us with this tone of authority?" "I am Kosciusko!" There was magic in the word. It ran from corps to corps. The march was suspended. They gathered round him, and gazed, with astonishment and awe, upon the mighty ruin he presented. "Could it indeed be their hero," whose fame was identified with that of their country? A thousand interesting reflections burst upon their minds; they remembered his patriotism, his devotion to liberty, his triumphs, and his glorious fall. Their iron hearts were softened, and the tear of sensibility trickled down their weather-beaten faces. We can easily conceive, sir, what would be the feelings of the hero himself in such a scene. His great heart must have heaved with emotion, to find himself once more surrounded by the companions of his glory; and that he would have been upon the point of saying to them—

"Behold your General! come once more
To lead you on to laurel'd victory,
To fame, to freedom."

The delusion could have lasted but for a moment. He was himself, alas! a miserable cripple; and, for them! they were no longer the soldiers of liberty, but the instruments of ambition and tyranny. Overwhelmed with grief at the reflection, he would retire to his cottage, to mourn afresh over the miseries of his country.

Such was the man, sir, for whose memory I ask from an American Congress a slight tribute of respect. Not, sir, to perpetuate his fame—but our gratitude. His fame will last as long as liberty remains upon the earth; as long as a votary offers incense upon her altar, the name of Kosciusko will be invoked. And if, by the common consent of the world, a temple shall be erected to those who have rendered most service to mankind, if the statue of our great countryman shall occupy the place of the "Most Worthy," that of Kosciusko will be found by his side, and the wreath of laurel will be entwined with the palm of virtue to adorn his brow.

WEDNESDAY, January 21.

Another member, to wit, from Massachusetts, THOMAS RICE, appeared, produced his credentials, and took his seat.

THURSDAY, January 22.

The resolution from the Senate, directing "the publication and distribution of the journal, and proceedings of the convention which formed the present Constitution of the United States," was read twice, and committed to the committee appointed by this House on the 7th instant, upon that subject.

General Kosciusko.

Mr. HARRISON, of Ohio, having withdrawn the resolution he offered for consideration yesterday, to which he understood there was considerable objection, on the ground of its being in a joint form, moved, in lieu thereof, a resolve to the following effect, with a view to expressing the sense of this House alone on the subject:

Resolved, That this House, entertaining the highest respect for the memory of General Kosciusko, his services, &c., the members thereof will testify the same by wearing crape on the left arm for one month.

After some debate, in which this motion was supported by Mr. HARRISON, and opposed by Messrs. REED, FORSYTH, and DESHA—

Mr. HARRISON withdrew his resolution altogether, seeing it was opposed, and that the want of unanimity would destroy its value—satisfied that, in moving and supporting it, he had acquitted his conscience.

[In the short debate on this question, the merits of Kosciusko, the advocate of freedom, and the friend of man, were fully admitted; but, it was shown that no such respect as was now proposed had been paid to any of the departed worthies, native or foreign, who had aided in the achievement of our independence, except in the single case of General WASHINGTON, which was admitted to be an exception to all general rules. Having as recently as 1810 refused a like tribute to the memory of Colonel William Washington, on his decease, it was too late now, it was deemed, to commence a new system in this respect.]

Indian Affairs.

Mr. SOUTHARD, from the committee appointed on so much of the President's Message as relates to Indian Affairs, made a report upon the subject, which was read; when, Mr. S. reported a bill, for establishing trading-houses with the Indian tribes, and for the organization and encouragement of schools for their instruction and civilization; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole. The report is as follows:

The committee to whom was referred so much of the President's Message as relates to Indian Affairs, report: That the capital appropriated for prosecution of Indian trade was, in 1809, augmented from $200,000 to $300,000; which sum, by succeeding acts, has been continued down to this period. Of the capital thus appropriated, $290,000 have been drawn from the Treasury, and actively employed under direction of the Superintendent of Indian Supplies. Under the various laws enacted for the support and encouragement of Indian trade, eight factories or trading posts have been established at the following points:

1. Fort Mitchell, Georgia.
2. Chickasaw Bluffs, Mississippi Territory.
3. Fort Confederation, on the Tombigbee river.
4. Fort Osage, on the Missouri river, near the mouth of the Osage.
5. Prairie du Chien, on the Mississippi, near the mouth of the Wisconsin river.
6. Ordered to Sulphur Fork, on Red river, formerly at Natchitoches.
7. Green Bay, on the Green Bay of Lake Michigan, Illinois Territory.
8. Chicago, Lake Michigan.

The committee deem it unnecessary to present a detailed view of the profits and loss of each particular agency, and submit, in relation to the general establishment, that it has been a losing institution, owing, it is presumable, to adventitious circumstances, originating in our late belligerent state, and not growing out of any defect in the organization or government of the trade. From the first operation of this traffic up to December, 1809, it sustained a loss of $44,538 36. Since that period the trade has been more successful, it having yielded a profit, on the capital actually vested in the merchandise, of about $15,000 annually, after covering a loss of $13,369, which accrued in consequence of the capture of several trading posts by the enemy during the late war.

In this view of the subject the committee have not embraced an item of $20,000, annually disbursed at the Treasury for the Superintendent and his clerks, the factories, &c., and which, when applied to the concern, as necessarily it must be in making an estimate of profit and loss, will absorb the profits arising from the funds employed in trade, and furnish an annual charge against the establishment of $5,000. This annual loss being sustained by the Treasury, pursuant to appropriations for the pay of the Superintendent and his assistants, is a loss to the Government but not to the concern, in the diminution of its capital, which, under all circumstances, remains stationary.

The act passed 29th of April, 1816, giving to the President the discretionary power of licensing foreigners to a participation in the Indian trade, is less exceptionable in theory than in practice. With all the guards of the act and precautions of the Executive, it has been found impracticable, under dispensing power, to avoid the admission of men of vicious habits, whose conduct tends to interrupt the peace and harmony of the United States and the Indian tribes; nor can such be introduced while the door is left open to foreign traders; either admit or exclude all. A system partial in its character will, by inhibiting a worthy applicant, do him injustice; and, by permitting the fraudulent speculator, the savage for whom the provision is made and the country are wronged. The Executive must rely on recommendations in the exercise of the power deposited with him, and, no doubt, is often deceived in the character of persons recommended to Presidential patronage.

MONDAY, January 26.

Two other members, to wit: from Massachusetts, JOHN WILSON, and from North Carolina, JAMES STEWART, appeared, produced their credentials, were qualified, and took their seats.

TUESDAY, January 27.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Connecticut, presented the petition of Elizabeth Eaton, the widow of the late General William Eaton, stating the services and sacrifices of her late husband in the public service, the poverty in which he left her and her children, the loss of two of her sons, one in the naval and the other in the military service of the United States, and praying that some provision may be made for her maintenance, and for the support and education of the children of the said General Eaton.—Referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CLAIBORNE presented a remonstrance of Andrew Jackson, in behalf of himself and in right of his wife, and as agent for the heirs and representatives of Colonel John Donelson, deceased, stating, that by the act of the State of Georgia, of the 20th February, 1784, the said Donelson was appointed one of the commissioners for laying out a new county, in the Big Bend of the Tennessee river, for which services he became entitled to a large tract of land lying in said county, which they have been unable to obtain, for reasons set forth in the petition, and soliciting a conveyance thereof to him, and the rest of the heirs of said Donelson; which was referred to a select committee; and Mr. CLAIBORNE, Mr. COBB, Mr. HOGG, Mr. SETTLE, and Mr. CRAWFORD, were appointed the committee.

Mr. CLAIBORNE also presented a similar petition of George W. Sevier, for and in behalf of himself and the other heirs and representatives of the late General John Sevier, deceased; which was referred to the committee last appointed.

Fugitives from Justice and Service.

The order of the day on the bill "respecting fugitives from justice, and persons escaping from the service of their masters," having been announced—

Mr. RICH moved to commit the bill to a different committee, with a view of considering the propriety of certain amendments. After some little discussion, the motion was negatived.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill.

The question was on an amendment proposed by Mr. RICH to the bill, which has for its object the preventing the transportation, in any manner, of any negro, mulatto, or person of color, without having previously carried the same before some judge or justice of a court of record, and giving sufficient proof of their being slaves, and the property of the person by whose authority they are so removed, under the penalty of a sum not exceeding ten thousand dollars.

This amendment Mr. STORRS had proposed to amend, by substituting in lieu thereof a new section, in the following words:

"That, if any person without colorable claim, shall knowingly and wilfully procure or cause to be procured any such certificate or warrant, [of his property in any particular individual,] with intention, under color or pretence thereof, or the provisions of this act, to arrest, detain, or transport, or cause to be arrested, detained, or transported, any person whatsoever, not held to labor or service as aforesaid, he or she, on conviction thereof, shall suffer imprisonment, not exceeding fifteen years, or fined not exceeding five thousand dollars, or both, in the discretion of the court before whom such conviction shall be had."

Messrs. STORRS and PINDALL advocated the amendment to the amendment, on the ground of the difficulty of the subject, the very magnitude of which was a sufficient reason, it was said, why it should not be appended to this bill, but ought to be made the subject of a separate act.

Mr. RICH vindicated his own amendment, on the ground of the enormity of the crime of kidnapping, repeated cases of which had occurred, and which appeared to him to require the interposition of the Legislature.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to, and then incorporated in the bill, by a considerable majority.

Mr. CLAGETT said he should make but few remarks upon this occasion. Since this bill has been under discussion, said he, I have given it due attention, but have not been able to perceive a satisfactory reason for its passage; nor am I without surprise that it should have so many advocates. The law of 1793, in pursuance of the 2d sect. 4th art. of the constitution, enacts, "that when a person, held to labor or service in any of the United States, or in either of the Territories, under the laws thereof, shall escape into any other of the said States or Territories, the person to whom such labor or service may be due, his agent or attorney, shall have power to seize or arrest such fugitive, and take him or her before any judge of a circuit or district court of the United States, residing or being within the State, or before any magistrate of a county, city, or town corporate, wherein such seizure or arrest shall have been made, and upon proof, to the satisfaction of such judge or magistrate, that the person so seized, doth, under the laws of the State from whence he fled, owe service or labor to the person claiming him, it shall be the duty of such judge or magistrate to give a certificate thereof to such claimant, which shall be a sufficient warrant for removing such fugitive to the State from whence he fled." And, by the same law, any person who shall obstruct such claimant in seizing a fugitive, or rescue him after seizure, or harbor or conceal him, knowing him to be a fugitive, shall incur a penalty of five hundred dollars to the use of such claimant, and be also liable to the party for all other damages by him sustained. Sir, however I may differ in opinion from some honorable gentlemen upon the question of right to this service, abstractly considered, I do not hesitate to say, that the clause of the constitution, under which we legislate, is imperative—that it is a part of a solemn compact between the several States in the Union, and we are bound to carry it into complete effect. But does not the law cited secure to the claimants all the rights which the constitution guaranteed to them? Certainly it does. By the law now in force, the claimant may, in the first instance, without a warrant, arrest the fugitive, and carry him before a tribunal for examination. This is a great latitude, and there is danger of an abuse of this power to the injury of the free citizen, who may never appear before such tribunal! If any amendment of this law be necessary, it is to restrain the claimant from an abuse of power; but no such amendment has been proposed. The courts of the United States are the only proper tribunals to take cognizance of the subject; and magistrates of a State, as such, are not bound by your law. Why, then, make this amendment?

But, sir, while we are scrupulously guarding from encroachments one clause of our constitution, let us be cautious lest we infract another, equally important. It is not only my duty, but my sincere desire, to preserve every part of this sacred instrument, upon which our national happiness depends. And now, sir, let me solicit your attention to the 9th sect. of the 1st art. of this constitution, in these words: "The privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless when, in cases of rebellion or invasion, the public safety may require it." Will not this bill, if it pass into a law, virtually suspend the writ of habeas corpus—at least its effect? In my opinion it will: for this bill provides, if such writ issue, and it shall appear, upon its return, that the supposed fugitive was arrested under this law, (and it may be by order of a justice of the peace,) such fugitive shall be remanded into the custody of the officer who arrested him.

For these reasons, sir, I shall give a negative vote to the bill on your table.

Mr. PINDALL said, the bill professes to impose a duty, to be performed by stated judges, in relation to the recovery of runaway slaves. The enactment of the bill does not, it is said, imply what the opinion of the House or the friends of the bill may be on the question of the power of Congress to impose any other duties on the State courts.

A gentleman mentioned, during the debate, as an objection to the bill, that it imposed duties upon State judges and officers, to which Mr. PINDALL (the chairman of the committee that reported the bill) replied, that those who believed this subject involved the broad question, whether Congress had the right in all cases to require the execution of its laws through the instrumentality of State officers, would, if so disposed, be able to say much in favor of the power. Indeed, some might contend, with plausibility, that the question ought to be considered as settled; or an argument the same or similar to that derived from what has been called contemporaneous practice, might be deduced from the earliest acts of this Government. Congress had repeatedly passed laws depending for their execution on State courts. This consideration might, in the estimation of some gentlemen, weigh against the objection of the member from Massachusetts, but he (Mr. P.) did not rely upon it.

He said it was possible that the framers of the constitution did not wish that the right of Congress to impose duties upon State officers should be coextensive with the powers of legislation granted by that instrument, and yet may have intended that such a power should exist in some cases, or under some circumstances. Although he would not intermeddle with the abstract inquiry, whether Congress could, in all its legislative province, impose upon a judicial or ministerial State officer an obligation to execute the laws of the Union, he would insist on his right to exercise the power in the instance contemplated by the bill. The clause of the constitution on which the bill rested, declared that no person, held to service or labor in one State, under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in consequence of any law or regulation therein, be discharged from such service or labor, but shall be delivered up on the claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due. This clause, he said, was a regulation between the respective States, conferring rights on some States and obligations on others; but the right, when exerted for the benefit of the slaveholder, manifests itself by means of the laws of his State; for the clause just quoted speaks of persons held to labor in one State, under the laws thereof. The laws of the State are made known, interpreted, and expounded by the official acts and decisions of State judges and officers.

Again: the slave, taking refuge in another State, shall be delivered up. This duty of delivering up the slave is not imposed on private men or individuals, as in a state of nature, or it might never be performed; besides, private men are not necessarily supposed to have the slave in their possession or power. The duty of delivering up the slave is imposed on the State, and the State, as all other civil or social political powers, necessarily, or at least usually, acts by the intervention of its officers.

It being thus shown, in regard to this clause of the constitution, that a right and corresponding obligation are established between different States, which, by ordinary interpretation, depend for their development and exercise upon the proper officers of each State; and it being admitted on all sides that Congress has the power to regulate the due exercise of that right, and enforce the performance of that obligation, it follows that Congress can make a law to regulate the conduct of these State officers in the performance of their duty.

Further debate took place on the bill, and on an amendment proposed by Mr. BALDWIN.

Mr. FULLER then, after an ingenious speech of considerable length, moved to strike out the first section of the bill, with a view to destroy it entirely, on the ground that it transcended the constitutional provisions on the subject. He also took exceptions to various features of the bill.

Mr. STRONG, in a more decided manner, expressed his opposition to the bill, on the ground that the act already in existence on that subject had gone full far enough in carrying into execution the constitutional provision on that subject, which he regarded as a compact, the mode of executing which the non-slaveholding States had reserved, and were at liberty to judge of when proposed to them, &c.

Mr. COBB replied to the two gentlemen from Massachusetts, vindicating the rights of the holders of that description of property, as secured by the constitution, as inalienable, and as inviolable on any pretext by those who were averse to the toleration of slavery, &c.

Mr. STRONG rejoined.

Mr. HOPKINSON stated certain objections to the form of this bill, under which he thought it possible that freemen might be apprehended as slaves, without the necessary means of redress.

Mr. HOLMES, of Massachusetts, made some remarks, of a nature conciliatory to the prejudices existing on both sides of this question, and intimated that, though he was not in favor of all the provisions of this bill, he should vote against striking out the first section, because he thought that the bill might be so moulded as to be unobjectionable to any.

Mr. CLAY (Speaker) then engaged in the debate, being called up by the peculiar interest which the State of which he is a representative has in the passage of the bill. The nature of slave property, its evils, and the rights of its possessors, were illustrated with great force, and the necessity for the passage of an act of this sort sustained by many arguments, in a speech of considerable length.

Mr. BALDWIN rose on the question of construction which had been given by some gentlemen to the constitutional provision; which, he contended, conferred on Congress full power to legislate on the subject, so as to give the strongest security to the holders of slave property.

The motion to strike out the first section was negatived by a large majority.

Some further amendments having been made to the bill, the committee rose, and reported the bill as amended, and the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, January 29.

Fugitives from Justice and Service.

The House having resumed the consideration of the bill to amend the act, entitled "An act respecting fugitives from justice, and persons escaping from the service of their masters"—

Mr. RICH moved to recommit the bill to the committee to whom has been referred the memorial of the annual meeting of the Society of Friends at Baltimore, with a view of so amending the bill as to guard more effectually the rights of free persons of color. This motion he enforced by urging the oppressions to which these people were now subjected, and the necessity of some regulation on the subject, which he thought might be very properly connected with this bill.

Mr. PINDALL objected to the recommitment, especially as the House had already once decided against doing so, on the same ground of the want of necessary connection of the proposed amendment with the bill.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, suggested that the subject of the protection of free people of color, being of a distinct nature from this, was already before a committee, who would without doubt make a special report on the subject. Under this impression, Mr. S. said he should vote against the motion for recommitment.

Mr. RHEA was also opposed to the recommitment, and made some general remarks respecting slavery, in the course of which he intimated his opinion that the Government had shown its aversion to slavery in every manner in its power, and could not do more, unless by an arbitrary abolition of slavery, which no one would propose. If slavery must exist, as guaranteed by the constitution, he was surprised at the opposition made to ridding it of some of its evils, by preventing escapes, &c.

Mr. LIVERMORE said, although not favorable to the bill, he should vote against a recommitment, because he wished that those who were friendly to the bill might have the opportunity, by amendment, to make it as perfect as possible.

Mr. W. P. MACLAY was in favor of recommitment. Admitting the force of the constitutional provision, which secured the right of proprietors to reclaim their runaway slaves, he was not for going further than necessary; and appeared moreover to be highly impressed with the importance of connecting with this bill a provision to prevent the apprehension of free persons of color, under pretence of their being slaves.

The question on recommitment of the bill was decided in the negative, without a division.

Further debate took place on the question of concurrence in some of the amendments made to the bill in the Committee of the Whole, and on several other amendments proposed, in the course of which Messrs. PINDALL, SERGEANT, SPENCER, BALDWIN, RICH, TERRY, BEECHER, and others, actively exerted themselves.

Mr. SERGEANT made a proposition, having in view to materially change the nature of the bill by making judges of the State in which the apprentices, slaves, &c., are seized, the tribunal to decide the fact of slavery, instead of the judges of the States whence the fugitives have escaped. This was negatived by a large majority.

Mr. RICH made several successive attempts to procure amendments to the bill, relaxing some of its provisions, which were successively negatived.

The debate, though not very interesting, was zealously persisted in to a late hour.

The question being on ordering the bill to a third reading—

A motion was made by Mr. W. P. MACLAY to postpone the bill to Monday next; which motion was negatived—79 to 62.

After two or three ineffectual motions to procure an adjournment, and to further amend the bill—

The question was at length taken, "Shall the bill be engrossed, and read a third time?" and decided, by yeas and nays:—For the bill 86, against it 55, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Abbott, Anderson of Kentucky, Austin, Baldwin, Ball, Bassett, Bayley, Beecher, Bellinger, Bloomfield, Blount, Bryan, Burwell, Campbell, Claiborne, Cobb, Cook, Crawford, Cruger, Desha, Drake, Earle, Edwards, Ellicott, Ervin of South Carolina, Floyd, Forney, Forsyth, Garnett, Hall of Delaware, Hall of North Carolina, Harrison, Hogg, Holmes of Massachusetts, Hubbard, Johnson of Virginia, Johnson of Kentucky, Lewis, Linn, Little, Lowndes, McLane, McCoy, Marchand, Marr, Mason of Massachusetts, Middleton, Moore, Mumford, H. Nelson, Nesbitt, Newton, Owen, Palmer, Patterson, Peter, Pindall, Pleasants, Poindexter, Porter, Quarles, Reed, Rhea, Ringgold, Robertson of Kentucky, Ruggles, Sampson, Sawyer, Settle, Slocumb, S. Smith, Ballard Smith, Alexander Smyth, Southard, Speed, Spencer, Stewart of North Carolina, Storrs, Strother, Stuart, Tompkins, Trimble, Tucker of South Carolina, Walker of North Carolina, Williams of North Carolina, and Wilson of Massachusetts.

NAYS.—Messrs. Adams, Allen of Massachusetts, Allen of Vermont, Bateman, Bennett, Boss, Butler, Clagett, Crafts, Culbreth, Folger, Hale, Hendricks, Herrick, Hitchcock, Holmes of Connecticut, Hopkinson, Hunter, Huntington, Ingham, Irving of New York, Kinsey, Lawyer, Livermore, W. Maclay, W. P. Maclay, Merrill, Morton, Murray, Jeremiah Nelson, Orr, Parrott, Pawling, Rice, Rich, Richards, Savage, Scudder, Sergeant, Seybert, Sherwood, Silsbee, Spangler, Strong, Tarr, Taylor, Terry, Upham, Wallace, Wendover, Williams of Connecticut, Williams of New York, Wilkin, and Wilson of Pennsylvania.

The bill was then ordered to be read the third time to-morrow.

FRIDAY, January 30.

Fugitives from Justice and Service.

The House having resumed the consideration of the bill providing for the recovery of fugitive slaves, and the question having been announced to be on the passage of the bill—

Mr. ADAMS, of Massachusetts, opposed the bill at much length; on the ground principally that, in guaranteeing the possession of slave property to those States holding it, the constitution did not authorize or require the General Government to go as far as this bill proposed, to render the constitutional provision effectual; that the bill contained provisions dangerous to the liberty and safety of the free people of color in other sections in the Union; and that, in securing the rights of one portion of the community, he could not consent to jeopardize those of another.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kentucky, spoke some time very earnestly in support of the bill, and in reply to the objections urged by the gentlemen who had at different times opposed it.

Mr. LIVERMORE, of New Hampshire, submitted the reasons for his intention to vote against the bill. He was willing to go to the necessary extent in securing to the owners of this species of property, permitted as it was by the constitution; but the bill contained no sufficient guard to the safety of those colored people who resided in the States where slavery was known only by name. The bill provided that alleged fugitives were not to be identified and proven until they reached the State in which the person seizing them resided; and this would expose the free men of other parts to the hazard of being dragged from one extreme of the country to the other—though this fear was not strengthened by any want of respect for the wisdom and justice of the Southern judiciaries, to which he paid the highest compliment; but the feelings entertained on the subject in the South, he feared, would make less secure the liberty of any colored man carried there, and charged with being a fugitive.

Mr. MASON, of Massachusetts, delivered at length his motives for approving the bill. The constitution, formed in the spirit of compromise, had guaranteed this kind of property to the Southern States, and as it appeared from the insufficiency of the existing laws, that the proposed bill was necessary to secure this right, he was willing to adopt the measure, as he was always willing to approve any measure to effect what the constitution sanctioned. The possible abuse of any thing was no argument against it, if otherwise expedient, and on this ground he was not prepared to reject the feature of the bill so much opposed. The judicial tribunals of the South, he had no doubt, would decide on the cases as correctly as those of the North, and on this subject perhaps more so, as, he believed, so strong was the feeling on this subject in the latter section of the country, and so great a leaning was there against slavery, that the juries of Massachusetts would, in ninety-nine cases in a hundred, decide in favor of the fugitive. His feelings on this bill were also somewhat interested; as he wished not, by denying just facilities for the recovery of fugitive slaves, to have the town where he lived (Boston) infested, as it would be, without an effectual restraint, with a great portion of the runaways from the South.

Mr. HOLMES, of Massachusetts, followed his colleague in submitting his reasons for approving the bill, and to reconcile the apparent contradiction in a gentleman from his part of the country appearing as the supporter of this bill. His course on this, as on other measures, was based on his duty as a Representative for the whole Union, instead of local interests. This measure, it appeared, was necessary to secure the constitutional rights of a large portion of the States; and, as to the provision so strongly objected to by some gentlemen, he did not think it competent in Massachusetts to try a question between a Southern master and his slave; it was a kind of question, with which his constituents, to their honor, were not familiar, and he wished them to remain so. He did not believe the freedom of a single man in the North would be endangered by this provision of the bill; the habeas corpus would prevent it; and he went into various arguments to prove that the bill was expedient, and free from the evils apprehended by other gentlemen.

Mr. RHEA made some observations in support of the bill, and in reply to the arguments against it. So long as this property was authorized, there could be no doubt of the right of the holder to pursue it, and carry it back without hindrance to the place from whence it escapes. He thanked Heaven this nation was not chargeable with the odium of introducing this species of property; it was an evil entailed on it; and this bill was in conformity with the principles of the compact which guaranteed this property to its holders. There was little danger of persons going from the South to claim free men as their property; such a fear was without foundation. He always felt pain in hearing distinctions made between the slaveholding States and others; nearly all the old original thirteen States had held slaves, and, if circumstances had enabled some of them to get rid of the evil, the only feeling they ought to entertain towards the others, is compassion that they are not so fortunate.

Mr. STORRS, of New York, entered into a number of arguments in support of the bill. He referred to and reasoned on the words of the constitution, to show that the bill was consonant to its provisions, and did not exceed the limits within which Congress were authorized to legislate on the subject. He expressed his pleasure at the liberality which had been manifested by some in its discussion, but should like to see a little more displayed by gentlemen from the North, as an evidence they were willing to sacrifice some of their old prejudices to the spirit of harmony and mutual benefit.

Mr. WHITMAN, of Massachusetts, admitted the necessity of some additional regulations on this subject, as the existing law appeared inadequate; but he could not vote for this bill in its present shape. He objected to that provision, which makes it penal in a State officer to refuse his assistance in executing the act. This feature, if retained, would prevent his voting for the bill, as its penalties would require the State officers either to resign or perform an act which might be repugnant to their feelings, and render their official stations frequently disagreeable. Furthermore, he did not believe Congress had the right to compel the State officers to perform this duty—they could only authorize it; and, as he believed the bill might be made effectual without this objectionable provision, he hoped it would be recommitted, and receive the necessary modification. In reference to a remark of his colleague, (Mr. MASON,) he had no doubt that justice would be administered under this act by the tribunals of Massachusetts, if the duty were devolved on them, as impartially as in any other part of the Union, notwithstanding the prejudices they felt on the subject; yet he did not doubt that exact justice would also be rendered by the tribunals of the South, where prejudices were felt of an opposite character.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Connecticut, was called up by the remark of Mr. STORRS, and admitted that if he could not and had not banished all his local prejudices, he ought to have done so. Mr. W. then entered, at large, into an examination of the bill, into his reasons for opposing it unless it was altered in some of its features, and to show that in its present shape it was calculated to excite angry feelings, and rouse strong prejudices in those parts of the country where slavery was not tolerated. This effect would be produced by that provision under which a free man of color might be unjustly seized and dragged to a remote part of the country, and his liberty endangered, if not destroyed. In attempting, properly, he admitted, to secure the right of property to one class of citizens, it was unjust that the rights of another class should be put in jeopardy, when, too, as he contended, the danger might be avoided, in one case, without impairing the benefit in the other. Although he wished not to interfere between a slave and his master, yet he argued that the right ought to be tried in the State in which the fugitive should be arrested; and compared the case to that of a runaway apprentice, who could not be seized and carried away by the ex parte testimony of the person claiming him.

The question on the passage of the bill was then taken, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 84, nays 69, as follows:

Ordered, That the title be, "An act to provide for delivering up persons held to labor or service in any of the States or Territories, who shall escape into any other State or Territory."

The House adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, February 2.

General St. Clair.

The House then, by a small majority, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of General Arthur St. Clair.

This bill gave rise to a discussion which occupied the committee until sunset, in the course of which the motives of the act of 1810, for the relief of General St. Clair, the act of limitations, the merits of the petitioner, the justice of his claim, &c., were all brought into view, as well as the propriety of various amendments offered to the bill.

Mr. ERVIN, of South Carolina, spoke as follows:—At the commencement of this debate, I had no idea of intruding any observations of mine upon the attention of this committee; but, in justice to my feelings, I cannot now be silent. The integrity of the petitioner has been questioned, and his account denounced as incorrect. It is a case, now, not so much of calculation, as of feeling, and I address you with mingled sensations of pity and regret; pity, for the character of this venerable Revolutionary officer, and regret, that his claim should have met, in this House, with a solitary opponent. I, therefore, rise, not merely to defend the correctness of his claim, but to endeavor to shield from the tarnish of dishonor that fame which is no longer his, but the inheritance of his country. Send not, I beseech you, his claim to the Treasury Department. Many of the vouchers, which might have tended to evidence their correctness, may have been lost through the lapse of years, or the casualties of war. Again, sir, his demand is for the interest of eighteen hundred dollars. In the Treasury Department they allow no interest. To send it there, then, is tantamount to a rejection. But in this House, which is, or ought to be, the fountain of general justice, the principle to pay interest has been adopted, and precedents are already established. Here, then, let us decide upon their correctness or incorrectness. But, I am told, adopt the amendment proposed by an honorable member from Georgia, and my objections will be removed—that the proposed amendment gives to the head of the Treasury Department equitable powers. Specify and define those powers, that I may judge of their propriety; for, if the powers thereby intended to be given are calculated to arm the head of that Department with discretionary powers, to admit or reject the claim, as to him may appear right and proper, without being governed by the rules of office or regulations of law, I am in duty bound to oppose it. Not, sir, that I doubt the talent or integrity of the officer who presides over, and confers honor upon that department, but, because powers of that description, in a free Government, ought never to be resorted to, unless in cases of imperative necessity.

I now call your attention to General St. Clair's claim:—It is for the interest of eighteen hundred dollars, which, he alleges, he advanced, during the Revolutionary war, to Major Butler for the United States, and which sum was expended for their benefit, and produces to you the receipt given to him by Major Butler for that sum. Duly to appreciate the value of this loan, it is only necessary to advert to the time when it was made. It was at the dawn of our Revolution, when the liberties of our country were struggling into existence. At this interesting moment, he early and generously stepped forward in their defence against the unrivalled power, whose legions had humbled Spain and France, and whose flag waved in proud triumph round the universe. Under these appalling circumstances, his country sought him beyond the mountains, and demanded his services—he left the endearment of his family, and the security of private life, to encounter, for this very country, whose Government now repels his claim, the dangers and destruction of war. It is, however, contended, by the honorable the Speaker, that this receipt admits of two constructions. I admit the fact: but will we consult the dignity, or even the interest of our country, by adopting a construction, which, whilst it debases the individual, degrades the country? But I contend that the construction given to the receipt, by the honorable the Speaker, is contrary to every rule of construction with which I am acquainted. He contends, with zeal and much eloquence, that the money which was advanced, and from which the receipt was given, may have been public money which had been placed in his hands by the then Government. Where is the evidence to prove that fact? It is very material; if such evidence does exist, the House is entitled to it; and if none is produced, we are at liberty to presume that none exists. Again, sir, every circumstance, connected with this interesting distressed Revolutionary soldier, repels such an idea. He fought with Amherst in the West, and conquered with Wolfe on the plains of Abraham; at Ticonderoga he merited, if he did not obtain, victory; he rose superior to the weakness of humanity, and yielded himself a sacrifice to his integrity: he there could have reaped bloody honors, and, perhaps, deathless renown, by the destruction of a gallant army, which afterwards contributed to the triumph at Saratoga; the adoption of his advice saved your army at Trenton; he was one of your Major Generals during the Revolutionary war; he presided over the former deliberations of your Congress; he was a friend of WASHINGTON, and shared the confidence of that great man to the day of his death. And can it be possible, that a man thus elevated, by those circumstances which usually tend to ennoble human character, can submit to the degradation of presenting to the Government of his country a false account for the pitiful sum of four or five thousand dollars, and he trembling on the brink of the grave? The idea is too debasing, it is ungenerous—it ought not to be entertained for a moment. Seven long years he has literally begged at your doors; committees after committees have said his accounts ought to be paid. If you think otherwise, reject them; but why will you debase him—why will you add insult to injury? Recollect his services, and O! let his gray hairs pass in peace to the grave! But again, I have always been taught to believe, that it is a correct rule of construction, when an instrument of writing is presented to you, susceptible of two constructions, you are bound to permit that construction to prevail which will operate most strongly against the obligor, and most in favor of the payee or obligee. Apply this rule of construction to the case now before you, and further comment is unnecessary, the conclusion is irresistible.

The opponents of the claim tell us, if it is rejected, they will join and vote him so many hundred dollars a year. Mr. Chairman, I have no idea of introducing under the garb of public sympathy, a pensioned corps, other than that already established, composed of unfortunate individuals disabled in the military or naval service of my country. Let us first be just, and, with the public money, generous only in case of necessity.

The acts of limitation have been appealed to as barring the claim of the petitioner. Sir, let them bar, and prevent fraud and injustice, but not right, nor the claims of Revolutionary merit in distress. Let them prevail in the departments of the Government; enforce them, if you please, in the courts of law, but in this temple of justice they are inoperative—they vanish before legislative discretion. An honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. HOPKINSON,) whom I have always listened to with pleasure and edification, has anticipated me in one idea in relation to the act of limitation. He has very properly remarked, that your committees have not only acknowledged the correctness of the claim, but recommended its payment, and that the House, acting upon that recommendation, have not only sanctioned their reports, but have paid the principal of the claim, which, in legal contemplation, takes the claim out of the act of limitation. It does more; it not only takes it out of the act of limitation, but proves one of two things, either that the claim is correct, and that the interest ought to be paid, or that the committees who recommended payment, and the Congress which paid, paid an illegal and improper account. But I contend, and hope I shall be able to prove to the satisfaction of this committee, that this claim has never been embraced by your acts of limitation. Acts of limitation commence their operation, not from the time of making a contract, or the time of its execution, but from the day assigned for payment; for example, a note dated 1st of January, 1817, payable the 1st of January, 1818, when will an act of limitation commence its operation? Every mind anticipates the answer —from the day of payment; this principle being established, let us inquire into the nature of General St. Clair's claim: it is of the nature of a debt payable on demand, which excludes the idea of any particular day of payment; in such cases a discretionary power is left with the payee or obligee to make the demand, which is evidenced by proof of a formal demand, or, what is the more usual way, by the entry of mesne process in the hands of the sheriff; in either way the act begins to run only from the time of the demand. General St. Clair's claim, if I am correctly informed, was presented in 1810, and has been preferred from that time to the present; your acts of limitation therefore cannot affect it. The correctness of the claim being established, as his advocate in my official capacity, I demand for him the payment. And how is he paid? Injustice still presents these acts of limitation—as a payment for what? The claim? Yea, more; for sleepless days and nights; for services the most eminent, rendered at a time which emphatically tried men's souls; when patriotism was denounced as treason, and defeat was slavery or death. Mr. Chairman, if the claim is doubtful, and if I shall stand here alone, I shall vote to relieve the distresses of the Revolutionary soldier. Lamented ingratitude! Thus have your soldiers been paid; they who fought for your liberties and independence. After the Revolutionary war, they looked up to their Government for justice; wounded and disabled they performed an annual pilgrimage to your House; year after year, they petitioned for their wages; at last, tired with their complaints, acts of limitation were passed; just or unjust, their claims were forever barred. Hope, the last consolation of the miserable, being thus cut off, numbers retired beyond the mountains and pined out a miserable existence. This session, the glorious few whom death had not relieved, driven by want, once more approached you; they dropped the tone of remonstrance; they assumed the accents of humanity and distress, and begged for bread; you felt the appeal, and, with a promptitude honorable to yourselves and grateful to the people, you voted a partial relief. O! that they had been made partakers of the thousands that are expended in which the heart would have united with the judgment in approving the expenditure. Mr. Chairman, we have listened to the prayers of the subaltern, let us not discard the claim of the chieftain; pay him his account; fill his heart with gratitude; send comfort to the humble mansion which now shelters him from the rude storm of the mountain; he will thank you, and in his last moments will give to his country all that he has to give—his blessing.

A motion, made by Mr. FORSYTH, to amend the bill by directing the accounting officers of the Treasury to adjust the claim of General St. Clair, and allow him the principal and interest of whatever amount may appear to be due, any law to the contrary notwithstanding, was under consideration, when the committee rose, and obtained leave to sit again.

TUESDAY, February 3.

Another member, to wit, from Massachusetts, ELIJAH H. MILLS, appeared, produced his credentials, and took his seat.

FRIDAY, February 6.

Case of George Mumford.

Mr. TAYLOR, from the Committee of Elections, made a report, accompanied by sundry documents, amongst which is a letter from Mr. Mumford to the committee on the case of George Mumford, a member of this House from North Carolina, whose right to a seat has been questioned, because he had not, previously to attending the House, resigned the office of Principal Assessor in his district. The report concludes, on the ground that the duties and compensation of the office (and of course the office itself) had expired, that George Mumford is entitled to a seat in the House.

The report was read, and committed. It is as follows:

The Committee of Elections, to which was referred a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 10th of December, 1817, and a Message of the President of the United States, of the 29th of the same month, report:

That in the year 1813, subsequent to the passage of the act for the assessment and collection of direct taxes and internal duties, George Mumford was appointed principal assessor of the tenth collection district of North Carolina; that he accepted the said office, and executed the duties appertaining thereto, under the several acts afterwards passed, laying direct taxes upon the United States; and that he has not resigned the said office.

In the month of August, 1817, he was elected a Representative of the said State; and on the first day of the present session he was qualified, and took his seat in this House.

The act of July 22, 1813, under which Mr. Mumford held his appointment, was prospective and without limitation. No law then existed laying a direct tax. But as Congress intended resorting to that system of revenue, it was enacted "that, for the purpose of assessing and collecting direct taxes," the United States should be divided into collection districts, and a principal assessor appointed to each district. If this act has neither expired nor been repealed, Mr. Mumford is still in office, and cannot rightfully be a member of this House. But, by the second section of the act, to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of the Government, and maintaining the public credit, by laying a direct tax upon the United States, and to provide for assessing and collecting the same, approved January 9, 1815, the said act was repealed, except so far as the same respected collection districts, internal duties, and the appointment and qualification of collectors and assessors; in all which respects it was enacted that the said act should be, and continue in force for the purposes of the last-mentioned act. The act of 22d July, 1813, so far as the same was not repealed, was thereby limited to the duration of that act, and was continued in force only for its purposes. By that act a direct tax of six millions of dollars was annually laid upon the United States, and apportioned agreeably to the provisions of the constitution. At the first session of the Fourteenth Congress that act was modified, by repealing so much thereof as laid an annual tax of six millions, by reducing the same to three millions, and by limiting its continuance to one year; and it was expressly enacted that all the provisions of the act of January 9, 1815, except so far as the same had been varied by subsequent acts, and except the first section thereof, (which related to the apportionment of the tax,) should be held to apply to the tax of three millions thereby laid. Thus the act of July, 1813, was again limited, and continued in force for the purpose of the three million tax, laid March 5, 1816. Whenever those purposes were fulfilled, that act expired, and of course all offices created by it ceased to exist.

By the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, hereto annexed, enclosing a report of the Commissioner of the Revenue, it appears that the entire tax assessed in the tenth collection district of North Carolina, was accounted for previous to the 1st of December, 1817, and that no official duty then remained to be performed by Mr. Mumford, the principal assessor of that district. His said office, therefore, expired previous to his taking a seat in this House. The committee, therefore, respectfully submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That George Mumford is entitled to a seat in this House.

MONDAY, February 9.

Another member, to wit, from the State of South Carolina, ELDRED SIMKINS, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat.

MONDAY, February 23.

Death of Mr. Goodwyn.

After the usual form of reading the journal of the preceding day's sitting, Mr. NEWTON, of Virginia, rose to announce to the House the death of his colleague, Colonel PETERSON GOODWYN.

On me (said Mr. NEWTON) devolves the melancholy duty of informing the House of the death of our late worthy associate, Mr. PETERSON GOODWYN, of Virginia. Mr. Goodwyn died at his seat in Virginia on the 21st of this month. He has performed and finished his duties here, and with a clear conscience, and in the full expectation of the reward of his virtues, he has gone for a time to repose with his ancestors in the tomb. In amiableness of disposition, in suavity of manners, in acts of benevolence and charity, in steadiness of friendship, and in love and devotion to the republican institutions of his country, he was surpassed by no man.

Mr. NEWTON offered the following resolution, which was unanimously agreed to:

Resolved, That the members of this House will testify their respect for the memory of PETERSON GOODWYN, deceased, late a member of this body from the State of Virginia, by wearing crape on the left arm for one month.

Mr. NEWTON then submitted the following resolution, which was also unanimously agreed to:

Resolved, That a message be sent to the Senate, informing them that this House, in testimony of their respect for the late Colonel PETERSON GOODWYN, one of their body from the State of Virginia, have unanimously resolved to wear crape on the left arm for one month.

And then, on motion of Mr. FORSYTH, the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, February 25.

Bankrupt Bill.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the Bankrupt bill.

The question being on Mr. EDWARDS's motion, to discharge the Committee of the whole House from the further consideration of the bill, and to postpone it indefinitely.

The House having refused to agree to a motion for adjournment, the question on the motion to postpone the bill indefinitely was taken by yeas and nays—yeas 82, nays 70.

So the House determined that the bill be indefinitely postponed, that is, rejected.

SATURDAY, February 28.

The Expatriation Bill.

The House being thin, a motion was made to adjourn; which was lost—ayes 41, noes 67—and the House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the Expatriation bill.

The question under consideration being the motion to strike out the first section of the bill, which was as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That, whensoever any citizen of the United States shall, by a declaration in writing, made and executed in the district court of the United States, within the State where he resides, in open court, to be by said court entered of record, declare that he relinquishes the character of a citizen, and shall depart out of the United States, such person shall, from the time of his departure, be considered as having exercised his right of expatriation, and shall thenceforth be considered no citizen:

The debate on the bill, and on topics incidentally introduced by some of the speakers, occupied the remainder of the day. Messrs. COBB, MCLANE, FORSYTH, CLAY, JOHNSON of Virginia, and ROBERTSON of Louisiana, engaged in the discussion.

Mr. MCLANE, of Delaware, said, that after the observations which had been made by the other gentlemen who had preceded him in debate, he would not have intruded himself upon the time of the committee, but for the purpose of submitting some views of the subject which did not appear to him to have been yet given, and particularly in relation to our treaty with Spain, which had been rendered important in this discussion. He would therefore ask the indulgence of the committee for a few minutes, while he urged those reasons which would induce him to oppose the bill, and support the motion to strike out the first section. He was aware that this was a very favorite bill with the honorable mover, who, no doubt, anticipated much good from a law of the kind proposed. But, sir, said Mr. MCL., if I can succeed in convincing that honorable gentleman that Congress have not the constitutional power to pass such a law, and that, if they had, it would be inadequate to one very principal object anticipated from it, he will, it is to be presumed, not feel very anxious about its fate.

Mr. MCL. said he would not, upon the present occasion, either affirm or deny the right of a citizen to expatriate himself, because he did not conceive it to be necessary to the argument of the particular subject before the committee. He would content himself with inviting the attention of gentlemen generally to the origin and principles of the right, as it had been assumed, and upon which alone it could exist. This, he said, would be absolutely necessary, in order to ascertain the power by which the exercise of the right could either be controlled or regulated.

The right of expatriation, if it exist at all, is a civil right, commensurate with civil society and civil institutions. In a state of nature such a right could not be known, because, in such a state, the relation of citizen and country did not exist. Then the inhabitants of the State were not restricted to any particular spot, or subjected to the control of any community; the wide world was before them, and they were at liberty to roam wheresoever they pleased, and select the place best calculated to supply their wants and comforts, and to change it again whensoever they should think proper, either from interest or caprice. It was not until they united themselves into societies and communities, in which their own self-government was merged in civil institutions, that any restraint would be imposed upon this general freedom. In giving up the liberties of a state of nature, and entering into civil society, they necessarily contracted certain mutual obligations, by which the exercise of their natural rights would be regulated. The individual contracted obligations to his community or country, and the community to him, upon which the safety of all materially depended, and which neither could disregard without jeopardizing that safety. He admitted that the happiness of the individual and the community constitute the objects of the association.

It is only necessary, therefore, said he, for the present argument, for me to insist, and to ask gentlemen to concede, what I apprehend will not be denied, that the exercise of this right must be consistent with these obligations: that a citizen should not abandon his country without good cause, or in the necessary and lawful pursuit of happiness; that he cannot divest himself of his duties to his country in the hour of her peril, nor sacrifice all his obligations to her imminent injury and ruin, and therefore that the exercise of the right should be regulated by rules resulting from the nature and force of civil obligations. The bill now before the committee would seem to imply the recognition of these principles. It proposes to make the Government a party to the act, dissolving the tie between the citizen and his country, and to prescribe the terms upon which it will consent to the dissolution. Such a right cannot be a barren one. The power to prescribe rules upon any subject necessarily implies the power of judging of the propriety and extent of the rules.

If, then, Mr. Chairman, said Mr. McL., the exercise of the right of expatriation should be consistent with the essential and fundamental principles of civil obligations, and if any regulation of its exercise is to emanate from the civil power, it should proceed from that power to whom the obligation is due; from the supreme or sovereign power of the state or community of which the citizen is a member, and to whom he owes his allegiance. It is to such a power alone that these obligations have any relation. The question then presents itself, Is the Government of the United States such a power, and can Congress exercise it? I apprehend not.

The powers of the General Government are not absolute, but limited; they are confined to certain specified, enumerated objects, raised for especial purposes. The supreme sovereign power is in the people of the United States, acting through the different State governments. Prior to the organization of the Federal Government, the sovereignty of the States was absolute and complete, and the natural and civil allegiance of the citizen was exclusively due to the particular State of which he was a member. By that State alone could the right of expatriation have been regulated.

In its organization, the General Government was Federal, and not National, and, in the extent of its powers, it is Federal and not National; and the natural allegiance of the citizen to his State is neither absolved nor infringed by his connection with the Government of the United States. He simply contracts certain duties to the General Government, in no degree inconsistent with his allegiance to the State sovereignty. This is perfectly clear, from the nature of the Government. It was formed not by the citizens of the United States, but by the citizens of the respective States, acting as members of their several political communities, and designed for the protection of State rights. A civil relation thus created to the General Government, never can be construed to abrogate the natural relation between the citizen and his State; on the contrary, we find that this relation is in full force in all essential points. The right of the State to require of its citizens militia services, and subject them to trials by court-martials; to inflict punishment for the commission of crimes; to regulate the acquisition of property, and the rules and principles of descent, and, in short, to exercise, almost without limit, an authority over the persons and rights of their citizens; but, above all, to regulate and punish treason against the State. The second section of the fourth article of the Constitution of the United States recognized the crime of treason against a State, by providing for the apprehension of the criminal, though I apprehend such a recognition would not be required to render it entirely clear. The capacity to commit treason against the State, results from natural relation between the citizen and its sovereignty, and, though treason may also be committed against the United States, it results more from the express provision of the Constitution, than from any natural relation subsisting between the citizen and the Government. If, therefore, said Mr. McL., a citizen of the United States could be released from his duties to the General Government, he would nevertheless continue a citizen of the State, and his relation to the State government would be even more absolute than it was before. But, sir, as the States have an interest in preserving the obligation of the citizen to the performance of his duty to the United States, it may well be questioned whether the General Government can release him from those duties without the consent of the State. So long as a citizen remains a citizen of a State, a State has a right to require the power of the General Government in aid of his protection, and it cannot withhold it. This is of the very essence of the compact between the States and the General Government. By this compact, the protection of the rights of persons and property is fairly stipulated, and it cannot be dispensed with, in regard to one, without the consent of all. This compact constitutes the citizens of the State citizens of the United States. The relation to the State government was the basis of the relation to the General Government, and therefore, as long as a man continues a citizen of a State, he must be considered a citizen of the United States. I affirm that the Government of the United States cannot withhold its protection from, or dispense with its duties to any man, while he remains a citizen of any individual State, and that any act of the General Government, absolving him from such duties, would be inoperative.

It then becomes an important question, which this committee must decide, whether Congress can destroy the relation of citizenship between a citizen and a State?

The only powers possessed by Congress are those enumerated in the constitution, or such as are incidental to the execution of those enumerated. It will not be contended that the power in question is expressly given; it is nowhere to be found in the constitution; and, as was well remarked by the honorable gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. ANDERSON,) it is not necessary to the execution of any express power. I cannot discern any reference which it has to either the powers or objects of the Government.

The fundamental object of the General Government being shown to be the protection of the States in their sovereign rights, the measure now proposed would appear to be opposed to the object, since it tends to sever the ties by which the State communities are held together, and puts the citizen beyond the protection of both the State and the General Government. Such a power, carried to an extent easily conceivable, might interfere, materially, with State rights, and drain the States of their population, against their evident policy, and contrary, perhaps, to their express laws. Sir, I do not know whether such a law as is now contemplated, does not go the whole of this extent; it annihilates the authority of the State over the citizen, without its interposition, at the mere will and pleasure of the individual. It cannot, reasonably, be imagined that the States ever designed to surrender this portion of their sovereignty; it strikes immediately at the root of their existence, and does not in any degree conduce to the objects of the Union.

There is no instance in which the General Government possesses any control over the personal rights of the citizen, in his relation to the individual State. Such is always exclusively the object of State jurisdiction. The instances in which it can exercise a power over the persons of individuals, at all, are few, are confined to their relations to the Federal Government, and expressly defined in the constitution. But the power of regulating expatriation, implies indefinite supremacy over the personal rights and effects of the individual, in all their relations.

Each State in the Union is a distinct, independent sovereignty, and without some provision to the contrary, a citizen of one would be a foreigner in another, liable to all the disabilities of that situation. It was essential, however, for the great purposes of the Union, that such an inconvenience should be guarded against, and it was therefore declared, that "the citizens of each State should be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States." It was this provision that dictated the necessity of vesting in Congress the power "to establish a uniform rule of naturalization," lest the interests of one State might be jeopardized by an improvident admission of citizens into another. But, even this power of naturalization would not have been possessed, unless it had been expressly delegated. There is, perhaps, nothing more necessary and natural to a sovereign State, than the power of admitting foreigners to the rights of citizenship. It was therefore inherent in State sovereignty, and surrendered for the reason mentioned. But the power of divesting the right of citizenship, and of regulating the exercise of the right of expatriation, is one of a very different character, productive of different and important consequences, equally an attribute of sovereign power, but in no degree connected with the power of naturalization, and therefore cannot be supposed to have been surrendered at the same time. I conclude, therefore, said Mr. McL., that Congress, having no power to destroy the relation between a citizen and his State, cannot, constitutionally, pass any law that could denaturalize him from the United States.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Virginia, said he felt humiliated by the debate which had taken place on the subject now under deliberation. To hear the old feudal doctrine of perpetual allegiance advocated on this floor, said Mr. J., as it has been by the gentleman from Delaware, (Mr. MCLANE;) the doctrine resulting from a system which, from time immemorial, has borne down and oppressed most of the wretched subjects of Europe. A doctrine which was unknown in England, until the reign of William the Conqueror; who, by great art and address, prevailed upon the English people to adopt the feudal system, from which the doctrine of perpetual allegiance sprang.

I had not expected at this period of peace, tranquillity, and prosperity, when it is said that no distinction of party exists, when all are pretending to crowd into the Republican fold, to hear the fundamental principles on which this Government rests for its support, questioned, much less denied to exist. Although no person has had the hardihood to deny the right of the citizen to expatriate himself, yet arguments are used, which, if they be correct, go conclusively to prove that the citizen cannot and ought not to enjoy the means essential to the exercise of this right. The gentleman from Delaware (Mr. MCLANE) contends that allegiance is a contract between the citizen and the sovereign power of the country, which cannot be cancelled without the consent of both the contracting parties. He then charges the honorable gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. ROBERTSON) with introducing the bill on your table, in order to aid the patriots of South America. I well recollect the introduction of a similar proposition, by the gentleman from Louisiana, during the Thirteenth Congress, and the effect at that time produced on the Federal gentlemen of the House. Our attention is invited by the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. MCLANE) to the deplorable situation of the country during the late war. The difficulties we had to encounter in raising an army are described in glowing terms. Our being driven almost to the adoption of a system of conscription is artfully introduced. And we are gravely admonished by the gentleman that if we pass the present bill—in the event of another war, another period of difficulty—to avoid fighting the battles of their country, of asserting its honor, defending its liberty and independence, our citizens will avail themselves of its provisions, and exercise the right of expatriation. Can this be possible, Mr. Chairman? If it be, I hope it is confined to the citizens of the State of Delaware. I am confident that no Virginian would ever abandon his country in the hour of danger, would ever expatriate himself, to avoid fighting her battles, defending her honor, her liberty, and her independence. If, however, there be such an one, I should have no difficulty in fixing his doom; I would furnish him the means of expatriating himself to a region from whence he never should return. Is there any man who would dare to avow such a principle? No, sir. He would shrink from the light like the recreant felon. He would dare not meet the scrutinizing eye of investigation. I hope there is not a square foot of soil within the jurisdictional limits of the United States which nurtures such a miserable and depraved wretch.

What, sir, is the true question for the committee to decide? Do the citizens of the United States possess the right to expatriate themselves? Has Congress the power to legislate competently on the subject? and is it expedient that a complete and perfect act of legislation shall now take place? I answer that the citizens of the United States do possess the right in the most ample, unlimited, and unlimitable degree. If I be asked from whence I derive the right—I point to Heaven. It is in that great charter by which nature secured to man the right to seek happiness wheresoever he could enjoy it. I would disdain to derive the right from any of the little petty sovereignties or Governments on earth. Does it require any act of the Government to enable the citizen to exercise and enjoy this right? I contend not. The moment a citizen changes permanently his residence, and takes the oath of allegiance to the Government of the country in which he has fixed his permanent residence, he has exercised this right. All claims of the Government which he has abjured cease to exist. But the decisions of our courts are cited—a long case has been read, the case of Jonathan Williams, who had regularly expatriated himself from Virginia, and become a citizen of France, and who was tried and punished by one of our Federal courts. The remedy is at hand. It was an act of tyranny and oppression for which the judge ought to have been impeached. As it respects the right, this is a plain question. No man has, no man will dare openly to deny it. The warmest advocates of the feudal system—the warmest friends of English principles and English law will not deny the right. How does the conduct of England agree with the dictates of her jurists? Two years' service in their navy, ipso facto, makes an alien, a foreigner, a citizen of England. Can any Government presume to naturalize foreigners and deny the right of expatriation? Such pretence ought to subject a Government to ridicule and scorn.

Mr. COBB, of Georgia, said, the object of the bill under discussion, was not to change any known law, acknowledged to be in force in the United States. Its object was to declare that the principle of perpetual allegiance, known only to the common law of England, so many of the other principles of which are in force, has no binding efficacy upon the people of this country. In reasoning upon such a law, said he, it is indispensably necessary that all terms necessarily used should have a definite and clear meaning attached to them.

By allegiance, as it is explained by the judges of our own courts, and as it is defined by those who have preceded me in debate, we mean, "that tie by which the Government and the citizen are connected;" from which protection is promised, and submission expected; protection being the duty imposed upon the Government, and submission upon the citizen, with their corresponding duties. Expatriation is the dissolution of this tie; it is the act of throwing off the character of citizen—of declaring that protection is no longer expected, and consequently claiming to be freed from the duty of submission. The friends of this bill, of which I am one, say that the citizen can, as a matter of natural right, exercise this act of expatriation whenever he pleases, and that of this right no human laws can deprive him. If I understood the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. PINDALL,) even he does not deny the power of the citizen to exercise this right, and yet, in the next breath, he attempted to prove that there was no such right; that there is and must be, in every citizen, a principle of gratitude so eternal in its obligations, as that it cannot be discharged. What is this but the English common law upon the subject? The gentleman has used almost the very words of Sir William Blackstone. He ought also to have adopted the reasons of the same writer, and have traced this gratitude to the principles of universal law, preached by himself only, and which no other can understand. To me this principle of universal law is so utterly incomprehensible, that I have heard of but one thing more supremely ridiculous, and that is, the "immaculate purity of the Spanish monarchy," about which we have learned something from the pen of the Spanish Minister, during the present session. Such a principle of universal law is a twin brother of this immaculacy, and no head but such as could comprehend the latter, is able to understand the former. It was to be hoped that doctrines like these were out of fashion; but, like Judge Ellsworth, the honorable gentleman from Virginia cannot dispense with the common law, or rather that part of it which does not and ought not to prevail in this country, for the best of reasons, that it is not founded in common sense.

I would not be understood as denouncing the common law; on the contrary, in its genuine principles I find a safe and sure guarantee of the best rights of the citizen.

But even in England the absurdity of the doctrine of perpetual allegiance is obvious, because of its inconsistency with other principles equally admitted, and founded in better reasons. England also maintains the doctrine of naturalization. What is naturalization but the act of conferring upon a foreigner all the rights of a citizen, by the acquisition of which he, at the same moment, imposes upon himself all the duties of a citizen? Can there be such a thing as the naturalized citizen of two States? Can all the duties of the citizen be claimed by two States, each having a just right? Certainly not. For the act by which all the rights of citizen are acquired, and all the duties are imposed, necessarily pre-supposes that all connection between the individual and any other State, is dissolved. Wherever naturalization, then, is permitted, the right of expatriation is admitted; and all measures which have a tendency to curtail this right, is tyranny. The creatures of kings, and the slaves of despots, may venture to assert a contrary doctrine, but it ought never to come from the mouths of freemen.

The question was at length taken on striking out the first section of the bill, and decided in the affirmative, by a small majority.

The committee rose, and reported to the House this decision; and, after refusing to adjourn, or to lay the bill on the table, the question was taken on concurring with the committee in striking out the first section of the bill, (considered equivalent to rejection,) and was decided in the affirmative—yeas 70, nays 58, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Smith, Southard, Speed, Spencer, Stewart of North Carolina, Strother, Tarr, Terrill, Tompkins, Tucker of South Carolina, Tyler, Walker of Kentucky, Whiteside, and Wilson of Pennsylvania.

The remaining sections of any bill, after the first is stricken out, have usually been disposed of by a motion of course; but, on this occasion, the procedure was objected to by Mr. JOHNSON, of Virginia, and by Mr. ROBERTSON, on the ground that the bill was yet capable of amendment, and might be put into a declaratory shape, or amended in some way to recognize the right (acknowledged by all, but controverted by certain judicial decisions) of expatriation. To whom Mr. LOWNDES replied, that the proceeding now proposed was unparliamentary, and would tend to the utter confusion of the proceedings of the House, if sanctioned; since there would be no end to any question, if it could be debated, and solemnly decided, and then again debated and decided.

Before settling this mooted point of order, a motion to adjourn finally prevailed, after being once or twice refused.

TUESDAY, March 3.

Monument to the Baron de Kalb.

Mr. REED submitted the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas a resolution was passed by the Congress of the United States, on the 14th day of October, 1780, in the following words, to wit:

Resolved, That a monument be erected to the memory of the late Major General the Baron de Kalb, in the city of Annapolis, in the State of Maryland, with the following inscription:

"Sacred to the Memory of THE BARON DE KALB, Knight of the Royal Order of Military Merit, Brigadier of the Armies of France, and Major General in the service of the United States of America. Having served with honor and reputation for three years, he gave a last and glorious proof of his attachment to the liberties of mankind and the cause of America, in the action near Camden, in the State of South Carolina, on the 16th of August, 1780, when leading on the troops of the Maryland and Delaware lines against superior numbers, and animating by his example to deeds of valor, he was pierced with many wounds, and on the 19th following expired, in the forty-eighth year of his age. The Congress of the United States of America, in gratitude to his zeal, services, and merit, have erected this monument."

Resolved, therefore, That the aforegoing resolution be referred to a select committee, with instruction to report a bill to carry the same into effect.

The question was taken, "Will the House now consider the said resolution?" and determined in the negative.

Duty on Salt.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, who were instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing the duty on salt, made a report against repealing the duty; which was read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole. The report is as follows:

That the letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, with the statement which accompanies it, which they report to the House, explains the principal objections to the repeal of the duty in question, which have induced the committee to concur in the opinion of the Secretary.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Jan. 5, 1818.

SIR: In reply to your letter of the 12th ultimo, enclosing a resolution of the House of Representatives, instructing the Committee of Ways and Means "to inquire into the expediency of repealing the law laying a duty on imported salt, granting a bounty on pickled fish exported, and allowances to certain vessels employed in the fisheries;" requesting any information or opinion which I may think proper to communicate, and particularly an estimate of the revenue which has accrued from the salt duty in the years 1816 and 1817, I have the honor to submit a statement of the revenue accruing from that duty during the years 1815, 1816, and the first two quarters of 1817, and of the amount paid upon the exportation of pickled fish, as well as of the allowances to vessels employed in the fisheries.

Deducting the bounty and allowances from the gross amount of duty, and apportioning the remainder between the two years and a half, the period within which it has accrued, the annual average revenue arising from that duty is estimated at $810,016. But as the war prevented importations to any considerable extent during the first quarter of the year 1815, if that quarter should be omitted in the estimate, the annual revenue arising from the duty on salt during the period embraced by the statement would exceed $900,000. By comparing the revenue of the first two quarters of the year 1817 with that which accrued in the year 1816, it appears that there has been a considerable diminution during the latter period; it may, therefore, be unsafe to estimate it above $800,000 a year.

The revenue in the annual report of the Treasury has been estimated for the year 1818 at $24,525,000, including the internal duties, which have been since repealed. The revenue for that and for the next two years may be estimated at $22,025,000. The expenditures for the same year have been estimated at $21,946,351 74, which being deducted from the estimated revenue, there would remain a surplus of revenue, beyond the expenditure at present authorized by law, of $78,648 26.

It therefore appears that, if the salt tax shall be repealed, there will be a deficit in the revenue of more than $700,000 annually, until the proceeds of the lands in the State of Mississippi and in the Alabama Territory shall be applicable to the current expenses of the Government. During this interval the deficit will have to be supplied by the balance estimated to be in the Treasury on the 1st day of January of the present year.

As it is uncertain what appropriations may be made during the present session of Congress, beyond those authorized by existing laws, and upon which the estimates of expenditure for the year 1818 are founded, it is impossible to determine whether the balance in the Treasury will be equal to the supply of the deficiency which the repeal of the duty upon salt will create. It may be proper also to observe, that, after paying the interest of the public debt, and reimbursing the old six per cent. and deferred stock, according to the principles of the funding system, the appropriation of ten millions of dollars, constituting the sinking fund, will be unequal to the discharge of the Louisiana debt during the years 1818 and 1819. The deficiency was intended to be supplied from the balance remaining in the Treasury, under the provisions of the act of the last session of Congress, providing for the redemption of the public debt. A reduction of the balance in the Treasury, so as to prevent its application to this object, ought to be carefully guarded against.

I have the honor to be, your most obedient and very humble servant,

WM. H. CRAWFORD.

Chairman of the Com. of Ways and Means.

JOSEPH NOURSE, Register.

FRIDAY, March 6.

Mr. BUTLER presented a petition of John Stark, a Major General in the Revolutionary Army, representing his necessitous circumstances, and praying that the bounty of the National Government may be extended to him in the decline of his days, in consideration of his faithful services in the defence of his country: which was referred to a select committee; and Messrs. BUTLER, RICH, ANDERSON of Kentucky, MERCER, LIVERMORE, HOPKINSON, and MILLS, were appointed the committee.

SATURDAY, March 14.

Internal Improvement.

The House having resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of the Whole, on the report of a Committee on the subject of Roads and Canals; and the question being on agreeing to the first resolution reported by said committee, in the following words:

1. Resolved, That Congress has power, under the constitution, to appropriate money for the construction of post roads, military, and other roads, and of canals, and for the improvement of water-courses.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, said he had never voted for any proposition since he had enjoyed the honor of a seat in this House, which he did not believe to be sanctioned by the express letter of the constitution; nor should he on the present occasion. After expressing the satisfaction which he had received from this debate, than which he had never listened to any with greater pleasure, Mr. J. proceeded to say, that, as he bottomed his opinion on this question on the express letter of the constitution, he should derive no aid in support of his vote by implication. He claimed for Congress no grant of power under that clause of the constitution which speaks of the common defence and general welfare; nor did he stand here in any other character than as an advocate for State rights; for he was thoroughly convinced that there never was a more vital attack on the integrity of the States, and on State rights, than would be the rejection of the present proposition, unless it were immediately followed by an amendment to the constitution in this respect.

Mr. DESHA moved to amend the said resolution, by striking out the words "and other," the effect of which would have been to confine the declaration to post roads and military roads.

After some remarks from Mr. LOWNDES, who desired that the amendment might not prevail, that the House might be allowed to vote on the broad proposition, the motion of Mr. DESHA was negatived.

Mr. MILLS moved to postpone indefinitely the further consideration of the subject, and supported this motion in a speech of half an hour.

Mr. LOWNDES made some observations calculated to show that it was highly important to obtain a decision of this House at the present session; a different course, after the many days consumed in debate, he thought would be unjust to the committee who had made report on the subject, and dissatisfactory in its result.

Messrs. BALDWIN and LIVERMORE also opposed the indefinite postponement.

The motion for indefinite postponement was decided in the negative, by yeas and nays—for the postponement 77, against it 87.

The question was then taken on concurring in the first resolution adopted by the Committee of the Whole, as above stated, and decided as follows—yeas 90, nays 75:

YEAS.—Messrs. Abbott, Anderson of Kentucky, Baldwin, Barber of Ohio, Bateman, Bayley, Beecher, Bloomfield, Campbell, Colston, Comstock, Crawford, Cruger, Cushman, Darlington, Ellicott, Ervin of South Carolina, Forsyth, Gage, Hall of Delaware, Harrison, Hasbrouck, Hendricks, Herbert, Herkimer, Herrick, Heister, Hitchcock, Holmes of Massachusetts, Hopkinson, Hubbard, Irving of New York, Johnson of Kentucky, Jones, Kinsey, Lawyer, Linn, Livermore, Lowndes, McLane, W. P. Maclay, Marchand, Marr, Mercer, Middleton, Moore, Morton, Mumford, Murray, Jeremiah Nelson, Ogden, Ogle, Palmer, Parrott, Patterson, Pawling, Peter, Pindall, Poindexter, Porter, Quarles, Robertson of Kentucky, Robertson of Louisiana, Savage, Schuyler, Sergeant, Seybert, Simkins, Slocumb, S. Smith, Bal. Smith, Southard, Spencer, Stuart of Maryland, Tallmadge, Tarr, Taylor, Terrill, Trimble, Tucker of Virginia, Upham, Wallace, Wendover, Westerlo, Whiteside, Whitman, Wilkin, Wilson of Massachusetts, and Wilson of Pennsylvania.

NAYS.—Messrs. Adams, Allen of Massachusetts, Allen of Vermont, Anderson of Pennsylvania, Austin, Ball, Barbour of Virginia, Bassett, Bellinger, Bennett, Blount, Boden, Bryan, Burwell, Butler, Clagett, Cobb, Cook, Crafts, Culberth, Desha, Drake, Earle, Edwards, Folger, Forney, Garnett, Hale, Hall of North Carolina, Hogg, Holmes of Connecticut, Hunter, Huntington, Johnson of Virginia, Kirtland, McCoy, Mason of Massachusetts, Mason of Rhode Island, Merrill, Mills, Mosely, H. Nelson, T. M. Nelson, New, Orr, Owen, Pitkin, Pleasants, Reed, Rhea, Rice, Richards, Ringgold, Ruggles, Sampson, Sawyer, Scudder, Settle, Sherwood, Shaw, Silsbee, Alexander Smyth, J. S. Smith, Speed, Stewart of North Carolina, Strong, Terry, Tompkins, Townsend, Tucker of South Carolina, Taylor, Walker of North Carolina, Williams of Connecticut, Williams of New York, and Williams of North Carolina.

So the first resolution was adopted.

The second resolution having been read in the following words:

2. Resolved, That Congress has power, under the constitution, to construct post roads and military roads; provided that private property be not taken for public use, without just compensation.

The question was then taken on agreeing to the second resolution as above stated, and decided as follows—yeas 82, nays 84:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anderson of Kentucky, Baldwin, Barber of Ohio, Bateman, Bayley, Beecher, Bloomfield, Campbell, Colston, Comstock, Crawford, Cruger, Cushman, Darlington, Ellicott, Ervin of South Carolina, Forsyth, Gage, Hall of Delaware, Harrison, Hasbrouck, Hendricks, Herbert, Herkimer, Herrick, Heister, Hitchcock, Hopkinson, Irving of New York, Johnson of Kentucky, Jones, Kinsey, Lawyer, Linn, Livermore, Lowndes, McLane, Marchand, Marr, Mercer, Moore, Morton, Mumford, Murray, Ogden, Ogle, Palmer, Parrott, Patterson, Pawling, Peter, Pindall, Porter, Quarles, Rich, Robertson of Kentucky, Robertson of Louisiana, Savage, Schuyler, Sergeant, Seybert, Simpkins, Slocumb, Ballard Smith, Southard, Speed, Spencer, Stuart of Maryland, Tallmadge, Tarr, Taylor, Terrill, Trimble, Upham, Wallace, Wendover, Westerlo, Whiteside, Wilkin, Wilson of Massachusetts, and Wilson of Pennsylvania.

NAYS.—Messrs. Abbott, Adams, Allen of Massachusetts, Allen of Vermont, Anderson of Pennsylvania, Austin, Ball, Barbour of Virginia, Bassett, Bellinger, Bennett, Blount, Boden, Boss, Bryan, Burwell, Butler, Clagett, Claiborne, Cobb, Cook, Crafts, Culberth, Desha, Drake, Earle, Edwards, Folger, Forney, Garnett, Hale, Hall of North Carolina, Hogg, Holmes of Massachusetts, Holmes of Connecticut, Hunter, Huntington, Johnson of Virginia, W. Maclay, W. P. Maclay, McCoy, Mason of Massachusetts, Mason of Rhode Island, Merrill, Mills, Mosely, Jeremiah Nelson, H. Nelson, T. M. Nelson, New, Orr, Owen, Pitkin, Pleasants, Poindexter, Reed, Rhea, Rice, Richards, Ringgold, Ruggles, Sampson, Sawyer, Scudder, Settle, Shaw, Sherwood, Silsbee, S. Smith, Alexander Smyth, J. S. Smith, Stewart of North Carolina, Strong, Terry, Tompkins, Townsend, Tucker of Virginia, Tucker of South Carolina, Tyler, Walker of North Carolina, Whitman, Williams of Connecticut, Williams of New York, and Williams of North Carolina.

So the resolution was not agreed to.

The third resolution was then read as follows:

3. Resolved, That Congress has power, under the constitution, to construct roads and canals necessary for commerce between the States; provided, that private property be not taken for public purposes, without just compensation.

The question was then stated upon concurring with the Committee of the Whole, in that part of their amendment embraced by the fourth resolution, in the following words, viz:

4. Resolved, That Congress has power, under the constitution, to construct canals for military purposes: Provided, That no private property be taken for any such purpose, without just compensation being made therefor.

The question then recurred on agreeing to the said fourth resolution, and being taken, it was determined in the negative—yeas 81, nays 83.

So the resolution was not agreed to.

The result of the whole proceeding is, that the House have come the following resolution:

"That Congress have power, under the constitution, to appropriate money for the construction of post roads, military and other roads, and of canals, and for the improvement of water-courses."*

Our Relations with Spain.

The following Message was then received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Speaker of the House of Representatives:

In compliance with a resolution of the Senate, of the 16th December, and of the House of Representatives, I lay before Congress a report of the Secretary of State, and the papers referred to in it, respecting the negotiation with Spain. To explain fully the nature of the differences between the United States and Spain, and the conduct of the parties, it has been found necessary to go back to an early epoch. The recent correspondence, with the documents accompanying it, will give a full view of the whole subject, and place the conduct of the United States, in every stage, and under every circumstance, for justice, moderation, and a firm adherence to their rights, on that high and honorable ground, which it has invariably sustained.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, March 14, 1818.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, March 14, 1818.

The Secretary of State, to whom have been referred the resolution of the Senate, of 16th December, and of the House of Representatives of the 24th February last, has the honor of submitting to the President the correspondence between this Department and the Spanish Minister resident here, since he received the last instructions of his Government to renew the negotiations which, at the time of the last communication to Congress, were suspended by the insufficiency of his powers. These documents will show the present state of the relations between the two Governments.

As in the remonstrance by Mr. de Onis, of the 6th of December against the occupation by the United States of Amelia Island, he refers to a previous communication from him, denouncing the expedition of Sir Gregor McGregor against that place, his note of 9th July, being the paper thus referred to, is added to the papers now transmitted. Its date, when compared with that of the occupation of Amelia by McGregor, will show that it was written ten days after that event; and the contents of his note of 6th December, will show that measures had been taken by the competent authorities of the United States to arrest McGregor as soon as the unlawfulness of his proceedings within our jurisdiction had been made known to them by legal evidence, although he was beyond the reach of the process before it could be served upon his person. The tardiness of Mr. Onis's remonstrances is of itself a decisive vindication of the magistrates of the United States against any imputation of neglect to enforce the laws; for, if the Spanish Minister himself had no evidence of the project of McGregor, sufficient to warrant him in addressing a note upon the subject, to this Department, until ten days after it had been accomplished, it cannot be supposed that officers, whose authority to act commenced only at the moment of the actual violation of the law, and who could be justified only by clear and explicit evidence of the facts in proof of such violation, should have been apprised of the necessity of their interposition in time to make it effectual before the person accused had departed from this country.

As, in the recent discussions between Mr. Onis and this Department, there is frequent reference to those of the negotiation at Aranjuez in 1805, the correspondence between the Extraordinary Minister of the United States at that period, and Don Pedro Cevallos, the Minister of Foreign Affairs in Spain, will be also permitted as soon as may be, to be laid before Congress, together with the correspondence between Don Francisco Pizarro and Mr. Erving, immediately preceding the transmission of new instructions to Mr. Onis, and other correspondence of Mr. Onis with this Department, tending to complete the view of the relations between the two countries.

* The vote in this case seems to have turned upon the word "necessary," as found at the end of the enumerated powers granted to Congress; and under which word it was held to be constitutional to adopt the measures which were deemed necessary to carry into effect these granted powers; —a very unsafe way of deriving powers;—as the opinion of what may be necessary may depend upon the temperament of different members as well as upon judgment, and may vary in the same man at different times; and is, at all times, influenced by existing circumstances. Thus the financial circumstances of the country in the war of 1812 induced the establishment of the second National Bank—under the supposition of necessity: the circumstances of the country in the Mexican war of 1846, were different, and no such bank was thought of. Again: The want of roads during the war of 1812, for the march of troops, and the transportation of supplies, and the general difficulty in carrying the mails, and keeping up commercial intercourse, made these roads be felt as a necessity in war, in commerce, and in the post office: and many roads, under the conviction of these necessities, were then made—not one of which is now so used! all being superseded by the railways, and the electric telegraph—fruits of individual genius and private enterprise. So that the constitutionality of the federal road-making power would be condemned in 1856 upon the same test on which it was established in 1818.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

MONDAY, March 16.

Mr. MARR presented a petition of the General Assembly of the State of Tennessee, praying that such measures may be adopted, as will enable citizens of that State to take possession of lands purchased by them from the State of North Carolina, and which are now held by the Chickasaw Indians, under a treaty concluded with the United States.—Referred to the committee appointed on the 17th December last, respecting the Indian title to lands within the State of Kentucky.

Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana, presented a petition of Gales & Seaton, stating, that they proposed to publish a History of Congress, from the commencement of the Government to the present day, and praying the aid and patronage of Congress in their said publication; which was read, and referred to a select committee; and Mr. ROBERTSON, Mr. TYLER, Mr. HOPKINSON, Mr. HOLMES, of Massachusetts, and Mr. SIMKINS, were apppointed the committee.

Mr. SCOTT presented petitions of sundry inhabitants of the Territory of Missouri, praying that the said Territory may be admitted into the Union, as a State, on an equal footing with the original States; which were, together with the petitions of a similar nature, heretofore presented at the present session, referred to a select committee; and Mr. SCOTT, Mr. ROBERTSON of Kentucky, Mr. POINDEXTER, Mr. HENDRICKS, Mr. LIVERMORE, Mr. MILLS, and Mr. BALDWIN, were appointed the committee.

TUESDAY, March 17.

Neutral Relations.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the bill in addition to "An act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States," and to repeal the acts therein mentioned, (to enact into one, with amendments, the several acts heretofore passed to enforce the neutral obligations of the United States.)

Mr. FORSYTH rose in explanation of the views of the Committee of Foreign Relations in proposing this bill, which was the result of the general inquiry into the various existing acts on this subject which had been referred to them, and which it was presumed answered the intentions of the House in directing the inquiry. Mr. F. briefly recapitulated the history of the several laws passed on this subject, from the act of 1794, rendered necessary by the French Revolution, and the want of sufficient power in the Executive to enforce on our own citizens the observance of neutrality, down to the act of the last session; and concluded by explaining the amendment which the committee had deemed necessary to the strict impartiality of the provisions of the bill they had reported.

Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana, after submitting his reasons for disputing the propriety of some of the former acts; for believing that the provisions of the present bill exceeded the obligations imposed on us by a just regard to neutral duties, and went further than the neutral acts of any other nation—moved, first, to strike out the following proviso:

"That if any person so enlisted, shall, within thirty days after such enlistment, voluntarily discover upon oath to some justice of the peace, or other civil magistrate, the person or persons by whom he was so enlisted, so as that he or they may be apprehended or convicted of the said offence, such person so discovering the offender or offenders, shall be indemnified from the penalty prescribed by this act."

This motion was agreed to without a division.

Mr. CLAY offered some general remarks on the offensive nature of the bill, which, he said, instead of an act to enforce neutrality, ought to be entitled, an act for the benefit of His Majesty the King of Spain. He also expressed his unwillingness thus to be called on to re-enact laws already in force, of which he did not wish to have now the labor of investigating their principles, or the responsibility, if wrong, of renovating and participating in' them. Sufficient, he thought, for the day, was the evil thereof; and he was sorry the committee had not contented itself with bringing forward some original proposition, without hunting out and bringing up for re-enaction all the old laws heretofore passed on the subject. There was a great difference between suffering acts to remain unrepealed, and bringing them up for re-enactment, and he gave notice that, after this bill should be made as perfect as its friends could make it, he should submit a single proposition to leave the act of 1794 in force, and to repeal the acts of 1797 and of 1817. Mr. C. concluded by moving to strike out of the second section the words which make it penal for a person to "go beyond the limits or jurisdiction of the United States, with intent to be enlisted or entered," in the service of any foreign Prince or State.

Mr. FORSYTH opposed the motion, and observed, that after the great labor which the committee had undertaken on this subject, at the instance of the Speaker, (Mr. CLAY,) they had some reason to complain of his remarks on the course they had taken. A general inquiry into the subject and revision of the acts had been referred to them, and the committee had found it easier and better to amend and bring into one general bill all the acts, than to adopt any other course. Mr. F. said that, so far from operating unfairly against the cause of the patriots, this bill removed certain provisions of the act of 1797, which bore exclusively on that cause, denouncing the severest penalties against those of our citizens who aid them, which this bill would render equal and impartial. Mr. F. adduced some arguments to show the propriety of retaining the provision moved to be stricken out; but, after some conversation between Mr. CLAY and Mr. FORSYTH, the question was taken, and Mr. CLAY's motion agreed to without a count.

Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana, objected to the penalties proposed by the bill, as unreasonably severe, and instead of a fine of $10,000, and ten years' imprisonment which the judge might, at his discretion, impose on the offender—moved to substitute $2,000 and three years.

This motion was opposed by Messrs. FORSYTH, SMITH of Maryland, LIVERMORE, and RHEA, and supported by Messrs. ROBERTSON of Louisiana, CLAIBORNE, and BALL.

The question being divided, the motion to reduce the fine was negatived—ayes 40; and the motion to reduce the limit of imprisonment was carried—62 to 60.

Mr. HOLMES, of Massachusetts, moved to amend the section, so as to leave it to the discretion of the judge to inflict both fine and imprisonment, or one only, instead of being obliged, as the bill stood, to impose both, if either.—Negatived—ayes 55.

Mr. HERRICK moved to reduce the fine to $5,000; which was also negatived.

After some other unsuccessful motions of minor importance—

Mr. FORSYTH moved to strike from the third section the provision which makes it penal for any citizen to fit out or arm, without the jurisdiction of the United States, any ship or vessel with intent to commit hostilities upon the citizens or subjects of a friendly State—leaving in this section only the provision against such citizens of the United States as shall, beyond our jurisdiction, fit out vessels to commit hostilities against the citizens of the United States.

This motion produced a good deal of debate, principally on the expediency of striking out the whole section, and on the impropriety of still retaining a feature in the bill which would admit the possibility of a crime so monstrous and improbable, as that of citizens going abroad to commence war upon the citizens and commerce of their own country, and which, even if committed, would be punishable either as treason or piracy.

Messrs. CLAY, ROBERTSON, FORSYTH, SMITH of Maryland, and PITKIN, joined in the discussion; but, before any question was taken, the committee rose, and the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, March 18.

The Neutrality Bill.

A motion (made yesterday) to amend the fourth section of the bill, was now agreed to—the effect of which was to confine the provisions of that section to the punishment of any citizens of the United States who should fit out vessels to cruise against the commerce of the United States, leaving out what related to the commerce of foreign nations.

Mr. CLAY rose to propose an amendment he had before indicated. Amended as it had been, Mr. C. said he had no objection to retaining the fourth section; but moved to strike out all the remainder of the bill, except so much as retains the provisions of the act of 1794, and repeals the acts of 1797 and 1817—the simple effect of which amendment would be to repeal the act of 1797 and that of 1817. In the propriety of repealing the act of 1797, he understood the Chairman of Foreign Relations to concur. Of course, then, it would only be necessary to show that the act of the last session ought to be repealed; and that it goes beyond any neutral duty we can owe. In the threshold of this discussion, Mr. C. said, he confessed he did not like much the origin of that act. There had been some disclosures, not in an official form, but in such a shape as to entitle them to credence, that showed that act to have been the result of a teasing on the part of foreign agents in this country, which he regretted to have seen. But, from whatever source it sprung, if it was an act necessary to preserve the neutral relations of the country, Mr. C. said it ought to be retained. But this he denied. The act was predicated on the ground that the existing provisions did not reach the case of the war now raging between Spain and the South American provinces. In its provisions it went beyond the obligations of the United States to other powers, and that part of it was unprecedented in any nation, which compelled citizens of the United States to give bonds not to commit acts without the jurisdiction of the United States, which it is the business of foreign nations, and not of this Government, to guard against. Does the act of 1794, said Mr. C., embrace the case of the Spanish patriots? That was the question, and it was not worth while to disguise it. If St. Domingo was not included, as had been said, in the act of 1794, it would not follow that that act did not embrace the case of the Spanish patriots. What was the condition of St. Domingo? Had the Executive of the United States ever acknowledged, in regard to that war, that it was a civil war, respecting which the United States stood in a neutral relation? No such acknowledgment, he said, had ever been made, in respect to the war in that island, as had been expressly made by the Executive in regard to the war in South America, that it was a civil war. And, when the courts came to apply the law to cases before them, having the decision of the Executive to guide them, they must decide that the law of 1794 is applicable to both parties. The act of 1817, consequently, was wholly unnecessary to the object for which it was avowedly enacted, and was one of superfluous legislation. Mr. C. said he recollected with pleasure that he gave his negative to it; that every member from the State of which he was a Representative did the same. He recollected that sixty-three members of that part of this House, with whom it had been, and would always be, his pride and pleasure to act, had recorded their votes against it. The voice of the country had since pronounced its doom, and left for Congress nothing to do but to repeal the act. Disguise it as you will, said he, the world has seen the act in its true character; has regarded it as a measure calculated to affect the struggle going on in the South, and discovered that, however neutral in its language, its bearing was altogether against the cause of the patriots. How, asked he, is that war now carried on? But for the supplies drawn from this country through Havana, for sustaining the army of Morillo, this modern Alva, whose career is characterized by all the enormities which have consigned to perpetual infamy the name of his great prototype; but for the supplies drawn through Havana, whose port is open to us only for the sake of those supplies, General Morillo could not have supported his army. This fact he had from the highest authority, from the commander of one of our national vessels who had been on a cruise in that quarter and had received it from the lips of Morillo himself. It becomes us, Mr. C. said, really and bona fide to perform our neutral obligations. He had seen and heard of circumstances respecting this subject, humiliating in the extreme. He had been told, for instance, that in the case lately argued in the Supreme Court of the United States, of some of those individuals tried in the court of the United States at Boston, not only was the Attorney-General ready at his post, as he should be, to attend to it, but the attorney for the Massachusetts district was there to argue it also; and, not satisfied with this, a foreign agent was seen attending the court, to see probably that nothing was omitted, and not even a poor Amicus Curiæ was there to speak for the accused. Such was the state of the case that the humanity of the Attorney-General had interposed, and induced that highly meritorious officer to make some suggestions favorable to those individuals. Was there a man in this country, Mr. C. asked, who did not feel his conscience reproach him for that transaction?

The act of 1797 being given up on all hands, and the act of 1817 being, as he thought he had shown, unnecessary, he hoped his motion would prevail. If, however, contrary to his belief, the House should decide that the act of 1794 did not cover the case of the existing civil war, and the act of 1817 should be thought necessary to bring it within the provisions of the act of 1794, Mr. C. said he should, in that event, submit another proposition to amend the bill, predicated on the idea that some provision was necessary in addition to the act of 1794.

The motion of Mr. CLAY to amend the bill having been stated from the Chair—

Mr. FORSYTH said he was opposed to the motion, and could not but suppose the honorable Speaker himself was doubtful of its success, as he had drawn before the House a variety of considerations which had no bearing on the question. Mr. F. denied, in the first place, that public sentiment had condemned the act of 1817. It was true, indeed, that certain exclusive friends of liberty, at the head of presses in the United States, had condemned this act; but, so far as we have any expression of opinion from the great body of the people of the United States, from the thinking part of the community, the act had been approved. But the Speaker had informed the committee that sixty-three members of the House had opposed that act, and that all the members from a certain section of the country were in favor of it. This was another point, Mr. F. said, on which he differed from the honorable Speaker. The act of 1817, as it stands, came into this House on the 3d of March, 1817, and was passed by a large majority, the yeas and nays not having been required on it. How the Speaker then had ascertained the political complexion of those who voted for the bill, Mr. F. knew not; as far as he recollected, a very small minority had voted against it. That part of the bill which had been objected to in this House, had been stricken out in the Senate, and the bill, so amended, and as it now stands, was scarcely opposed on its final passage. There was, therefore, no decided political sentiment expressed on the passage of the bill. But, to excite prejudice against the act of 1817, another ground had been taken, and a suggestion made, which, if true, was a reflection, not on the House, but on the gentleman whose eulogy the Speaker some days ago pronounced. The origin of this act had been imputed to the teasing of certain foreign agents near the United States. That the Message of President Madison, recommending that act, was in consequence of the representations of foreign ministers, Mr. F. said he was ready to admit—not of reiterated importunities, but of a performance of their duty to their Governments by remonstrating against violations, by citizens of the United States, of obligations which we owe not to any one nation, but equally to all. A remonstrance had been made by the Portuguese Minister, a garbled representation of which had been published; a similar statement of facts had been made by the Minister of Great Britain, another by the Minister of France. All the foreign Ministers here had, in short, represented that citizens of the United States, engaged in cruises in patriot vessels, as they were called, fitted from our ports, committed depredations on the commerce of England, France, and Spain. What, Mr. F. asked, had been the duty of the President of the United States if these facts were true? Were not the United States bound to make reparation, if, without an effort to prevent it, we suffered depredations to be made, by our citizens, and from our ports, on the commerce of nations in amity with us? The Government, he said, had heretofore recognized this principle, and had remunerated foreign citizens for property taken from them by citizens of the United States. The President, then, had barely performed an imperious duty in representing to Congress the insufficiency of the laws, &c.

But, Mr. F. said, he would never do the late President the injustice to state his views, when he had it in his power to quote his own lan guage conveying them. [Mr. F. then referred to the President's Message, of last session, on which the neutrality act of March 3d, 1817, was founded.] He appealed to every other member of the House whether, in this recommendation, there was any thing censurable; any thing that the most fastidious could mark for reprobation. The act of 1817 was precisely correspondent with the Message, and, almost in so many words, an answer to it. It corrected the defects of the existing laws, and enabled the President of the United States, where there was strong ground to presume that a cruiser was about to violate the neutral relations of the United States, to arrest his departure until he should give bond not to violate the laws of his country. But this, the House had been told, was a most extraordinary provision, and unprecedented in the annals of civilized legislation. It was not necessary, Mr. F. said, for him to tell the House that, whenever a citizen of the United States or of any State is accused, on public ground, of intending to commit an offence against the authority of the laws, it is the duty of a magistrate to require him not only to give security not to commit a particular act, but to bind him over, in ample security, that he will not violate any of the laws. But it was objected, particularly, that it was required of a citizen to give bond to refrain, when beyond the jurisdiction of the United States, from certain acts. And was it not right to do so, when the United States were responsible for his conduct when beyond their jurisdiction? That was a question which had long been settled. And was there any hardship, Mr. F. asked, in requiring bond from a citizen that he will refrain on the high seas from acts affecting the character of the country, and involving it in disputes with foreign powers? And yet there was nothing else in that act which even in the eyes of the honorable Speaker was reprehensible. But this provision had been said to be unprecedented. Why, Mr. F. said, our statute book is full of similar provisions. Every restrictive law of the United States, every law forbidding commercial intercourse or regulating it with foreign nations, contains similar provisions. The laws prohibiting the slave trade contain similar provisions. If a person swear that he suspects another of intention to violate the laws, against the slave trade, the person so suspected is required by the collector to give bond and security that he will not violate the law in this respect. And where, Mr. F. asked, was the impropriety of this provision? But there was a still stronger case: That of the act prohibiting intercourse with St. Domingo was perfectly parallel to the present; for, although the color of those who were there fighting for their liberty might make a difference in the policy of the Government, it could make none in the principles on which that policy was founded. It was well known that, at the date of that act, a contest existed between the European colonists and the colored population of St. Domingo; the latter claiming a recognition of their liberty, the former claiming to reduce them to obedience. Did the United States permit the vessels of that Government, or pretended Government, to come here for military supplies? Did it permit the agent from St. Domingo to reside here, to grant commissions to privateers, to make representations to the Government, officially or unofficially, and to make appeals from the acts of the Executive to the Congress or the people? No, Mr. F. said, the Government of France asked from the justice of this country, to pass laws prohibiting any commercial intercourse with the citizens of St. Domingo, and an act was passed, for two years, and afterwards continued in force for two years longer, one of the provisions of which was similar to that one of the act of '17, which was so much reprobated by the Speaker.

Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana, said he had voted against the act of 1817, and was now in favor of its repeal. Before coming to that question, however, he would remark that, when our situation was more critical, and when, in point of resources, we were infinitely weaker; when, in 1794, our citizens were engaged in behalf of the republicans of France, with a zeal infinitely more dangerous to the peace of the country than any thing that has been exhibited in regard to the patriots of South America, the act of 1794 had been deemed sufficient to secure the observance of our neutral relations. Was our situation, he asked, more critical in 1817 than in 1794? If not, ought we to have been induced to take stronger measures by far than had been applied to the emergency of 1794? The administration of WASHINGTON not only deemed the act of that day sufficient, but cautiously limited its duration to two years. It had been subsequently renewed two or three times, and Congress had always been satisfied with its provisions. In 1817, however, a state of things somewhat similar occurs, but infinitely less critical, in consequence of another effort, by another people, to throw off the yoke of a despotic Government. As the struggle of the people of France for liberty gave rise to the act of 1794, so that of the people of South America gave rise to the act of 1817, which was passed by Congress without the knowledge of any exterior pressure on the Government, or of the letter which had been mentioned, and other representations. It now appeared that the act of 1817 was passed in consequence of representations of foreign nations, growing out of hostile feelings to the cause in which the people of South America were engaged. This, said Mr. R., might be a sufficient ground for the Ministers of Portugal, of England, and of France, to proceed upon—but shall we sympathize in their feelings on the subject, and be induced by them to pass acts to shackle our citizens, when it is so easy to trace their remonstrances to a general hostility to the cause of any people who are engaged in a struggle to ameliorate their condition by changing their form of government? It did not appear now, he said, that that act had been passed so much with a view to do what was just to ourselves, as to accommodate the views of foreign nations. That, Mr. R. said, had been his objection to the act when it passed; and the more its causes and effects were developed, the more anxious he was to get rid of it, and to return to the statutory provisions of 1794, which, for a number of years, had been found sufficient.

The cases stated by the Chairman of the Committee of Foreign Relations, (Mr. FORSYTH,) as having induced the passage of the act of last session, were already provided for by the act of 1794; he referred to cases of fitting out vessels in our harbors, and with them cruising against the commerce of foreign nations, prohibited in that act, under very heavy penalties. But the act of 1817 went a step further, and authorized the collector to stop any vessel manifestly built for warlike purposes, if it has a cargo on board which shows it to have been intended for such purposes, or having a crew, or for any other cause, justifying that suspicion. Mr. R. wished to know by what authority the Government undertook to say, that a vessel built for warlike purposes should not leave the ports and harbors of the United States. What breach of neutrality is it to suffer such vessels to depart our ports; and why are we required, in this manner, to cripple the operations of the shipholders and shipbuilders? Mr. R. strongly objected to the latitude of discretion given to collectors by the term "or for any other cause," which subjected the vessels of our citizens to vexatious detentions. This, he said, was one difference between the act of 1794 and that of 1817; but there was yet another. By the act of 1817, not only armed vessels, but vessels manifestly built for war, though built for sale only, were forbidden to go from our ports without giving bond that they were not to be employed in aiding or assisting any military expedition, &c., and so obviously unjust was this provision, that the gentleman himself had found it necessary to propose an amendment to narrow its scope. Mr. R. concluded by repeating that he could see nothing in our situation which required a stronger act than was deemed sufficient in 1794, and he, therefore, hoped the acts of 1797 and 1817 would be repealed.

Mr. LOWNDES commenced his remarks by redeeming the act of 1817 from the charge which had been alleged against it, as far as his opinion went, by declaring that act not to have been adopted in consequence of any foreign remonstrance, but to have been the deliberate expression of the judgment of this and of the other House; and, though he had listened with the greatest attention to the arguments of the gentlemen from Kentucky and Louisiana, they had failed to convince him that that deliberate expression of the opinion of Congress at the last session ought now to be reversed. But, he said, there was less difference on principle than he had expected to have found between those gentlemen and those who approved the act of the last session. The Speaker particularly had conceded that the acts were unlawful which that law was designed to prevent; and the only difference between us, said Mr. L., is that for the prevention of these unlawful acts we propose a remedy, which they will not accept. On the question of the criminality of enlistment in a war between two powers with whom we are in amity, we perfectly agree. The opinion of the House and of the country, Mr. L. said, must be that, so long as we profess neutrality, we ought to observe it; that our neutral obligations should be fairly and honestly fulfilled. And it was because he thought it the duty of Congress to prevent our citizens, by requiring bond and security to that effect, from engaging in the existing war, that he was willing to continue the act which the Speaker proposed to repeal. He could not think, he said, that there was any thing new in the act of 1817; not merely because similar provisions might be found in our own municipal regulations, but because analogous provisions existed in the laws of other nations. Mr. L. asked of the honorable Speaker, seeing that in time of war we require bond from privateers, before commissioned, that they will not violate the laws of nations, why in time of peace he would not require bonds from those suspected of the intention to violate them. Mr. L. considered it an imperfect view of the subject to suppose that the bond thus required was only to prevent injury being done to any one power. Those who leave our shores to assail the property of one power, may, when they get to sea, employ their arms against any and every nation. It was perfectly fair, certainly, that those who left our shores with the means of mischief on board, should give that security against their involving the interests, and perhaps the peace of their country, which bonds, such as are required by the law of 1817, are calculated to afford. The gentleman from Louisiana appeared to think that there could scarcely be any thing in the cargo of the vessel which ought to be taken as an indication of a warlike purpose. Now, Mr. L. said, though he did not think this clause material—not, however, that he would repeal a law because every syllable it contained was absolutely necessary—yet he thought that from the cargo the object of an expedition fitted from our ports might be readily inferred. Might there not, he said, be that preparation of fixed ammunition, &c., which would afford a strong presumption that the vessel was not intended for traffic, but prepared for war? He thought this might occur where other proof would fail. Mr. L. took other views of this question. He said he could not regard this question as one of a mere fulfilment of our duties to the countries at war, as the vessels equipped in our ports might be employed against other countries with whom we are at peace, as well as against those belligerents. One consideration for such an act he would suggest, which it was too late for us to deny, that we are responsible for injuries done by vessels of the United States, after they leave our ports, before they arrive at a foreign port. For such depredations we are responsible, and have recognized the principle by paying claims founded on it. We have bound ourselves to respect the principle in a manner equally obligatory, by preferring claims founded on it against other nations. Having done so, every consideration of prudence, of respect for the character of our country, requires that we should exact the security which is demanded by the act of 1817. As regards those who desire to trade in vessels of war, it is necessary to provide, as has been provided, that it shall be carried on in a way beneficial to them, but compatible with the higher interests of the country. No duty, said Mr. L., is by the act of 1817 exacted from any individual which the Speaker does not think, as well as myself, ought to be performed; a bond only is exacted, in certain suspicious cases, that that duty shall be performed. Where the hardship, then; where the commercial inconvenience of being required to give bond that, while on the high seas, the suspected vessel shall not violate the laws of the country? The act of 1817 created no new duty, established no new prohibition; it only secured the execution of existing duties in a particular, for the failure to observe which the Treasury of the United States, and not the offending individuals, would ultimately be responsible. Mr. L. would not say that the act merited none of the reprobation bestowed on it; but he would say that it had not been proved to contain any injurious or oppressive provisions.

Mr. CLAY said it was always with very painful regret that he found himself differing from the gentleman who had just taken his seat, and with the Chairman of the Committee of Foreign Relations; and, when differing from them; he almost distrusted his own perceptions. But this was not the first time he had that misfortune; for his honorable friend (Mr. LOWNDES) had been at the last session a powerful auxiliary in carrying through the bill which then passed, and was now proposed to be repealed. Notwithstanding his great regret at the circumstance, however, he must obey the dictates of his own judgment. Mr. C. said he never had intimated that the act of 1817 did not originate in the judgment of this House, or that it was passed at the instance of any foreign Ministers; and yet, if he understood the gentleman from Georgia, he had admitted that the committee had had the benefit of the suggestions of several foreign Ministers. It was immaterial to him, Mr. C. said, whether the act sprung from any suggestion of foreign agents, or whether after it was recommended, the letters of the Ministers were sent to the Committee of Foreign Relations. As to the foreign Ministers, Mr. C. said, in referring to them, he meant nothing disrespectful towards them—he would not treat with disrespect even the Minister of Ferdinand, whose cause this bill was intended to benefit; he, said Mr. C., is a faithful Minister; if, not satisfied with making representations to the foreign department, he also attends the proceedings of the Supreme Court, to watch its decisions, he affords but so many proofs of the fidelity for which the representatives of Spain have always been distinguished. And how motifying is it, sir, to hear of the honorary rewards and titles, and so forth, granted for these services; for, if I am not mistaken, our act of 1817 produced the bestowal of some honor on this faithful representative of His Majesty—and, if this bill passes which is now before us, I have no doubt he will receive some new honor for his further success. No, Mr. C. said, he would never treat foreign Ministers to our Government with disrespect. But yet he was not entirely satisfied with the suggestions respecting the representations, garbled and ungarbled, of the foreign Ministers. In regard to the letter of the Minister of Portugal—a man whom Mr. C. said he highly venerated; whom he regarded as an honor to his country and an ornament to science—a man whose country could not have shown a greater respect for the United States than by deputing him as its representative to this Government—with regard to that letter, as the gentleman had charged the publication which had been made of it to be a garbled one, and it seemed by his confession, (his precious confession, he would call it, but not in the obnoxious sense of the term,) that he either had the document in his possession or had seen it, he hoped that he would lay it before the House in extenso, that they might see it in its ungarbled state, &c. But, having been contradicted in the statement he had made when up before, respecting the passage of the act of 1817, Mr. C. begged of the honorable gentleman, before he disputed any statement of his (Mr. C.'s) to take the trouble to examine whether he was himself correct. If the gentleman would turn to the Journal, he would find that, on the question to engross the bill, there were sixty-three in the negative. [Mr. FORSYTH explained; the bill thus ordered to be engrossed was not that which finally passed, which came from the Senate.] If, Mr. CLAY continued, the gentleman would look over the list of names recorded in the negative, he would find the name of one of the present Cabinet, the Secretary of War. The yeas and nays had also been taken on the proposition to postpone the bill indefinitely when it came back from the Senate; and, although owing to the period of the session, a smaller number voted on the bill, there were yet thirty-seven votes for postponement, to some sixty odd against it.

But, said Mr. C., it seems that in the remarks which I have submitted, I have made some reflections on the late President of the United States. No such thing. But was there not, he asked, a considerable alteration, since the act of 1817, in our posture in respect to the war between Spain and the Provinces. The Executive had since declared to the whole world that the condition of the United States is one of neutrality in regard to the contest. Not that only but that the war carrying on is a civil war, and that we owe to both parties all the obligations of neutrality—the obligations due to a party in a civil war being very different from those due to a people in rebellion, and demanding therefore a different state of our laws. But, returning to the late President of the United States—no man, Mr. C. said, had a more high sense of the exalted character and distinguished services of the gentleman to whom he thus alluded; but, whilst, said he, I am a Representative of the nation, I shall speak freely my sentiments, let them be in opposition to whom they may, whether the existing or any former Chief Magistrate of the United States. Mr. C. then called upon gentlemen to show that the act of 1794 was inapplicable to the existing conflict under the circumstances of the change of attitude, to which he had referred. The gentleman had contended it was not, because of a decision in the case of St. Domingo. That, Mr. C. said, was a case standing on insular ground, and totally different from the present. We admit the flag of the patriots: that President Madison did—we declare the contest to be a civil war: that President Monroe did—and commissioners have been sent there, if not with credentials, to hear and make representations. The Judiciary then would say, that the act of 1794 does include the case, and the act of 1817 would be superfluous and unnecessary, but for the further provisions contained in that act. Gentlemen had contended, that these further provisions were necessary, because it was proper to require bond and security from vessels departing from our ports, that they will not violate our neutral obligations without the territory of the United States. This proposition, Mr. C. could not reconcile with the admission he understood gentlemen to make, that acts committed out of our jurisdiction are acts of which foreign powers must take care for themselves.

The bonds required by the restrictive systems, which had been referred to, were not analogous to the present case; they stood on peculiar ground, the measures they were necessary to enforce having been required by our own policy, in defence of our own rights and interests, and were not an act of legislation for the benefit of a foreign power, for whom we are under no obligation to legislate. The difference in the two cases was precisely the difference between legislating for ourselves and legislating for others. But it had been said, that bonds are required even from privateers in war. That is because they have commissions, said Mr. C., and, acting under our authority, constitute a particular part of the force of the community, and the bond is required for our own sakes. Whilst on this subject, he said, he could not see the cause for all this anxiety on the part of gentlemen, lest the patriots should get hold of a vessel prepared for war. Were they not aware that the whole marine of the Island of Cuba consists of vessels purchased from this country? Ships are an object of commerce, condemned by no authority. It was particularly fitting, under present circumstances, that we should give every facility to the sale of our ships. Do we not know, said he, that owing to the condition of the world, our merchant vessels are cut out of employment, and that, unless we can sell them, they will rot at our wharves? Mr. C. laid it down as a principle, incontrovertible, that a ship, armed or not armed, was an object of commerce. Gentlemen would not deny, that the materials of armament might be separately sold, and afterwards combined. But the honorable gentleman from South Carolina had made one admission, which gives up the question, when he conceded that an armed ship might be fitted out—completely equipped—go to a foreign port, and afterwards go to war with any belligerent whatever, without a violation of our neutrality. And yet such a course, admitted by the gentleman to be lawful, was expressly forbidden by the act of 1817.

[Mr. LOWNDES briefly explained, not admitting the principle Mr. C. considered him as ceding, in the latitude given to it by the Speaker.]

Mr. C. said he had conceived the principle to be fairly inferred from the course of the gentleman's argument; and he did not yet understand him as denying, that, after a vessel gets into a foreign port, and departs thence, our responsibility for its conduct ceases. And the gentleman had the other day admitted, in debate on another subject, the right of expatriation. Suppose, then, that any number of citizens of the United States should fit out an armed vessel to go to any port in Spanish America, and there expatriate themselves by becoming citizens of another country, might they not then engage in war under the flag of that country? Gentlemen would not deny it, and yet they would be forbidden to do so by the act of 1817.

Mr. C. stated further objections to this act. For example, the collector of a port might detain any vessel, when the number of men, the nature of the cargo, or any other circumstance, induce him to suppose the vessel is intended for cruising with a belligerent purpose. Mr. C. said he was opposed to vesting such discretionary power in any collector. The voyage may be intended to Lima, to China, or any distant port, and the voyage may be totally defeated, and heavy loss incurred, by a mere caprice of the collector. Mr. C. wished his honorable friend (Mr. JOHNSON) to read a letter he had received from St. Bartholomew's, stating that three vessels had arrived there from British ports, not only with skeletons of regiments, but with nearly all the men, on their way to join the patriots. Had these men, Mr. C. asked, been subjected to any bond and security—to any such onerous provisions as are contained in this bill? No, said he; we alone, it seems, are to stretch our power to its limit to prevent our citizens from aiding in any manner the efforts of those who are struggling for liberty in the South; whilst Great Britain, in this respect, pursues a policy which we might worthily imitate. While at peace, he admitted, we ought to perform our obligations of neutrality; but they did not require the passage of bills with neutral titles, but with provisions favorable to one only of the belligerents. What, on the other hand, had Great Britain done? She had issued a proclamation which almost recognizes the independence of the provinces, calling the contest a war between America and Spain, and forbidding her citizens to engage in it, but requiring no bond and security from them. No, said Mr. C., she has gone a step further than she has ever before gone: her citizens, who constitute a part of the armies of Spain, she has forbidden from fighting against the patriots. I wish we might imitate her example, and observe a real neutrality, instead of that which exists in name only, to the prejudice of one party and not of the other

In reference to the suggestions made by Mr. LOWNDES respecting spoliations, Mr. C. asked, what success have we had in our applications for indemnity for spoliations? We are told, very good-naturedly, indeed, by the Secretary of State, in a late communication—I am sorry we have not the benefit of that letter—though, when we get it, I presume we shall find it a compilation of other works on the same subject—the Secretary of State tells us, very good-naturedly, that we have patiently waited for the settlement of our differences with Spain, and it will require no very great effort to wait a little longer. Very good-natured, indeed! No change, say gentlemen, in the aspect of our relations with Spain! Yes, a most humiliating one, within the last three or four years. We were told by the President, in his message at the commencement of the session; and, ambiguous as the intimation was, hope clung to it as promising a change; that a disposition had been shown on the part of Spain, to move in the negotiation. And what sort of a motion was it? A motion which has terminated in something like a perpetual repose, waiting till the passions and prejudices of His Majesty of Spain may have time to subside. Admirable Job-like patience, said Mr. CLAY. I thank my God that I do no possess it.

Let us, said Mr. C., in conclusion, put all these statutes out of our way, except that of 1794. When was that passed? At a moment when the enthusiasm of liberty ran through the country with electric rapidity; when the whole country, en masse, was ready to lend a hand and aid the French nation in their struggle, General WASHINGTON, revered name! the Father of his Country, could hardly arrest this inclination. Yet, under such circumstances, the act of 1794 was found abundantly sufficient. There was, then, no gratuitous assumption of neutral debts. For twenty years that act has been found sufficient. But some keen-sighted, sagacious foreign Minister finds out that it is not sufficient, and the act of 1817 is passed. That act, said Mr. C., we find condemned by the universal sentiment of the country; and I hope it will receive further condemnation by the vote of the House this day.

Mr. LOWNDES rose to vindicate himself from the charge of inconsistency alleged against him by the Speaker; but which, he said, could not be properly established by taking a sentence or half a sentence from a speech, and founding an argument on it. The Speaker infers, said he, because I will not take measures to punish him who, without the jurisdiction of the United States, enters into a vessel armed by a foreign authority, and cruises on the property of foreign nations, that I must therefore be willing that a citizen of the United States, within the limits of the United States, in a vessel belonging to the United States, shall involve the Government in a responsibility for her acts, with equal impunity. Mr. L. submitted to the committee, whether there was any resemblance between the two propositions.

Mr. FORSYTH explained the difference as to facts between him and the Speaker. If what the Speaker had advanced, respecting the vote on the act of 1817, had been intended as argument, Mr. F. said, he had endeavored to show that there was no weight in it, by showing that the vote to which the Speaker had referred was not on the bill which actually passed, but on a bill reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations which did not pass. The member of the Cabinet, who had been referred to, voted against the last-mentioned bill, but in favor of that which passed into a law, and there was a very small minority against it. With respect to the influence which produced the passage of the act of 1817, if there was any felt, it was by the President, and to him must be imputed the blame; for to him the remonstrances of the foreign Ministers had been addressed, and he had brought the subject before Congress. With respect to the correspondence with the Ministers, on the call of the committee for facts of depredations by our cruisers, these papers had been shown to them. I have no recollection, said Mr. F., of every word in one of the official notes, but I am sure that the version which has been given of it is not correct. I very well recollect, although not particularly remembering the particular words or arguments, that the tone of the letter and its manner were perfectly respectful to the Government, and such as might have been expected from the character of the Minister. It was neither indecent nor disrespectful; in the letter which is published as a copy of that, there are passages both indecent and disrespectful.

In reply to the suggestion, that even if the act of 1817 was required at the time it passed, it was no longer necessary, because of a change in our posture, Mr. F. said he knew of no such change. As far as the independence of the provinces, or of any of them, was recognized at this moment, it had been at that day. If his memory was not, in this respect, treacherous, the President of the United States announced to the Spanish Minister, through the Secretary of State, in the correspondence between them laid before this House at the middle of the last session, that such was the relation in which we regarded them. This answer had been given to an application to exclude their flags from our ports.

To show that his construction of the decision of the Supreme Court on the act of 1794, as applied to the case of St. Domingo, was correct, Mr. F. quoted the words of the decision from Cranch's Reports. In Massachusetts, the case referred to by the Speaker, was that of an indictment for piracy, from which the accused sought to shield himself by a commission from one of the Governments asserting their independence. The judges composing the court differed on points of law. One of the questions was, whether a commission emanating from any revolted colony, district, or people, whose independence was not recognized by the Executive authority of the United States, was valid. Here was a question, very different from the present one raised by the courts of the United States, and brought up for decision; it was not decided, because the counsel for the party was not present, or for some cause of that description. This point being doubtful, it was highly proper that the act of 1817 should have removed all doubt on the subject. Under the act of 1794, it was doubtful whether the commission of certain acts was an offence under our laws or not; and a long course of litigation before the courts would have been necessary before the question would have been settled. It was better to settle the question, and clear the law of all doubt. In this view, the act of 1817 was necessary, independently of all other considerations, and ought not to be repealed.

FRIDAY, March 20.

Ohio Contested Election.

The House (having refused to take up the Neutrality bill) again went into Committee of the Whole, on the report of the Committee of Elections respecting the right of Mr. HERRICK, a member from Ohio, to a seat in this House—Mr. ADAMS's motion to reverse the report, and thus vacate the seat, being under consideration.

Mr. TAYLOR concluded his remarks (which were interrupted by the adjournment yesterday) in favor of the report.

Mr. HOPKINSON took the opposite side, and spoke near an hour against the report of the Committee of Elections, and the right of the member to a seat.

Mr. BALDWIN spoke at considerable length in confirmation of the right of Mr. HERRICK to his seat.

Mr. ADAMS briefly replied; when the question was taken on reversing the report of the Committee of Elections, and carried—ayes 67, noes 66.

The committee then rose, and reported their decision to the House.

After a good deal of desultory conversation on various motions, touching the right of certain members to vote on the question, whose seats were supposed to be held under circumstances similar to that of Mr. HERRICK, and therefore personally interested in the decision; and after refusing to excuse Messrs. BARBER, of Ohio, and HUBBARD, of New York, from voting, the question on concurring with the Committee of the Whole in reversing the report of the Committee of Elections, was decided in the negative, by yeas and nays. Those who voted for concurring with the Committee of the Whole, and, of course, against the right of the member to a seat, were:

Messrs. Abbott, Adams, Allen of Massachusetts, Anderson of Kentucky, Austin, Ball, Barbour of Virginia, Bateman, Bayley, Beecher, Bellinger, Bennett, Burwell, Claiborne, Cook, Crawford, Cushman, Darlington, Edwards, Ervin of South Carolina, Floyd, Forney, Forsyth, Garnett, Hogg, Holmes of Connecticut, Hopkinson, Huntington, Irving of New York, Johnson of Virginia, Little, Lowndes, McLane, Marr, Mason of Rhode Island, Middleton, Jeremiah Nelson, H. Nelson, Owen, Pawling, Peter, Pindall, Pleasants, Reed, Rhea, Rice, Richards, Robertson of Louisiana, Ruggles, Sawyer, Schuyler, Sergeant, Seybert, Sherwood, Simkins, Slocumb, S. Smith, Bal. Smith, J. S. Smith, Speed, Stewart of North Carolina, Terrill, Terry, Tompkins, Tucker of Virginia, Tucker of South Carolina, Walker of Kentucky, Wendover, Westerlo, Whiteside, Williams of Connecticut, Williams of New York, Williams of North Carolina, and Wilson of Massachusetts—74.

Those who voted against concurring, and in favor of the member's keeping his seat, were:

Messrs. Allen of Vermont, Anderson of Pennsylvania, Barber of Ohio, Bassett, Bloomfield, Blount, Boden, Boss, Butler, Campbell, Clagett, Cobb, Comstock, Cruger, Culbreth, Desha, Earle, Ellicott, Folger, Gage, Hale, Hall of Delaware, Harrison, Hasbrouck, Herkimer, Hitchcock, Holmes of Massachusetts, Hubbard, Hunter, Johnson of Kentucky, Jones, Kinsey, Kirtland, Lawyer, Linn, Livermore, W. P. Maclay, McCoy, Marchand, Mason of Massachusetts, Merrill, Moore, Morton, Mosely, Mumford, Murray, New, Ogle, Palmer, Patterson, Poindexter, Porter, Rich, Ringgold, Robertson of Kentucky, Sampson, Savage, Scudder, Settle, Shaw, Silsbee, Southard, Spencer, Strong, Tallmadge, Tarr, Taylor, Townsend, Tyler, Upham, Walker of North Carolina, Wallace, Whitman, Wilkin, and Wilson of Pennsylvania—77.

So the House refused to concur in the report of the Committee of the Whole; and then, after an unsuccessful motion by Mr. FORSYTH, to recommit the subject to the Committee of Elections, with instructions to report the case of Mr. HERRICK distinct from other cases now embraced in the report; and a motion also unsuccessful, by Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts, to postpone the report indefinitely—

The question was taken, by yeas and nays, on agreeing with the Committee of Elections, that Mr. HERRICK is entitled to a seat, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 77, nays 70.

TUESDAY, March 24.

Another member, to wit, from Pennsylvania, THOMAS J. ROGERS, elected to supply the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of John Ross, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat.

Batture at St. Louis—Pre-emption Rights, and Out-lots and Commons in Missouri.

On motion of Mr. SCOTT,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting or securing to the town of St. Louis, in the Missouri Territory, as a common, all the sand-bar or batture, formed by the recession of the Mississippi river, between the said town and low-water mark; and to prohibit the location of any floating claim in the said Territory, thereon, or if any location should have been made, to prohibit by law the issuing of a patent therefor.

Resolved, also, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of prohibiting by law the location of any floating claim, on any lands in the Territory of Missouri, the right of pre-emption to which land has been secured to any settler, by the act of the 12th of April, 1814, or if any such location should have been made, to prohibit by law, the issuing a patent therefor.

Resolved, also, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of prohibiting by law the location of any floating claim, in the Territory of Missouri, on any lands, the right, title, or claim to which, has been at any time heretofore given notice of, or filed with either of the Boards of Commissioners in said Territory, or with the recorder of land titles, acting as such under any law of Congress, for the adjustment of land titles in said Territory, or, if any such location should have been made, to prohibit by law the issuing of patents therefor.

Resolved, also, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of prohibiting by law the location of any floating claim in the Territory of Missouri, on any town lot, village lot, out-lot, common field lot, or common, in, adjoining, or appertaining to any of the towns or villages in the Territory of Missouri, or if any such location shall have been made to prohibit by law the issuing of patents therefor.

National Flag.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to alter the flag of the United States, [providing that from and after the fourth day of July next, the flag of the United States be thirteen horizontal stripes, alternate red and white; that the Union be twenty stars, white in a blue field; and that, on the admission of every new State into the Union, one star be added to the Union of the flag, and that such addition shall take effect on the fourth day of July then next succeeding such admission.]

Mr. WENDOVER rose. In complying with a duty incumbent on me, said Mr. W., as resulting from a proposition I had the honor to submit to the House, for altering in part the flag of the United States, I feel no disposition to consume much of the time of the committee, or to indulge in the many observations which the nature of the subject might appear to justify. But I ask the patience of the committee, while I state a few of the considerations which present themselves in favor of the bill now on your table.

Sir, the importance attached to a national flag, both in its literal and figurative use, is so universal, and of such ancient origin, that we seldom inquire into the meaning of their various figures, as adopted by other nations, and are in some danger of forgetting the symbolical application of those composing that of our own.

Were we now about to devise suitable emblems for a national flag, I doubt not we should see much diversity of sentiment, and perhaps some efforts for local gratification; but I presume we should unite in some general and appropriate figures, referring not to sectional but national objects. But on this subject we need not differ. Suitable symbols were devised by those who laid the foundation of the Republic; and I hope their children will ever feel themselves in honor precluded from changing these, except so far as necessity may dictate, and with a direct view of expressing by them their original design.

Mr. Chairman, I am not particularly informed as to the origin of our flag; but have repeatedly heard it was first used by a citizen of Philadelphia, on his own vessel, and afterwards adopted by the Congress of the Revolution, as appropriate to and emblematical of these confederated States, contending for the rights of man, and the rich boon of an independent Government. At its adoption our flag was founded on a representative principle, and in the arrangement of its parts made applicable to the number of the States then united against the common foe.

The same representative principle was retained and applied when the flag was altered; but experience having shown that a similar extension of numbers throughout the flag would now be improper and inconvenient. It is worthy the attention of the National Legislature again to consider the subject, and see if it be practicable to retain in it the object centemplated by its founders, as pointing to the component parts of the nation, without losing sight of the original formation of this Government as a free republic.

Sir, the flag of the United States having undergone some change, and in its present state being altogether inappropriate, we are called upon to determine whether a further change be not advisable, and, if it be, what alteration will be most proper, and best to apply to the present and relative state of the nation, consistent with the representative character of the flag. If you do not alter it, you do injustice to the States admitted into the Union since the former alteration; and if you alter in the way as before, you will destroy the conspicuity of your flag, and render it too indistinct to be known at a distance, and increase the inconvenience already experienced.

At the present day, and particularly since the commencement of the late war, there are few vessels, however small, if they carry a mast, but are furnished with a flag of some description; and it is well known to gentlemen living on the seaboard, and others, that it is impracticable for small vessels to conform even to the present law; and the law itself does not correspond with the existing or original facts.

The flag of the United States was altered by law, from thirteen to fifteen stripes and stars, on the first of May, 1795, to apply to the admission of Vermont and Kentucky into the Union. On the first of June, 1796, Tennessee was admitted. Thus the alteration was applicable to the fact on which it was predicated, for the short space of one year and one month. On the 19th of February, 1803, Ohio was admitted, Louisiana on the 30th of April, 1812. Indiana was admitted at the last session of Congress, and Mississippi at the present session, and you now have on your table a bill for the admission of another State. Calculating on such a result caused many to regret the former alteration; and no doubt the same reason operated in the House of Representatives when the bill passed, and will account for the small majority of eight by which it succeeded.

I presume none will now advocate the propriety of continuing the fifteen stripes as at present; that number was founded on a mere contingency, which has since repeatedly happened, and will frequently occur; whereas the number proposed by the bill refers to our national origin, and is equally interesting to all.

Sir, it cannot be deemed proper to go on and increase the stripes in your flag. There are now twenty States; what number they will ultimately extend to none can conjecture. For my own part, I doubt not there will in time be accessions from the East, from the North, from the West, and from the South. Sir, I am not now speaking of conquest. I am willing every people should "manage their own affairs in their own way." But I can no more believe that any portion of the earth will remain in perpetual thraldom, and be forever tributary to a foreign power, than I can subscribe to the doctrine of a ceaseless succession of legitimate kings.

Sir, it cannot be deemed desirable, under the existing state of things, in relation to the stripes and stars in the flag, to retain it in its present situation; it is not only inapplicable, but both parts refer to the same thing, and the one is a duplicate of the other; but the alteration proposed will direct the view to two striking facts in our national history, and teach the world an important reality, that republican government is not only practicable, but that it is also progressive.

Is it desirable to produce greater uniformity? Most undoubtedly it is. In the navy the law is generally conformed to, but it is well known that uniformity does not elsewhere exist. If evidence were wanting, among other and numerous instances, I would refer you to the flag at this moment waving over the heads of the Representatives of the nation, and two others in sight, equally the flags of the Government: while the law directs that the flag shall contain fifteen, that on the Hall of Congress, whence laws emanate, has but thirteen, and those at the Navy Yard and Marine Barracks have each at least eighteen stripes. Nor can I omit to mention the flag under which the last Congress sat during its first session, which, from some cause or other unknown to me, had but nine stripes. But even that flag, with all its defects, was entitled to much honor, for it was not only striped, but, to use another British cant, it was "Ragged Bunting," and was the first flag hoisted on the Hall of Congress, after the proverbial "Bulwark of Religion" had here, in this city, shown its anxious solicitude to promote the useful arts.

Sir, I consider the plan proposed as in unison with the original design; it points to the States as they commenced and as they now are, and will, with an inconsiderable addition, direct the mind to a future state of things. The necessary alteration, either now or hereafter, can be made by almost any person, at any place and at any time; and the proposition, if adopted, will in future save the expense of legislating on the subject.

The committee who reported this bill deemed it advisable to direct that the stripes be horizontal; this is now the form in use; but it results from example, and not from the act, and would be equally conformable to law, if the stripes were arranged in a perpendicular direction. There is, indeed, one exception in practice. Under the laws for the collection of impost and tonnage, the Executive has directed that the cutters and boats employed in this service shall carry ensigns and pennants, with perpendicular stripes, and other marks of distinction; but this being alterable at the pleasure of the President, forms no objection to the proposition in the bill; and it is obviously proper to define the form in this particular, when it is considered that in this only has been the distinction between the flags of two different nations, and was recently the case as regarded those of France and Holland.

As to the particular disposition of the stars in the union of the flag, the committee were of opinion that might be left at the discretion of persons more immediately concerned; either to arrange them in the form of one great luminary, or in the words of the original resolution of 1777, "representing a new constellation."

Mr. Chairman, in viewing this subject, there appears to be a happy coincidence of circumstances, in having adopted the symbols in your flag, and a peculiar fitness of things in making the proposed alteration. In that part designed at a distance to characterize your country, and which ought, for the information of other nations, to appear conspicuous and remain permanent, you present the number of the stars that burst the bands of oppression, and achieved your independence; while in the part intended for a nearer, or home view, you see a representation of your happy Union as it now exists, and space sufficient to embrace the symbols of those who may hereafter join under your banners.

Spanish American Provinces.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the appropriation bill; the clause appropriating thirty thousand dollars for compensation to the Commissioners, sent to South America by the Executive in December last, under consideration.

Mr. CLAY wished to know if this appropriation was to defray the expenses of the commission lately sent to South America; if so, he would ask of the chairmen of the Committee of Ways and Means and the Committee of Foreign Relations, whether those Commissioners were furnished with credentials, and if their appointment had been confirmed by the Senate; also, to what ports of South America they were sent, and the probable duration of the commission; and, also, if it would not be looking too much into its objects, he would be glad to know what those objects were.

Mr. LOWNDES said, that although he had not all the information required by the Speaker, yet he was possessed of something on the subject more than newspaper intelligence. It must be recollected that the objects of the Committee of Ways and Means were confined merely to the financial department; they had, however, some information on this subject, received in reply to some inquiries that the committee had, in the performance of their duties, addressed to the Department of State, which would answer the Speaker's inquiry as to the credentials and the probable duration of the commission. The other points did not come within the objects belonging to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The papers referred to by Mr. L. were handed up by him and read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, March 2, 1818.

SIR: I have the honor to enclose a copy of the commission from this Department with which Messrs. Rodney, Graham, and Bland, were furnished by direction of the President. They have, as you will perceive, no distinct diplomatic rank. They are expected to be absent seven or eight months; and the compensation allowed them by the President is $6,000 each, and $2,000 to their Secretary. Their expenses on the voyage, until their return, except while on shore in South America, are likewise allowed; and Messrs. Rodney and Graham having been appointed in June last, and prepared to go, but by various accidents detained until the beginning of December, when they sailed, claim on that account a further allowance. If after their arrival at Buenos Ayres, they find it advisable that one or more of them should remain on that continent, and go to Chili, that measure is within their discretionary powers. As this contingency was, however, not expected as probable; and, if it should occur, it was not foreseen to what extent of time it might go, no specific allowance was fixed upon for it. Under these circumstances, it was anticipated that the sum of thirty thousand dollars would not more than suffice to cover the expenses of the mission.

I am, with great respect, sir, your very humble and obedient servant,

JOHN Q. ADAMS.

W. LOWNDES, Esq., Chairman, &c.

To all who shall see these presents:

Be it Known, Cæsar Augustus Rodney, John Graham, and Theodorick Bland, three distinguished citizens of the United States, and enjoying, in a high degree, the confidence and esteem of the President, are about to visit, in a national ship, on just and friendly objects, and at the special desire of the President, divers places and countries in South America.

These are therefore to request that, whithersoever they may go, they, with their suite, may be received and treated in a manner due to the confidence reposed in them, and each of them, as aforesaid, by the President of the United States, and to their own merit.

Given under my hand, and the seal of the Department of State, this twenty-fourth day of No-[L. S.] vember, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventeen.

JOHN Q. ADAMS.
Secretary of State.

Mr. CLAY rose, not, he said, to make any objection to the three respectable citizens for whom this appropriation was intended—that was not his object; but to enter his protest to this kind of appropriation by Congress. As to the object of the commission, he thought it of very little use for the expenditure of public money; he referred to the views avowed, and the directions to touch at Buenos Ayres, &c., and said, if the object of the commission was to acquire information of the actual state of affairs in the Southern provinces, it was the most unfortunate mode that could have been adopted for that purpose. What, asked Mr. C., was this mode? Three distinguished citizens are selected, their appointment and intentions are announced by the newspapers, months before their departure, then declared by the President himself, and made known to the whole world, and they depart with all the paraphernalia of public Ministers; information of their object precedes them wherever they go. As soon as they arrive at a South American port they are surrounded by all the factions in the country; royalists, if there were any, as well as republicans; who strive to prejudice them in favor of their respective interests, to mislead their judgments, and prevent the getting correct information of the real condition of things. Mr. C. described the extent of the interior provinces of Buenos Ayres, to show that the time allowed to the Commissioners (if they were acquainted with the language, manners, and habits, of the country) was inadequate to enable them to make any material addition to our stock of information; but, even if they could, were they to range the whole continent, and visit even the armies, whether successful or not, of the different parties, still, their object being known, they would everywhere be liable to the same deception and imposition. Correct information they would not obtain. The proper course to have adopted, Mr. C. said, was to despatch an individual unknown to all parties; some intelligent, keen, silent, and observing man, of pleasing address and insinuating manners, who, concealing the object of his visit, would see and hear every thing, and report it faithfully.

But it was not to the object of the appropriation, boldly as the mission had been devised, that Mr. C. rose to object; it was the constitutional point it involved that made it obnoxious; and he read the clause of the constitution which requires the consent and concurrence of the Senate to all appointments not specifically provided for by law, to show that these Commissioners should have been nominated to that body—taking it for granted, that they had not been submitted to the Senate. The President had not only made these appointments without the authority of the constitution, or of any law recognizing them, but in derogation from a positive act of Congress. There was an act of Congress fixing the grade of the only Ministers we sent abroad, and it provided for two cases only, that of Minister Plenipotentiary and that of Chargé des Affaires. To the first it assigned a salary of $9,000, to the last a salary of $4,500. Here were Commissioners, then, sent with a salary fixed by the sole authority of the President, and not conformable to that prescribed by the law in either of the two grades. If he might assign $6,000, what was there to prevent his allowance of $50,000? It might be said in that case this House would afford a remedy; but gentlemen would perceive how difficult it would be, to withhold from an agent an appropriation, which had been promised and pledged by the Executive. There was a contingent fund of $50,000 allowed to the President by law, which he was authorized to expend without rendering to Congress any account of it—it was confided to his discretion, and, if the compensation of the Commissioners had been made from that fund, Mr. C. said, it would not have been a proper subject for inquiry; but, under present circumstances, in opposition to the constitution, he could not be going too far, in giving at least his protest to this appropriation. It was not his intention to make any motion on the subject, and he made none.

Mr. FORSYTH said, the constitution vests the Executive with the powers to make appointments in the recess of the Senate. Whether these were such as required the confirmation of the Senate, had been or would be submitted for that purpose, to that body, he did not know, nor was it necessary to inquire. He presumed what ought to be done would be done, and he was disposed to leave the subject to the Executive and to the Senate, to whom it more properly belonged. If the idea of the Speaker was correct, and these were officers requiring a nomination to, and the approbation of the Senate, yet, as they were appointed in the recess, no constitutional wrong had been done in their appointment. But the Speaker had objected to this commission because it was useless, if it was information they went for. Was it not proper and necessary, Mr. F. asked, for the Government to have information of the state of the South American provinces—of their actual political condition, their prospects of success, &c.? If so, this information could be obtained only in two ways—by the newspapers, or by agents sent out for that purpose. The vague and uncertain reports given in the newspapers could not be relied on, and the President had thought proper to send intelligent agents to obtain the knowledge desired. It was probable that a private man might have obtained this information better; but there was another point to be considered—the importance of this information to the Government was such, that it would be necessary that this individual should be an American, and the kind of information to be acquired might have subjected him to the fate of other Americans in the Spanish provinces; he might have been thrown into a dungeon. The opposite party might adopt this course to prevent his communicating the information he should have acquired. This had been done; American citizens had been thrown into dungeons. In whatever aspect this subject was viewed, Mr. F. could see no impropriety in voting this appropriation. It was true, the President might have taken it out of the secret service fund, and no inquiry would have been made about it; but, in order to meet all the expenses of the mission, it might have been necessary to ask a further appropriation for this fund, and then the inquiry would have been made, for what it was wanted. The present course, he thought, was more honorable and fair. It would have been necessary nearly to double the ordinary contingent fund, and it would have been a conclusive objection to the appropriation, that Congress was ignorant of the object to which it was to be applied. Would the House have been willing to vote an addition to the secret service fund, for what might have been considered the employment of spies throughout the world? This objection to such an appropriation, he believed, would have been made with effect; and it was much better for the Executive to proceed in the present open and frank manner. Mr. F. took occasion, in reply to an allusion of Mr. CLAY, to say, that it was true he did not find fault with the Executive quite as often as the honorable Speaker had latterly done, but still he was not the defender of all Executive measures. The committee would do him the justice to recollect that he sometimes differed from the Executive, and never failed to censure what he believed censurable.

Mr. CLAY said, in reply, that Mr. FORSYTH had not controverted the objection that these appointments had not been submitted to the Senate. But these agents were to be provided for, either in the quality of Ministers or Chargés des Affaires; and, considered in either capacity, the House was called on to make a larger appropriation than was authorized by law for officers of that character. As to a private agent being liable to the fate mentioned by Mr. FORSYTH, what, he asked, were the immunities of the present Commissioners? Nothing more, he said, than those of a private man. It had even been decided, in the affair of the Russian Consul at Philadelphia, that Consul Generals were not entitled to the immunities of Ministers. But, could not the President have given the same commission to one man, sent privately to obtain information, as to those three Commissioners, and with the same effect and validity? As to the object of the commission, Mr. C. again asked, how these gentlemen were to acquire this information respecting the independence of the South American provinces? The fact of their independence was not to be established by a dedimus potestatum sent out to take depositions. The independence of some of these States was matter of history—was too notorious to require the evidence of those Commissioners. And Mr. C. referred to the condition of some of the South American States, on which the knowledge was complete, and contended that they had been sent to parts, with regard to which (Venezuela and Buenos Ayres, for example) our information was most perfect, and were not to visit all those parts (Mexico and New Granada) from which we most wanted it. Mr. C. again adverted to the manner in which the Commissioners had been appointed, which being done not according to law, was the more improper, as they had not sailed till after the meeting of Congress, when it would have been scarcely any detention to have waited the concurrence of the Senate, which was in session when they departed.

Mr. HOPKINSON observed, that he did not rise to express any opinion upon the object or utility of the mission in question—he was willing to agree in both; but he desired to express distinctly his dissent to the appropriation, because he believed the appointment of these Commissioners was of a kind, under the provision and spirit of our constitution, to require the approbation and assent of the Senate, and because he had no reason to believe such assent had ever been given by the Senate, or asked by the Executive. He thought it more important for us, as the Representatives of the American people, to attend to and guard our own constitution, than to send abroad to inquire into the form of government of other people. Mr. H. said, that being up, he would take occasion to say that he saw little or no difference between sending a Minister without consulting the Senate, in a case when their assent is admitted to be necessary, and sending him just on the eve of the meeting of that body, without any known urgency, and afterwards submitting the appointment to the Senate. Nobody can believe the Senate can exercise that free and unembarrassed judgment upon the nomination which the constitution intended they should have, after the Minister had actually embarked and sailed for his destination, with his outfit and other expenses of the mission.

On the suggestion of Mr. LOWNDES this appropriation was passed by for the present, that in the mean time the additional information which had been asked for by the Speaker might be obtained from the Department of State.

Mr. CLAY rose, and moved to insert in the bill a provision to appropriate the sum of eighteen thousand dollars as the outfit and one year's salary of a Minister to be deputed from the United States to the independent provinces of the River Plata, in South America.

This proposition Mr. C. followed up by entering into a discussion of the question, involved in his motion, of a formal recognition of the independence of the South American States mentioned. He had spoken something more than an hour, when (having given way for a motion to that effect) the committee rose, about half-past four o'clock, and the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, March 25.

On motion of Mr. MARR, the Committee on the Public Lands were instructed to inquire whether any, and if any, what further provisions of law are necessary for preventing waste and trespass on that portion of the public lands which have been, or may hereafter be, reserved for the use of schools.

Presidential Message—Political Condition of Spanish America.

Several Messages were received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES. The first of the said Messages was read, and is as follows:

WASHINGTON, March 24, 1818.

In pursuance of a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 7th instant, I now transmit the report of the Secretary of State, with a statement of the expenses incurred under the 4th, 5th, 6th, and 7th articles of the Treaty of Ghent, specifying the items of expenditure in relation to each.

JAMES MONROE.

The second of the said Messages was read, and is as follows:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

In conformity with the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 5th of December last, I now transmit a report of the Secretary of State, with a copy of the documents which it is thought proper to communicate, relating to the independence and political condition of the provinces of Spanish America.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, March 25, 1818.

The report of the Secretary of State is as follows:

The Secretary of State, to whom has been referred the resolution of the House of Reprcsentatives of the 15th of December, has the honor of submitting the documents herewith transmitted, as containing the information possessed at his department, requested by that resolution.

In the communication received from Don Manuel H. de Aguirre, there are references to certain conferences between him and the Secretary of State, which appear to require some explanation.

The character in which Mr. Aguirre presented himself was that of a public agent from the Government of La Plata, and of private agent of that of Chili—his commissions from both simply qualified him as agent; but his letter from the Supreme Director Pueyrredon, to the President of the United States, requested that he might be received with the consideration due to his diplomatic character. He had no commission as a public minister of any rank, nor any full power to negotiate as such. Neither the letter, of which he was the bearer, nor he himself, at his first interviews with the Secretary of State, suggested that he was authorized to ask the acknowledgment of his Government as independent—a circumstance which derived additional weight from the fact, that his predecessor, Don Martin Thompson, had been dismissed by the Director Pueyrredon, for having transcended his powers, of which the letter brought by Mr. Aguirre, gave notice to the President.

It was some time after the commencement of the session of Congress, that he made this demand, as will be seen by the dates of his written communications to the Department. In the conferences held with him on that subject, among other questions which it naturally suggested, were those of the manner in which the acknowledgment of his Government, should it be deemed advisable, might be made? and what were the territories which he considered as forming the State or nation to be recognized? It was observed, that the manner in which the United States had been acknowledged as an independent power by France, was, by a treaty concluded with them, as an existing independent power, and in which each one of the States, then composing the Union, was distinctly named; that something of the same kind seemed to be necessary in the first acknowledgment of a new government, that some definite idea might be formed not of the precise boundaries, but of the general extent of the country thus recognized. He said the Government of which he desired the acknowledgment, was of the country which had, before the revolution, been the Vice Royalty of La Plata. It was then asked, whether that did not include Montevideo and the territory occupied by the Portuguese—the Banda Oriental, understood to be under the government of General Artigas, and several provinces, still in the undisputed possession of the Spanish Government. He said it did; but observed, that Artigas, though in hostility with the Government of Buenos Ayres, supported, however, the cause of independence of Spain—and that the Portuguese could not ultimately maintain their possession of Montevideo. It was after this that Mr. Aguirre wrote the letter, offering to enter into a negotiation for conducting a treaty; though admitting that he had no authority to that effect from his government. It may be proper to observe, that the mode of recognition by concluding a treaty, had not been suggested as the only one practicable or usual, but merely as that which had been adopted by France with the United States, and as offering the most convenient means of designating the extent of the territory acknowledged as a new dominion.

The remark to Mr. Aguirre, that if Buenos Ayres should be acknowledged as independent, others of the contending provinces would, perhaps, demand the same, had particular reference to the Banda Oriental. The inquiry was, whether General Artigas might not advance a claim of independence for those provinces, conflicting with that of Buenos Ayres for the whole Vice Royalty of La Plata? The Portuguese possession of Montevideo was noticed in reference to a similar question.

It should be added, that these observations were connected with others, stating the reasons upon which the present acknowledgment of the Government of La Plata, in any mode, was deemed by the President inexpedient, in regard as well to their interests as to those of the United States.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Presidential Message—Seminole War.

The last of the said Messages was read, and is as follows:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I now lay before Congress all the information in the possession of the Executive respecting the war with the Seminoles, and the measures which it has been thought proper to adopt for the safety of our fellow-citizens on the frontier exposed to their ravages. The enclosed documents show that the hostilities of this tribe were unprovoked, the offspring of a spirit long cherished, and often manifested towards the United States, and that, in the present instance, it was extending itself to other tribes, and daily assuming a more serious aspect. As soon as the nature and object of this combination were perceived, the Major General commanding the southern division of the troops of the United States, was ordered to the theatre of action, charged with the management of the war, and vested with the powers necessary to give it effect. The season of the year being unfavorable to active operations, and the recesses of the country affording shelter to these savages, in case of retreat, may prevent a prompt termination of the war, but it may be fairly presumed that it will not be long before this tribe, and its associates, receive the punishment which they have provoked and justly merited.

As almost the whole of this tribe inhabits the country within the limits of Florida, Spain was bound, by the Treaty of 1795, to restrain them from committing hostilities against the United States. We have seen with regret, that her Government has altogether failed to fulfil this obligation, nor are we aware that it made any effort to that effect. When we consider her utter inability to check, even in the slightest degree, the movements of this tribe, by her very small and incompetent force in Florida, we are not disposed to ascribe the failure to any other cause. The inability, however, of Spain to maintain her authority over the territory and Indians within her limits, and in consequence to fulfil the treaty, ought not to expose the United States to other and greater injuries. When the authority of Spain ceases to exist there, the United States have a right to pursue their enemy, on a principle of self-defence. In this instance, the right is more complete and obvious, because we shall perform only what Spain was bound to have performed herself. To the high obligations and privileges of this great and sacred right of self-defence, will the movement of our troops be strictly confined. Orders have been given to the General in command, not to enter Florida, unless it be in pursuit of the enemy, and in that case to respect the Spanish authority wherever it is maintained, and he will be instructed to withdraw his forces from the province as soon as he shall have reduced that tribe to order, and secure our fellow-citizens, in that quarter, by satisfactory arrangements, against its unprovoked and savage hostilities in future.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, March 25, 1818.

The said Messages and their accompanying documents, were ordered to lie on the table.

Spanish American Provinces.

The House having again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the annual general appropriation bill, and Mr. CLAY's proposition to amend the bill by inserting a clause for appropriating $18,000 for the outfit and year's salary of a Minister to Buenos Ayres, yet pending, Mr. CLAY concluded, in a speech of three hours in length, the observations he yesterday commenced in support of his proposition; the whole of which is given entire, as follows:

Mr. CLAY said he rose, under feelings of deeper regret than he had ever experienced on any former occasion, inspired, principally, by the painful consideration, that he found himself, on the proposition which he meant to submit, differing from many highly esteemed friends, in and out of this House, for whose judgment he entertained the greatest respect. A knowledge of this circumstance had induced him to pause; to subject his own convictions to the severest scrutiny; and to revolve the question over and over again. But all his reflections had conducted him to the same clear result; and much as he valued those friends, great as his deference was for their opinions, he could not hesitate, when reduced to the distressing alternative of conforming his judgment to theirs, or pursuing the deliberate and matured dictates of his own mind. He enjoyed some consolation, for the want of their co-operation, from the persuasion that, if he erred on this occasion, he erred on the side of the liberty and the happiness of a large portion of the human family. Another, and, if possible, indeed a greater source of the regret to which he referred, was the utter incompetency which he unfeignedly felt to do any thing like adequate justice to the great cause of American independence and freedom, whose interests he wished to promote by his humble exertions, in this instance. Exhausted and worn down as he was, by the fatigue, confinement, and incessant application incident to the arduous duties of the honorable station he held, during a four months' session, he should need all that kind indulgence which had been so often extended to him by the House.

He begged, in the first place, to correct misconceptions, if any existed, in regard to his opinions. He was averse from war with Spain, or with any power. He would give no just cause of war to any power—not to Spain herself. He had seen enough of war, and of its calamities, when even successful. No country upon earth had more interest than this in cultivating peace, and avoiding war, as long as it was possible honorably to avoid it. Gaining additional strength every day, our numbers doubling in periods of twenty-five years, with an income outstripping all our estimates, and so great, as, after a war in some respects disastrous, to furnish results which carry astonishment, if not dismay, into the bosom of the states jealous of our rising importance, we had every motive for the love of peace. He could not, however, approve, in all respects, of the manner in which our negotiation with Spain had been conducted. If ever a favorable time existed for the demand, on the part of an injured nation, of indemnity for past wrongs, from the aggressor, such was the present time. Impoverished and exhausted at home, by the wars which have desolated the Peninsula, with a foreign war, calling for infinitely more resources in men and money, than she can possibly command, this is the auspicious period for insisting upon justice at her hands, in a firm and decided tone. Time is precisely what Spain now most wants. Yet what were we told by the President, in his Message, at the commencement of Congress? That Spain had procrastinated, and we acquiesced in her procrastination. And the Secretary of State, in the late communication with Mr. Onis, after ably vindicating all our rights, tells the Spanish Minister, with a good deal of sang froid, that we had patiently waited thirteen years for a redress of our injuries, and that it required no great effort to wait longer! He would have abstained from thus exposing our intentions. Avoiding the use of the language of menace, he would have required, in temperate and decided terms, indemnity for all our wrongs; for the spoliations upon our commerce; for the interruption of the right of depot at New Orleans, guaranteed by treaty; for the insults repeatedly offered to our flag; for the Indian hostilities which she was bound to prevent; for the belligerent use made of her ports and territories by our enemy, during the late war—and the instantaneous liberation of the free citizens of the United States, now imprisoned in her jails. Contemporaneous with that demand, without waiting for her final answer, and with a view to the favorable operation on her councils, in regard to our own peculiar interests, as well as in justice to the cause itself, he would recognize any established government in Spanish America. He would have left Spain to draw her own inferences from these proceedings, as to the ultimate steps which this country might adopt, if she longer withheld justice from us. And if she persevered in her iniquity, after we had conducted the negotiation in the manner he had endeavored to describe, he would then take up and decide the solemn question of peace or war, with the advantage of all the light shed upon it by subsequent events and the probable conduct of Europe.

Spain had undoubtedly given us abundant and just cause of war. But, it was not every cause of war that should lead to war. War was one of those dreadful scourges that so shakes the foundations of society; overturns or changes the character of governments; interrupts or destroys the pursuits of private happiness; brings, in short, misery and wretchedness in so many forms; and at last is, in its issue, so doubtful and hazardous—that nothing but dire necessity can justify an appeal to arms. If we were to have war with Spain, he had, however, no hesitation in saying that no mode of bringing it about could be less fortunate than that of seizing, at this time, upon her adjoining province. There was a time, under other circumstances, when we might have occupied East Florida, with safety; had we then taken it, our posture in the negotiation with Spain, would have been totally different from what it is. But, we had permitted that time, not with his consent, to pass by unimproved. If we were to seize upon Florida, after a great change in those circumstances, and after declaring our intention to acquiesce in the procrastination desired by Spain, in what light should we be viewed by foreign powers, particularly Great Britain? We have already been accused of inordinate ambition, and of seeking to aggrandize ourselves by an extension, on all sides, of our limits. Should we not, by such an act of violence, give color to the accusation? No, Mr. Chairman, if we are to be involved in war with Spain, let us have the credit of disinterestedness; let us put her yet more in the wrong. Let us command the respect which is never withheld from those who act a noble and generous part. He hoped to communicate to the committee the conviction which he so strongly felt, that, adopting the amendment which he intended to propose, would not hazard, in the slightest degree, the peace of the country. But if that peace were to be endangered, he would infinitely rather it should be for our exerting the right, appertaining to every state, of acknowledging the independence of another state, than for the seizure of a province which sooner or later we must certainly acquire.

Mr. C. proceeded. In contemplating the great struggle in which Spanish America is now engaged, our attention is first fixed by the immensity and character of the country which Spain seeks again to subjugate. Stretching on the Pacific Ocean from about the 40th degree of north latitude, to about the 55th degree of south latitude, and extending from the mouth of the Rio del Norte (exclusive of East Florida) around the Gulf of Mexico, and along the South Atlantic to near Cape Horn, it is about 5,000 miles in length, and, in some places, near 3,000 in breadth. Within this vast region, we behold the most sublime and interesting objects of creation; the loftiest mountains, the most majestic rivers in the world; the richest mines of the precious metals; and the choicest productions of the earth. We behold there a spectacle still more interesting and sublime—the glorious spectacle of eighteen millions of people, struggling to burst their chains and to be free. When we take a little nearer and more detailed view, we perceive that nature has, as it were, ordained that this people and this country shall ultimately constitute several different nations. Leaving the United States on the north, we come to New Spain, or the Vice Royalty of Mexico on the south; passing by Guatemala, we reach the Vice Royalty of New Grenada, the late Captain Generalship of Venezuela, and Guyana, lying on the east side of the Andes. Stepping over the Brazils, we arrive at the United Provinces of La Plata, and, crossing the Andes, we find Chili on their west side, and further north, the Vice Royalty of Lima or Peru. Each of these several parts is sufficient in itself, in point of limits, to constitute a powerful state, and, in point of population, that which has the smallest contains enough to make it respectable. Throughout all the extent of that great portion of the world, which he had attempted thus hastily to describe, the spirit of revolt against the dominion of Spain had manifested itself. The revolution had been attended with various degrees of success in the several parts of Spanish America. In some it had been already crowned, as he would endeavor to show, with complete success, and in all he was persuaded that independence had struck such deep root, as that the power of Spain could never eradicate it. What were the causes of this great movement?

Three hundred years ago, upon the ruins of the thrones of Montezuma and the Incas of Peru, Spain erected the most stupendous system of colonial despotism that the world has ever seen—the most rigorous, the most exclusive. The great principle and object of this system has been to render one of the largest portions of the world exclusively subservient, in all its faculties, to the interests of an inconsiderable spot in Europe. To effectuate this aim of her policy, she locked Spanish America up from the rest of the world, and prohibited, under the severest penalties, any foreigner from entering any part of it. To keep the natives themselves ignorant of each other, and of the strength and resources of the several parts of her American possessions, she next prohibited the inhabitants of one Vice Royalty or Government from visiting those of another; so, that the inhabitants of Mexico, for example, were not allowed to enter the Vice Royalty of New Grenada. The agriculture of those vast regions was so regulated and restrained as to prevent all collision with the interests of the agriculture of the Peninsula. Where nature, by the character and composition of the soil, had commanded, the abominable system of Spain has forbidden the growth of certain articles. Thus, the olive and the vine, to which Spanish America is so well adapted, are prohibited wherever their culture could interfere with the olive and the vine of the Peninsula. The commerce of the country, in the direction and objects of the exports and imports, is also subjected to the narrow and selfish views of Spain, and fettered by the odious spirit of monopoly existing in Cadiz. She has sought, by scattering discord among the several castes of her American population, and by a debasing course of education, to perpetuate her oppression. Whatever concerns public law, or the science of government, all writers upon political economy, or that tend to give vigor, and freedom, and expansion to the intellect, are prohibited. Gentlemen would be astonished by the long list of distinguished authors, whom she proscribes, to be found in Depon's and other works. A main feature in her policy is that which constantly elevates the European and depresses the American character. Out of upwards of 750 Viceroys and Captains General, whom she has appointed since the conquest of America, about eighteen only have been from the body of the American population. On all occasions she seeks to raise and promote her European subjects, and to degrade and humiliate the Creoles. Wherever in America her sway extends every thing seems to pine and wither beneath its baneful influence. The richest regions of the earth; man, his happiness and his education; all the fine faculties of his soul, are regulated, and modified, and moulded, to suit the execrable purposes of an inexorable despotism.

Such is a brief and imperfect picture of the state of things in Spanish America in 1808, when the famous transactions of Bayonne occurred. The King of Spain and the Indies (for Spanish America had always constituted an integral part of the Spanish empire) abdicated his throne and became a voluntary captive. Even at this day, one does not know whether he should most condemn the baseness and perfidy of the one party, or despise the meanness and imbecility of the other. If the obligation of obedience and allegiance existed on the part of the colonies to the King of Spain, it was founded on the duty of protection which he owed them. By disqualifying himself from the performance of this duty, they became released from that obligation. The monarchy was dissolved, and each integral part had a right to seek its own happiness by the institution of any new government adapted to its wants. Joseph Bonaparte, the successor de facto of Ferdinand, recognized this right on the part of the colonies, and recommended them to establish their independence. Thus, upon the ground of strict right; upon the footing of a mere legal question, governed by forensic rules, the colonies, being absolved by the acts of the parent country from the duty of subjection to it, had an indisputable right to set up for themselves. But Mr. C. took a broader and bolder position. He maintained that an oppressed people were authorized, whenever they could, to rise and break their fetters. This was the great principle of the English Revolution. It was the great principle of our own. Vattel, if authority were wanting, expressly supports this right. We must pass sentence of condemnation upon the founders of our liberty —say that they were rebels, traitors, and that we are at this moment legislating without competent powers, before we could condemn the cause of Spanish America. Our Revolution was mainly directed against the mere theory of tyranny. We have suffered comparatively but little; we had, in some respects, been kindly treated; but our intrepid and intelligent fathers saw, in the usurpation of the power to levy an inconsiderable tax, the long train of oppressive acts that was to follow. They rose; they breasted the storm; they conquered our freedom. Spanish America, for centuries, has been doomed to the practical effects of an odious tyranny. If we were justified, she is more than justified.

Mr. C. said he was no propagandist. He would not seek to force upon other nations our principles and our liberty, if they did not want them. He would not disturb the repose even of a detestable despotism. But if an abused and oppressed people willed their freedom; if they sought to establish it; if, in truth, they had established it, we had a right, as a sovereign power, to notice the fact, and to act as circumstances and our interest required. He would say, in the language of the venerated Father of his Country: "Born in a land of liberty, my anxious recollections, my sympathetic feelings, and my best wishes, are irresistibly excited, whensoever, in any country, I see an oppressed nation unfurl the banners of freedom."* For his own part, Mr. C. said, that whenever he thought of Spanish America, the image irresistibly forced itself upon his mind of an elder brother, whose education had been neglected, whose person had been abused and maltreated, and who had been disinherited by the unkindness of an unnatural parent. And when he contemplated the glorious struggle which that country was now making, he thought he beheld that brother rising, by the power and energy of his fine native genius, to the manly rank which nature and nature's God intended for him.

If Spanish America were entitled to success from the justness of her cause, we had no less reason to wish that success from the horrible character which the royal arms had given to the war. More atrocities than those which had been perpetrated during its existence were not to be found even in the annals of Spain herself. And history, reserving some of her blackest pages for the name of Morillo, is prepared to place him alongside of his great prototype, the infamous desolator of the Netherlands. He who has looked into the history of the conduct of this war, is constantly shocked at the revolting scenes which it portrays; at the refusal, on the part of the commanders of the royal forces, to treat, on any terms, with the other side; at the denial of quarters; at the butchery, in cold blood, of prisoners; at the violation of flags, in some cases, after being received with religious ceremonies; at the instigation of slaves to rise against their owners; and at acts of wanton and useless barbarity. Neither the weakness of the other sex, nor the imbecility of old age, nor the innocence of infants, nor the reverence due to the sacerdotal character, can stay the arm of royal vengeance. On this subject he begged leave to trouble the committee with reading a few passages from a most authentic document, the manifesto of the Congress of the United Provinces of Rio de la Plata, published in October last. This was a paper of the highest authority; it was an appeal to the whole world; it asserted facts of notoriety in the face of the whole world. It was not to be credited that the Congress would come forward with a statement which was not true, when the means, if it were false, of exposing their fabrications, must be so abundant, and so easy to command. It was a document, in short, that stood upon the same footing of authority with our own papers, promulged during the Revolution by our Congress. He would add, that many of the facts which it affirmed, were corroborated by most respectable historical testimony, which was in his own possession.

* Washington's answer to the French Minister's address, on his presenting the colors of France, in 1796.

[Mr. C. here read the following passages from the manifesto:]

"Memory shudders at the recital of the horrors that were then committed by Goyeneche, in Cochabamba. Would to heaven it were possible to blot from remembrance the name of that ungrateful and blood-thirsty American; who, on the day of his entry, ordered the virtuous Governor and Intendant, Antesana, to be shot; who, beholding from the balcony of his house that infamous murder, cried out with a ferocious voice to the soldiers, that they must not fire at the head, because he wanted it to be affixed to a pole; and who, after the head was taken off, ordered the cold corpse to be dragged through the streets; and, by a barbarous decree, placed the lives and fortunes of the citizens at the mercy of his unbridled soldiery, leaving them to exercise their licentious and brutal sway during several days! But those blind and cruelly capricious men (the Spaniards) rejected the mediation of England, and despatched rigorous orders to all the Generals to aggravate the war, and to punish us with more severity. The scaffolds were everywhere multiplied, and invention was racked to devise means for spreading murder, distress, and consternation.

"Thenceforth they made all possible efforts to spread division among us, to incite us to mutual extermination; they have slandered us with the most atrocious calumnies, accusing us of plotting the destruction of our holy religion, the abolition of all morality, and of introducing licentiousness of manners. They wage a religious war against us, contriving a thousand artifices to disturb and alarm the consciences of the people, making the Spanish bishops issue decrees of ecclesiastical condemnation, public excommunications, and disseminating, through the medium of some ignorant confessor, fanatical doctrines in the tribunal of penitence. By means of these religious discords they have divided families against themselves; they have caused disaffection between parents and children; they have dissolved the tender ties which unite husband and wife; they have spread rancor and implacable hatred between brothers, most endeared, and they have presumed to throw all nature into discord.

"They have adopted the system of murdering men indiscriminately to diminish our numbers; and, on their entry into towns, they have swept off all, even the market people, leading them to the open squares, and there shooting them one by one. The cities of Chuquisaca and Cohabamba have more than once been the theatres of these horrid slaughters.

"They have intermixed with their troops soldiers of ours whom they had taken prisoners, carrying away the officers in chains to garrisons where it is impossible to preserve health for a year; they have left others to die in their prisons of hunger and misery, and others they have forced to hard labor on the public works. They have exultingly put to death our bearers of flags of truce, and have been guilty of the blackest atrocities to our chiefs, after they had surrendered, as well as to other principal characters, in disregard of the humanity with which we treated prisoners; as a proof of it, witness the deputy Mutes of Potosi, the Captain General Pumacagua, General Augulo, and his brother Commandant Munecas, and other partisan chiefs, who were shot in cold blood, after having been prisoners for several days.

"They took a brutal pleasure in cropping the ears of the natives of the town of Villegrande, and sending a basket full of them as presents to the headquarters. They afterwards burnt that town, and set fire to thirty other populous towns of Peru, and worse than the worst of savages, shutting the inhabitants up in the houses, before setting them on fire, that they might be burnt alive.

"They have not only been cruel and unsparing in their mode of murder, but they have been void of all morality and public decency, causing aged ecclesiastics and women to be lashed to a gun and publicly flogged, with the abomination of first having them stripped, and their nakedness exposed to shame, in the presence of their troops.

"They established an inquisitorial system in all these punishments; they have seized on peaceable inhabitants, and transported them across the seas to be adjudged for suspected crimes, and they have put a great number of citizens to death everywhere without accusation or the form of a trial.

"They have invented a crime of unexampled horror, in poisoning our water and provisions, when they were conquered by General Pineto at La Paz, and in return for the kindness with which he treated them, after they had surrendered at discretion, they had the barbarity to blow up the headquarters, under which they had constructed a mine, and prepared a train beforehand.

"He has branded us with the stigma of rebels the moment he returned to Madrid; he refused to listen to our complaints, or to receive our supplications; and as an act of extreme favor, he offered us a pardon. He confirmed the Viceroys, Governors, and Generals, whom he found actually glutted with carnage; he declared us guilty of a high misdemeanor for having dared to frame a constitution for our own government, free from the control of a deified, absolute, and tyrannical power, under which we had groaned three centuries—a measure that could be offensive only to a Prince, an enemy to justice and beneficence, and consequently unworthy to rule over us.

"He then undertook, with the aid of his Ministers, to equip large military armaments to be directed against us. He has caused numerous armies to be sent out to consummate the work of devastation, fire, and plunder.

"He has sent his Generals, with certain decrees of pardon, which they publish to deceive the ignorant, and induce them to facilitate their entrance into towns; whilst, at the same time, he has given them other secret instructions, authorizing them, as soon as they should get possession of a place, to hang, burn, confiscate, and sack; to encourage private assassinations, and to commit every species of injury in their power against the deluded beings who had confided in his pretended pardon. It is in the name of Ferdinand of Bourbon, that the heads of patriot officers, prisoners, are fixed up in the highways, that they beat and stoned to death a commandant of light troops, and that, after having killed Colonel Camugo, in the same manner, by the hands of the indecent Centeno, they cut off his head, and sent it as a present to General Pezuela, telling him it was a miracle of the Virgin of the Carmelites."

In the establishment of the independence of Spanish America, the United States have the deepest interest. He had no hesitation in asserting his firm belief, that there was no question, in the foreign policy of this country, which had ever arisen, or which he could conceive as ever occurring, in the decision of which we had so much at stake. This interest concerned our politics, our commerce, our navigation. There could not be a doubt that Spanish America, once independent, whatever might be the form of the governments established in its several parts, those governments would be animated by an American feeling, and guided by an American policy. They would obey the laws of the system of the New World, of which they would compose a part, in contradistinction to that of Europe. Without the influence of that vortex in Europe, the balance of power between its several parts, the preservation of which had so often drenched Europe in blood, America is sufficiently remote to contemplate the new wars which are to afflict that quarter of the globe, as a calm, if not a cold and indifferent, spectator. In relation to those wars, the several parts of America will generally stand neutral. And as, during the period when they rage, it would be important that a liberal system of neutrality should be adopted and observed, all America will be interested in maintaining and enforcing such a system. The independence, then, of Spanish America is an interest of primary consideration. Next to that, and highly important in itself, was the consideration of the nature of their governments. That was a question, however, for themselves. They would, no doubt, adopt those kinds of governments which were best suited to their condition, best calculated for their happiness. Anxious as he was that they should be free governments, we had no right to prescribe for them. They were, and ought to be, the sole judges for themselves. He was strongly inclined to believe that they would in most, if not all, parts of their country, establish free governments. We were their great example. Of us they constantly spoke as of brothers, having a similar origin. They adopted our principles, copied our institutions, and, in some instances, employed the very language and sentiments of our revolutionary papers. [Here Mr. C. read the following passage from the same manifesto before cited:]

"Having, then, been thus impelled by the Spaniards and their King, we have calculated all the consequences, and have constituted ourselves independent, prepared to exercise the right of nature to defend ourselves against the ravages of tyranny, at the risk of our honor, our lives, and fortune. We have sworn to the only King we acknowledge, the Supreme Judge of the World, that we will not abandon the cause of justice; that we will not suffer the country which he has given us to be buried in ruins, and inundated with blood, by the hands of the executioner," &c.

But it is sometimes said that they are too ignorant and too superstitious to admit of the existence of free government. This charge of ignorance is often urged by persons themselves actually ignorant of the real condition of that people. He denied the alleged fact of ignorance; he denied the inference from that fact, if it were true, that they wanted capacity for free government; and he refused his assent to the further conclusion, if the fact were true and the inference just, that we were to be indifferent to their fate. All the writers of the most established authority, Depons, Humboldt, and others, concur in assigning to the people of Spanish America, great quickness, genius, and particular aptitude for the acquisition of the exact sciences, and others which they have been allowed to cultivate. In astronomy, geology, mineralogy, chemistry, botany, &c., they are allowed to make distinguished proficiency. They justly boast of their Abzate, Velasquez, and Gama, and other illustrious contributors to science. They have nine Universities, and in the city of Mexico it is affirmed, by Humboldt, that there are more solid scientific establishments than in any city even of North America. He would refer to the message of the Supreme Director of La Plata, which he would hereafter have occasion to use for another purpose, as a model of fine composition of a State paper, challenging a comparison with any, the most celebrated that ever issued from the pens of Jefferson or Madison. Gentlemen would egregiously err if they formed their opinions of the present moral condition of Spanish America, from what it was under the debasing system of Spain. The eight years' revolution in which it has been engaged, has already produced a powerful effect.

Education had been attended to, and genius developed. [Here Mr. C. read a passage from the Colonial Journal, published last Summer in Great Britain, where a disposition to exaggerate on that side of the question could hardly be supposed to exist.] The fact was not, therefore, true, that the imputed ignorance existed; but, if it did, he repeated that he disputed the inference. It was the doctrine of thrones, that man was too ignorant to govern himself. Their partisans assert this incapacity in reference to all nations; if they cannot command universal assent to the proposition, it is then demanded as to particular nations; and our pride and our presumption too often make converts of us. Mr. C. contended that it was to arraign the dispositions of Providence himself, to suppose that he had created beings incapable of governing themselves, and to be trampled on by kings. He contended that self-government was the natural government of man, and he referred to the aborigines of our own land. If he were to speculate in hypotheses unfavorable to human liberty, his should be founded rather upon the vices, refinements, or density of population. Crowded together in compact masses, even if they were philosophers, the contagion of the passions is communicated and caught, and the effect too often, he admitted, was the overthrow of liberty. Dispersed over such an immense space as that on which the people of Spanish America were spread, their physical, and he believed, also, their moral condition, both favored liberty.

With regard to their superstition, he said, they worshipped the same God with us. Their prayers were offered up in their temples to the same Redeemer, whose intercession we expected to save us. All religions, united with Government, were more or less inimical to liberty. All, separated from Government, were compatible with liberty. If the people of Spanish America had not already gone as far, in religious toleration, as we had, the difference in their condition from ours should not be forgotten. Every thing was progressive. And in time he hoped to see them imitating, in this respect, our example. But grant that the people of Spanish America are ignorant, and incompetent for free government, to whom is that ignorance to be ascribed? Is it not to the execrable system of Spain, which she seeks again to establish and to perpetuate? So far from chilling our hearts, it ought to increase our solicitude for our unfortunate brethren. It ought to animate us to desire the redemption of the minds and the bodies of unborn millions from the brutifying effects of a system, whose tendency is to stifle the faculties of the soul, and to degrade man to the level of beasts. He would invoke the spirits of our departed fathers. Was it for yourselves only that you nobly fought? No, no. It was the chains that were forging for your posterity that made you fly to arms, and, scattering the elements of those chains to the winds, you transmitted to us the rich inheritance of liberty.

Mr. C. continued—having shown that the cause of the patriots was just, and that we had a great interest in its successful issue, he would next inquire what course of policy it became us to adopt. He had already declared that to be one of strict and impartial neutrality. It was not necessary for their interest, it was not expedient for our own, that we should take part in the war. All they demanded of us was a just neutrality. It was compatible with this pacific policy—it was required by it, that we should recognize any established Government, if there were any established Government in Spanish America. Recognition alone, without aid, was no just cause of war. With aid it was, not because of the recognition, but because of the aid, as aid without recognition was cause of war. The truth of these propositions he would maintain upon principle, by the practice of other States, and by the usage of our own. There was no common tribunal among the nations to pronounce upon the fact of the sovereignty of a new State. Each power must and does judge for itself. It was an attribute of sovereignty so to judge. A nation, in exerting this incontestable right—in pronouncing upon the independence, in fact, of a new State, takes no part in the war. It gives neither men, nor ships, nor money. It merely pronounces that in so far as it may be necessary to institute any relations, or to support any intercourse, with the new power, that power is capable of maintaining those relations and authorizing that intercourse.—Martens and other publicists lay down these principles.

When the United Provinces formerly severed themselves from Spain, it was about eighty years before their independence was finally recognized by Spain. Before that recognition, the United Provinces had been received by all the rest of Europe into the family of nations. It is true that a war broke out between Philip and Elizabeth, but it proceeded from the aid which she determined to give, and did give to Holland. In no instance, he believed, could it be shown, from authentic history, that Spain made war upon any power, on the sole ground that such power had acknowledged the independence of the United Provinces.

In the case of our own Revolution, it was not until after France had given us aid, and had determined to enter into a treaty of alliance with us—a treaty by which she guaranteed our independence—that England declared war. Holland also was charged by England with favoring our cause, and deviating from the line of strict neutrality. And when it was perceived that she was, moreover, about to enter into a treaty with us, England declared war. Even if it were shown that a proud, haughty, and powerful nation, like England, had made war upon other provinces, on the ground of a mere recognition, the single example could not alter the public law, or shake the strength of a clear principle.

But what had been our own uniform practice. We constantly proceeded on the principle. that the government de facto was that which we could alone notice. Whatever from of government any society of people adopt; whoever they acknowledge as their sovereign, we consider that government or that sovereign as the one to be acknowledged by us. We have invariably abstained from assuming a right to decide in favor of the sovereign de jure, and against the sovereign de facto. That is a question for the nation in which it arises to determine. And, so far as we are concerned, the sovereign de facto is the sovereign de jure. Our own revolution stands on the basis of the right of a people to change their rulers. He did not maintain that every immature revolution—every usurper, before his power was consolidated, was to be acknowledged by us; but that as soon as stability and order were maintained, no matter by whom, we always had considered and ought to consider the actual as the true Government. General Washington, Mr. Jefferson, Mr. Madison, had all, whilst they were respectively Presidents, acted on these principles.

In the case of the French Republic, General Washington did not wait until some of the crowned heads of Europe should set him the example of acknowledging it, but accredited a Minister at once. And it is remarkable that he was received before the Government of the Republic was considered as established. It will be found, in Marshall's Life of Washington, that, when it was understood that a Minister from the French Republic was about to present himself, President Washington submitted a number of questions to his Cabinet for their consideration and advice, one of which was, whether, upon the reception of the Minister, he should be notified that America would suspend the execution of the treaties between the two countries until France had an established Government. General Washington did not stop to inquire whether the descendants of St. Louis were to be considered as the legitimate sovereigns of France, and if the revolution was to be regarded as unauthorized resistance to their sway. He saw France, in fact, under the Government of those who had subverted the throne of the Bourbons, and he acknowledged the actual Government. During Mr. Jefferson's and Mr. Madison's Administration, when the Cortes of Spain and Joseph Bonaparte respectively contended for the Crown, those enlightened statesmen said, we will receive a Minister from neither party; settle the question between yourselves, and we will acknowledge the party that prevails. We have nothing to do with your feuds; whoever all Spain acknowledges as her sovereign, is the only sovereign with whom we can maintain any relations. Mr. Jefferson, it is understood, considered whether he should not receive a Minister from both parties, and finally decided against it because of the inconveniences to this country which might result from the double representation of another power. As soon as the French armies were expelled from the Peninsula, Mr. Madison, still acting on the principle of the Government de facto, received the present Minister from Spain. During all the phases of the French Government — Republic, Directory, Consuls, Consul for life, Emperor, King, Emperor again, King—our Government has uniformly received the Minister.

If, then, there be an established Government in Spanish America, deserving to rank among the nations, we were morally and politically bound to acknowledge it, unless we renounced all the principles which ought to guide, and which hitherto had guided, our councils. Mr. C. then undertook to show, that the united provinces of the Rio de la Plata was such a Government. Its limits, he said, extending from the South Atlantic Ocean to the Pacific, embraced a territory equal to that of the United States, certainly equal to it, exclusive of Louisiana. Its population was about three millions, more than equal to ours at the commencement of our Revolution. That population was a hardy, enterprising, and gallant population. The establishments of Montevideo and Buenos Ayres had, during different periods of their history, been attacked by the French, Dutch, Danes, Portuguese, English, and Spanish; and such was the martial character of the people, that, in every instance, the attack had been repulsed. In 1807, General Whitlocke, commanding a powerful English army, was admitted, under the guise of a friend, into Buenos Ayres, and, as soon as he was supposed to have demonstrated inimical designs, he was driven by the native and unaided force of Buenos Ayres from the country. Buenos Ayres had, during now nearly eight years, been, in point of fact, in the enjoyment of self-government. The capital, containing more than sixty thousand inhabitants, has never been once lost. As early as 1811, the regency of Old Spain made war upon Buenos Ayres, and the consequence subsequently was, the capture of a Spanish army in Montevideo, equal to that of Burgoyne. This Government has now in excellent discipline, three well-appointed armies, with the most abundant materiel of war; the army of Chili, the army of Peru, and the army of Buenos Ayres. The first, under San Martin, has conquered Chili; the second is penetrating in a Northwestern direction from Buenos Ayres, into the vice-royalty of Peru; and, according to the last accounts, had reduced the ancient seat of empire of the Incas. The third remains at Buenos Ayres to oppose any force which Spain may send against it.

Are we not bound, then, upon our own principles, to acknowledge this new Republic? If we do not, who will? Are we to expect that Kings will set us the example of acknowledging the only Republic on earth except our own? We receive, promptly receive, a Minister from whatever King sends us one. From the great powers and the little powers we accredit Ministers. We do more: we hasten to reciprocate the compliment; and anxious to manifest our gratitude for royal civility, we send for a Minister (as in the instance of Sweden and the Netherlands) of the lowest grade, one of the highest rank recognized by our laws. We were the natural head of the American family. He would not intermeddle in the affairs of Europe. We wisely kept aloof from their broils. He would not even intermeddle in those of other parts of America, farther than to exert the incontestable rights appertaining to us as a free, sovereign, and independent power; and, he contended, that the accrediting of a Minister from the new Republic was such a right. We were bound to receive their Minister, if we meant to be really neutral. If the Royal belligerent were represented and heard at our Government, the Republican belligerent ought also to be heard. Otherwise, one party would be in the condition of the poor patriots who were tried ex parte the other day in the Supreme Court, without counsel, without friends. Give M. Onis his congé, or receive the Republican Minister. Unless you do so, your neutrality is nominal.

There was great reason, Mr. C. contended, from the peculiar character of the American Government, in there being a perfect understanding between the legislative and Executive branches, in relation to the acknowledgment of a new power. Everywhere else the power of declaring war resided with the Executive. Here it was deposited with the Legislature. If, contrary to his opinion, there were even a risk that the acknowledgment of a new State might lead to war, it was advisable that the step should not be taken, without a previous knowledge of the will of the war-making branch. He was disposed to give to the President all the confidence which he must derive from the unequivocal expression of our will. This expression he knew might be given in the form of an abstract resolution, declaratory of that will; but he preferred, at this time, proposing an act of practical legislation. And if he had been so fortunate as to communicate to the committee, in any thing like that degree of strength in which he entertained them, the convictions that the cause of the patriots was just; that the character of the war, as waged by Spain, should induce us to wish them success; that we had a great interest in that success; that this interest, as well as our neutral attitude, required us to acknowledge any established Government in Spanish America; that the united provinces of the river Plata was such a Government; that we might safely acknowledge its independence, without danger of war from Spain, from the allies, or from England; and that, without unconstitutional interference with the Executive power, with peculiar fitness, we might express, in an act of appropriation, our sentiments, leaving him to the exercise of a just and responsible discretion, he hoped the committee would adopt the proposition which he now had the honor of presenting to them, after a respectful tender of his acknowledgments for their attention and kindness, during, he feared, the tedious period he had been so unprofitably trespassing upon their patience. He offered the following amendment to the bill

"For one year's salary, and an outfit to a Minister to the United Provinces of the Rio de La Plata, the salary to commence, and the outfit to be paid, whenever the President shall deem it expedient to send a Minister to the said United Provinces, a sum not exceeding eighteen thousand dollars."

When Mr. CLAY had concluded,

Mr. FORSYTH said, that before entering into the examination of the subject before the committee, he would detain them for a moment by a remark or two on a suggestion that had fallen from the Speaker, so remotely connected with the question, that he should probably forget it if he omitted to notice it then. It had been said that Ministers were sent from the United States to all the crowned heads in Europe who had Ministers here. A Chargé d'Affaires to the United States was reciprocated by a Minister Plenipotentiary to the Court from whence he came, and the Courts of Sweden, Holland, and Prussia, had been particularly named. The last is one to which a Minister was expected to be sent, particular information of which fact Mr. F. was supposed to possess. But for this personal allusion he should not have felt himself compelled to refer to this subject. [Mr. CLAY explained.] Mr. F. understood perfectly well that there was no unfriendly spirit in the remark, it was an allusion to an event which was expected to occur, but upon what foundation he had been at a loss to conjecture. Certain it was, he had no intimation that this or any other diplomatic appointment would be offered to him, and it was equally certain that he had not solicited any. An idle rumor was in circulation that he was to be sent abroad, where, the persons circulating it, had not determined. He hoped to be consulted as to the place of exile, when he was to be sent into honorable banishment. The Administration had not, he believed, determined to send a Minister to Prussia, of any grade. There was a mistake as to the fact, in the case of Holland. The Government of the Netherlands had sent a Minister of the first grade to the United States, before Mr. Eustis went to the Hague. At present there was only a Chargé here, and it was altogether probable that the interest of the United States would not require a representative of a different character in the Netherlands. The appointments to the Hague and to Sweden, had been made by Mr. Madison, under circumstances requiring them. With regard to Sweden, the motive for the original appointment was well known. It was made at a period when, from the peculiar situation of Europe, Sweden was an important power. She was the keystone of the arch of the great confederation against France, and it was part of our policy at that period to stand well with all the powers in the north of Europe. The restoration of peace certainly rendered this mission of minor importance; and when the Minister of the United States came home, it was not expected that he would again return to fix his official residence at Stockholm. Why he returned to Sweden was as well known to the honorable Speaker as to any member of the House. Mr. F. was confident that he would not remain there.

Was the importance of the amendment proposed to be estimated by the interest it excited, and the extraordinary manner in which it had been presented, few subjects of equal magnitude had ever been submitted to the decision of the National Legislature. That the deep interest felt in the fate of the measure, was not confined to those who were to decide upon it, was apparent from the crowded benches of the Hall and the overflowing gallery. For ourselves, the Throne of Grace had been that morning addressed to purify our hearts and enlighten our understandings for its correct decision. Every one must be struck by the whimsical contrast between the real and factitious importance of the proposition. To judge from the extraordinary exertions of the Speaker, from the ground over which he travelled and the variety of objects noticed by him, it would seem he believed it worthy of the exertions of all his industry, ability, and enthusiasm—that the freedom and happiness of eighteen millions of people were, in truth, involved in its decision. Mr. F. had in vain tasked his imagination to discover that such consequences could follow from it. He could not perceive the miraculous influence of appropriating eighteen thousand dollars for an outfit and salary for a Minister to La Plata, to commence when, in the discretion of the President, a Minister should be sent to that Government. All the facts stated by the Speaker might be admitted, the arguments founded upon them might be considered as conclusive, still the amendment proposed ought not to be adopted. How obvious, then, must be the propriety of rejecting it, when the facts were disputable and the reasoning inconclusive. Admitting the independence of La Plata to be established; that it was the right and the duty of the United States to recognize that independence; that war with Spain or any other power would not follow; that our interest and our honor required this step to be taken—still the amendment ought to be rejected. If recognition is made, it is to be done in the United States. We are to acknowledge their independence; to send a Minister to La Plata is to ask them to acknowledge ours. A Minister must be sent to, and accredited by this Government. It had not as yet appeared that the Government of La Plata desired or expected us to make such an acknowledgment; at least no one with requisite authority was known to have been sent to this country for the purpose of asking such a favor. Another objection, not less obvious, was presented by the constitutional division of the powers of the Government. Heretofore the President and Senate were left to the exclusive management of the foreign intercourse of the United States. Ministers were received from other powers, and sent from this country to other Governments, with whom political or commercial interest required us to negotiate, and the House of Representatives contented itself with its constitutional check upon the exercise of this authority; satisfied that they could at all times prevent its improvident exertion, by withholding appropriations from those missions the public interest did not require. This, however, proposes a new system; this House, instead of checking, is made to stimulate the Executive to a further extension of its patronage. This new system might have its conveniency, but these would be found, on examination, to be personal conveniences to aspiring and designing members of the Legislative body, at the expense of the general welfare. The suggestion that, under the present extraordinary circumstances of the world, the expression of the public opinion by the Representatives of the people ought to precede the movements of the Executive, was not entitled to the weight which was given to it. The President does not require to be told that the Representatives of the people who selected him to preside over their Government, are prepared at all times, and at every hazard, to do their duty. He dare not doubt that he will be supported in every measure the interest and honor of the nation require him to adopt. Were it really true that the Executive Magistrate had discovered a criminal indifference on this subject, Mr. F. said he would be among the most eager to express such an opinion in the only form in which an opinion could be expressed, by a resolution of the House—boldly and openly declaring its dislike of the course which had been pursued, and recommending the necessary change. The amendment to an appropriation bill in the form proposed did not convey such an opinion. The President might conjecture that such was the intention of the Legislature; yet, even while forming this conjecture, it would be necessary for him to look beyond the act to the motives assigned to those who advocated it. As a measure of ordinary policy the proposition was inadmissible; as an extraordinary measure it was indefensible. It was recommended as a bold, independent, manly expression of the public sentiment, placing the House of Representatives in the front rank in the march of the Government on a dangerous and untried field; it was, in reality, unmeaning and insignificant in its character; and while it proceeds by hinting to the President the course he should pursue, it warily shelters the House from all responsibility for the consequences behind the Executive discretion. If our interference is necessary, let us act effectually; marking the steps necessary to be taken, and taking the responsibility for the result—claiming all the honor, and bearing all the disaster. Let us not at least pretend to give the Executive a discretion already possessed, thus diminishing his responsibility without adding to our own.

Mr. F. could not but remark an apparent contradiction in the address of the Speaker on this subject of the declaration, made a few days since in a discussion of the bill reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations. He had censured with much asperity the patience discovered by the Government in its correspondence with the Spanish Minister, and thanked his God that he did not possess that Job-like attribute. In the address of yesterday we were told that he was opposed to war with Spain—would do no act which would give her just cause of war—would not violently seize any of her possessions. It would seem that, impatient as the honorable Speaker may be at the situation of the dispute with Spain, he is not disposed to do any act calculated to bring it to an immediate determination. The difference between the Administration and himself is, that they would wait with patience, and he impatiently, the change in the Spanish councils. The honorable gentleman would pardon the notice of a species of inconsistency in the course he wished to pursue. He believed that Spain ought to be pressed; that the moment was peculiarly fortunate, and ought not to be lost. How was this pressing to be made? By argument? That had been tried in vain. Certainly not. By threats never intended to be executed? The character of the Speaker forbids such a supposition. Not by war; that had been disclaimed. Not by any means that would give Spain justifiable cause of war. These also had been rejected. It was difficult to imagine how the object was to be accomplished, unless a subsequent suggestion furnished a key to the mystery. He would take the step in relation to the Spanish colonies we might rightfully take, and leave Spain to do as she thought proper. If she continued to refuse to do us justice, the important question of peace or war was then to be decided. If Mr. F. understood the policy recommended, it was to do rightfully all we could to tempt Spain to declare war against us; and if we failed in all these, then we would declare war against Spain. Thus, while disclaiming all idea of war, the Speaker looked constantly to that issue. The sources of temptation were in the dispute with her colonies; we were first to recognize them, what follows is easily foreseen. The motive for this abandonment of our own quarrel, to engage in war on account of Spanish American governments, was the apprehension; if we moved in our own case, we should be justly charged with a thirst of aggrandizement—excite the jealousy, perhaps the hostility, of some other power, and enjoy the sympathy of none. If an interference with Spanish affairs is the ground of dispute, we shall have the sympathies of the world on our side, and excite neither jealousy nor hostility in any of the nations of Europe. Mr. F. believed, with the Speaker, that the present was an auspicious moment for a settlement of the Spanish controversy; that it ought not to be suffered to escape. He was not for war, but for such a movement, in our own dispute, as would place the means of indemnity in our possession, as should enable the Government to do justice to its injured citizens, whatever might be the future condition of the Spanish monarchy. It was war if Spain chose to consider it so; it was short of war if she desired to remain at peace. The jealousy or hostility of foreign powers could not be reasonably excited by such a course. Sympathy was out of the question. No European Government felt it for the United States; they do not fear our power, but they dread our example; they do not apprehend danger from our physical strength, but tremble at the moral influence of our institutions. The course of the Speaker was the one best calculated to excite all their jealousies and hostilities; to confirm an idea, Spain had been at all times exerting herself to enforce, that we were the cause of the disturbances in her possessions, the aiders and abettors of her revolting subjects, and on all occasions ready to sow discord among the subjects of Princes, and to jeopardize the safety of the colonial dependencies of European powers. War with Spain was no bugbear to him; but, if it was commenced, it should be in our own quarrel, and should not be mixed with baser matter. The Administration occupied the middle ground between the Speaker and himself, probably the safest and most congenial to the wishes and the interests of the people. There was one point on which there would be no dispute between them; the policy of the Government was by each of them preferred to the policy recommended by the other. Mr. F. was, however, justified, by the opinion of the Speaker, in believing that a war would not be the consequence of either project. "Spain would not, and could not, declare war against us, from the state of her finances, and the ruin of her resources." The wisdom of the two plans was, therefore, to be tested by the benefits which we would or should derive from complete success, without the hazard of a contest for either.

The amendment was advocated as a recognition of the independence of La Plata. The argument of the honorable mover was directed to this point; and Mr. F. was well aware that one question was frequently argued, and another decided, and that the vote on the decision was sometimes determined on the merits of the question discussed. Considering it as an open proposition to recognize, he was content to meet it, and that it should succeed or fail on the propriety of refusing or making an immediate recognition. Where was the motive for this step? What beneficial consequences will flow from it to La Plata or the United States? What benefits, commercial or political, will accrue? The commerce between the people of this Government and that of the revolutionary La Plata, was free and unrestrained. Our citizens enjoyed all that they asked in the ports of Buenos Ayres, and the people of La Plata were admitted to all the rights and hospitalities that are shown to any foreigners in the waters of the United States. Arms, ammunition, all the product of our agriculture and industry, that their wants may require, are freely purchased and transported in their own or American vessels, without delay or molestation. Their vessels, armed and equipped for war, are admitted without scruple into our ports, and treated with a kindness they have but too frequently abused. Are there any important political results to proceed from this step to either party? To us there certainly are none; to them the only possible advantage would be the probability that our example would be followed by the rest of the world. Mr. F. spoke on the supposition that no war with Spain was produced by this act. Our recognition was better calculated to excite the jealousy and prejudice of despotic Governments against this new power, than to produce a similar recognition of their claims to a place in the family of nations; better calculated to produce a combination of despotic power, to their ruin, than a friendly aid in the accomplishment of their independence. This acknowledgment was useless to them politically and commercially. All the practical benefits arising from it, were enjoyed so long as we considered their independence as existing without pronouncing a decision upon that point disputed by them with Spain. Where was the motive to be found to justify this improvident hurry to the useless acknowledgment of a Government whose independence depended wholly upon its own exertions? That could not be aided in its progress by such a declaration, unless accompanied by substantial aid; an aid even the sanguine gentleman from Kentucky did not propose to give. It was said, however, that we ought to be the first to acknowledge a sister Republic. If we did not, who would? With more than ordinary diligence, Mr. F. had endeavored to find the freedom and liberality in the frame and institutions of this new Government, which would entitle it to this name. He had sought for them in vain. There was a Congress and a Supreme Director; a Congress, the Speaker has said, chosen somewhat like our own. Mr. F. would have rejoiced to learn in what this resemblance consisted. If the Congress were chosen by the people, he had been deceived by the Outline of the Revolution in Spanish America; a work to which he referred on the recommendation of the Speaker. The sole resemblance was in name. The Government of La Plata was a military despotism, like the Republic of France in the days of the Consulate, but destitute of its order, strength, and stability. If the resemblance was perfect, and the Government and people of La Plata worthy to be ranked by our side in the community of nations, still the inutility of such an acknowledgment is a satisfactory reason for refraining from it.

Mr. F. thought he might safely leave the question to the judgment of the committee, after showing that the most powerful recommendations of the amendment were, that it was unmeaning and harmless. But he considered it a duty to examine more at large the various inducements offered by the Speaker to insure its success. Mr. F. knew and felt the danger to which he exposed himself by this course—that he would be assailed as an enemy to liberty, &c. Exertions had been made to prepare the public mind for such impressions against all those who thought with him on this subject. Notice had been given from this city, and was now ringing through the Western country, that questions were to be brought into view, by whose decision the people would be able to discriminate between those who were just and unjust to the patriot cause—between the friends and the enemies of freedom. Such considerations had no influence upon his conduct. He who was deterred by anticipated censure, or threatened calumny, from the performance of any duty, was not worthy to represent a free people—to preside even in the most subordinate sphere over the movements of a mighty empire. Careless of the motives which might be imputed to him, he should proceed to show that the Speaker had offered no sufficient inducement to justify his proposal in the origin, progress, or character, of the revolution in Spanish America; that it is not demanded by our commercial or political interest in the great struggle between Spain and her former dependencies; that while he admitted it was the right of the United States, it was not a duty to recognize the new Government; that it could not be done without the danger of war with Spain; and that it was not sufficiently demonstrated that Buenos Ayres had established, and would maintain, a free and independent Government. In tracing the origin of the revolution, the Speaker had carried us back to the first invasion of Mexico and Peru, to the days of Cortez and Pizarro, of Montezuma and Atahualpa. From that period he had given a faint outline of the cruel, selfish, monopolizing, and debasing policy of Spain to her American dependencies—foreign and inter-colonial intercourse forbidden to her subjects in those magnificent and fertile regions of the earth; the pursuits of agriculture directed by the narrow policy of an unjust Government; the soul itself debased to the purposes of oppression by municipal regulation. It was a gloomy picture of a sad reality; a faithful representation of nature, drawn by a master's hand. The policy was but too truly characterized, and its success was as complete as its character was atrocious. It had been pursued with undeviating steadiness, until the horrible contrast was exhibited of a people the most debased, in the midst of the fairest regions of the globe; man, the masterwork of creation, with intellect enervated by despotism, and soul withered by superstition, surrounded by the most sublime and stupendous monuments of inanimated nature. Was the origin of the revolution to be found in this systematic oppression? It would be looked for here in vain. To use the language of the Speaker, Spain would have succeeded in continuing this system but for the transactions of Bayonne. The puerile ambition of Napoleon was the foundation of the South American struggle. The Old World was convulsed; eighteen millions of people were agitated in the new, by his childish desire to have a King of the new dynasty on the throne of Spain; by his silly anxiety to substitute the Bonapartes for the Bourbons, over all nations dependent upon his colossal power. Was this great event hailed with joy by the Spanish Americans? Was the glorious opportunity of breaking their chains seized with avidity? Far, very far, from it. They were stunned by this unexpected occurrence; stupefied by the dreadful alternative of self-government, or submission to French rule. Like the unhappy man long immured in the gloom of a prison, they had been so long deprived of his glorious light, that the beams of the blessed sun were hateful to their eyes. This fortunate event was considered a national calamity, to which there was no alleviation but the opportunity it afforded to discover their unshaken loyalty and blind devotion to the cause of their adored King. Their resources were devoted to his service. The sole difficulty was to find, during his imprisonment, a substitute for the royal authority. The laws, and customs, and frame of Government, in other respects, remained without change; the municipalities, haciendas, audiencias, &c., all the subordinate machinery, continued in its accustomed place, and performed its accustomed operations; and, although the necessity of additional exertion produced a greater vigor of character and boldness of thought in the heads of the Government, the great mass remained unaltered in habits, opinions, and desires. England, covering the peninsula of Spain and Portugal with her armies, and, the enemy of France, procuring, without difficulty, the great object of her long-continued solicitude—a free commerce with Spanish America. Juntas were established upon the same principles as the Juntas of Spain, and war with the Junta of Spain was occasioned by the refusal of Spanish America to acknowledge that they were the legitimate repository of the royal power in both hemispheres. The unhappy land was rent by internal factions, in which the people were the instruments of designing ambition. The leading men disputed for the honor of being the royal substitute, none for the glory of establishing a free Government, founded upon the principles of justice and equality, whose basis was the power, whose object was the happiness of the people. The most bold, and successful, and honorable exertion, for the formation of a liberal Government, was made in Venezuela. But this new Government was overturned by an earthquake in 1812. The misguided people were induced to believe that this awful visitation was the immediate consequence of their conduct, the just judgment of an angry God upon the revolution, and those who promoted or favored its success.

It might be imagined that the principles of political, civil, and religious freedom had been developed in the progress of the revolution; the present state of it would discover how far the people of Spanish America had improved in the knowledge of their personal rights, and their determination to maintain them. In Mexico the contest was at an end; at all times of a doubtful issue, the last ray of hope was extinguished by the death of the gallant and unfortunate Mina. This disastrous termination of the struggle was not produced by the successful exertion of Old Spain; it was effected by the efforts of a people who formed a large portion of the eighteen millions of men who were represented as contending in the glorious cause of freedom. In Caraccas, a sanguinary, and dreadful, and, at least, a doubtful contest was maintained with the modern Alva, by the imitator of his cruelty, Bolivar. La Plata and Chili had better prospects of success; and all our sanguine hopes are fixed upon them. Thus, of the eighteen millions of people, for whom our sympathy is demanded, more than thirteen millions are the contented slaves of the Spanish authority; and it was the madness or stupidity of Ferdinand, that prevented the voluntary return of all to their ancient thraldom. A decree of oblivion for the past would have reinstated the Spanish power, if it had been promulgated by Ferdinand on his restoration to the throne. Mr. F. rested this opinion upon the authority of a work to which he had before referred, the Outline of the Revolution in South America. In the conclusion of that work it is said, "the return of Ferdinand might have brought with it the return of peace. The people were tired of war; the leaders of the revolution disappointed in their views; a large body of the people in a state of apathy or indifference; and what was still more important, the veneration attached to the name of Ferdinand still existed, though, in some degree, diminished." This veneration was converted into a dread of his resentment, by the mission of Morillo and his sanguinary suite. Mr. F. trusted in Heaven that this act of royal madness would meet with its appropriate punishment, in the total subversion of his western empire; that thus compelled to continue a resistance to the Spanish yoke, that the people would acquire what experience and suffering had not yet taught them, the knowledge of their strength, and the means of using it to the establishment of a Government similar to ours. Such were his ardent wishes, not his confident expectations. That the independence of all, or portions of the southern continent would, at no distant day, be achieved, could not be doubted; to what extent civil liberty would be established, was matter of speculation. Opinions, more or less favorable, would be formed, according to the sanguine or cautious temper of the judge. In the origin and progress of the revolution, there was no inducement to an act of doubtful policy. But our sympathy was demanded for this great cause, in character so like that of our Revolution. Sympathy for the people of the South was universally felt, and might be indulged, without scruple, in wishes and in hopes; but, when it was made the foundation of an attempt to precipitate the adoption of a favorite measure, it was necessary to examine how far it was justly inspired. That the cause of the colonies was just, and that they were entitled to the good wishes of all mankind in their contest with Spain, was unquestionable; but we are expected to feel and indulge a deeper sympathy, arising from the alleged similarity of their situation and that of the United States in 1776, from a congeniality of feeling, opinions, and pursuits, between the Spanish Americans and our predecessors. The honorable member from Kentucky had solemnly invoked the departed spirits of our ancestors to give him strength and ability to vindicate a people contending in a cause as glorious as that in which they had been engaged. An invocation to those illustrious shades to pardon a profanation of their ashes, by this odious comparison, would have better become him; and if the inhabitants of the other world are permitted to interest themselves in the transactions of this life, they would, no doubt, find, in the purity of his intentions, the motive for this forgiveness. Was not the comparison odious? In what consisted this boasted resemblance? They are colonies, contending to be independent of the parent country—so were we; here the resemblance ceases. In the motives of the contests, in the causes which produced them, in their means, and in their ends, there is contrast, not resemblance. We asserted, vindicated, maintained, and improved our rights, political, civil, and religious. We saw oppression as it approached us; remonstrated with firmness against injustice; discussed with calmness the extent of our obligations and the nature of our rights. With a perfect knowledge of the doubtful issue of a contest with our powerful, proud, and ambitious stepmother, we encountered its perils and pursued it with virtuous steadiness, until our triumph was as signal as our moderation had been conspicuous. They were oppressed and contented, manacled and reconciled to their chains, until accident compelled them to involuntary exertions. Political independence was cast upon them, and is now the sole object of continued resistance. If human rights are secured by success, it is an unlooked for, unexpected consequence; an unknown good, a result not desired by those who were to derive its benefits. Political independence was, with us, the means for the accomplishment of our objects. With us it was emphatically a war of the people. The Government organized to conduct it was established by them. In the numerous changes of the persons in power, it was the immediate and regular expression of their will, that elevated or depressed the candidates for their confidence. The Confederation, a rope of sand, had tenacity and strength enough to bind them together, while union was necessary to success. During the contest, the military was completely subordinate to the civil power. With them, the first and the last movements in the contest were made without consulting the will of the people, and no means have yet been afforded by which it can be effectually expressed. They have neither agency in the management of, nor control over, the acts of the Government, created for them. Revolution has succeeded revolution. Every change of rulers has been produced by a change in the form of substitution for the royal authority. The civil has been at all times subordinate to the military power. There was an equally striking dissimilarity in the manner in which the wars were conducted. With us, with the exception of some personal, intestine, and bloody feuds between Whig and Tory, it was carried on with the strictest regard to the laws of honorable and civilized warfare; no instance occurred of the death of the unresisting by the command of any officer in the public service. It must not be forgotten that ample justification was given by the British armies for a contrary system. The massacre of Paoli and the murder of Hayne were still fresh in the recollection of all. But, while burning with resentment for these atrocious deeds, we did not forget what was due to our character, and dishonor our reputation by following a horrible example. The cold-blooded massacre nerved the arms and steeled the hearts of our soldiers in the hour of conflict, but the cry of mercy never was raised in vain by a vanquished foe. When the gallant Hayne was barbarously executed by a British officer, whose present rank and subsequent achievements could not remove the stain of this sanguinary act from his character, the deep indignation of the nation was excited. A gallant officer was selected to pay with his life for the cruelty of his country. But the sacrifice was never made, and the gallant and generous officer was reserved to perish in defending the reputation of that people, by whose forbearance his life, forfeited by the injustice of his country, was spared. Mr. F. would not be understood to call in question the justice of the retaliatory system of extermination adopted by the Spanish Americans. He believed that the dreadful example was set by the Royalists, and the resort to it was justifiable, and perhaps essential to security and success. All he proposed by this examination was to show, what was highly honorable to his own countrymen, that a resort to such a system was not made by them under the strongest temptations, and under circumstances which would have fully justified it. The comparison was made to show the exalted character of our own contest, not excite prejudice against that of neighboring nations.

Splendid political consequences were anticipated from the expected change. The freedom of the commerce of the Mississippi—the safe navigation of the Gulf of Mexico—the power and effect we should derive, from being the head of a confederation of republics. In case of necessity, the new world of republics was to be arrayed against the old world of despotisms. In the event of European wars, we shall have powerful auxiliaries in the assertion of neutral rights. And was it really apprehended we should ever want aid to maintain the free commerce of the Mississippi or the Gulf of Mexico? these might be safely trusted to our gallant tars and the people of the West. Suppose this great change to have taken place. Overleap in imagination the progress of centuries, and see the United States connected with Republican Governments to the southern extremity of the New World; the first, if you please, in wealth and power; overcoming the disadvantages of situation and climate, by her superior skill and superior industry. What superior advantages will the people enjoy that are not possessed by ourselves? Will they be more free, more happy, more virtuous, and less exposed to the danger of internal commotion and external violence? The power of the Government to destroy other nations would be increased; the power of the Government to promote the welfare of the people, the object for which it exists, would remain the same. Connected with the people, active, intelligent, and jealous as ourselves, our rivals in commerce, in agriculture, in science, and in the freedom of their institutions; will these elements of strife be composed to harmony by the tender names of sister Republics? Men do not change their nature with their Governments! Brooding avarice, malignant revenge, daring ambition, will find their place under all forms of government, in all ages and in every clime. Mr. F. would not look further into the consequences which might be anticipated from the working of these passions among the affiliated nations. As in the days of ancient Greece the ground of quarrel would be, who should be the first; and some Eastern Satrap might again be found, to foment the quarrels and distract the councils of the Western World. There was one remedy for these dangers; instead of many, but two Republics should be created of the North and South Americas. Mr. F. was not yet prepared to risk the happiness and the security of the people of the United States, by such a sublime but hazardous extension of their political system. Nations, like individuals, were, under God, the fabricators of their own fortunes. Of this nation this was undeniably true. We want no power which we cannot acquire, since we desire none but for our own protection. We ask no aid, since we will not invade the rights of others; to defend ours, our own strength is amply sufficient. We are free, independent, and happy, so long as the people are true to themselves. United, combined Europe would be arrayed against them in vain. No man need look beyond our own borders for the means of securing and perpetuating all that is valuable in life and liberty. In the assertion of neutral rights it was but too fashionable to look beyond our own resources; the experience of the late war satisfactorily demonstrated that it was unnecessary. It discovered to us, that aid was not to be found where it was expected; it demonstrated that it was not required. He rejoiced that that contest was commenced and terminated without an ally, and he most heartily thanked the English Government for refusing the proffered mediation of the Emperor of all the Russias. The obligation of that offer would weigh upon his spirit, had not the load been removed by the nonchalance with which the refusal of the other power had been received, and the equivocal treatment experienced by our Ministers from the Court of St. Petersburg. We want no aid and no ally for asserting any of our rights. The experience of the late contest was not less useful to ourselves than to others; it taught them, too, the secret of our power;—trust to its effect; the impression was deep, and the remembrance will be lasting. Mr. F. would not press this inquiry, lest he should be suspected of desiring to produce a wish that Spanish America should remain dependent. All he desired was, by bringing other objects into view, to save the committee from the seducing enthusiasm of the Speaker. If the question of Spanish American independence depended upon our selfish considerations of interest, it never would be achieved. If we were governed by the ordinary policy of nations, we should desire the re-establishment of the Spanish power, since it impeded the progress of our neighbors, and left us undisputed masters of the world of western enterprise. But our policy was as liberal as our institutions. We looked anxiously for the emancipation and improvement of the Spanish Americans, however formidable their competition and dangerous their rivalship. We desired it for their good, and not for our advantage. That the United States had a right to acknowledge any Government, was a political axiom. That it was our duty to recognize the Government of La Plata, remains to be proved. If our interest and our honor require it; if it is demanded by our obligations to that Government, it was a duty. What interest have we in this independence, which should induce us, first among the nations of the earth, to welcome this stranger? Was it commercial? The fact that we had not more than twenty vessels in the commerce of La Plata, and that number diminishing, while the English had more than two hundred, was a proof of the extent of our commercial interest in this region of the world. Separated at a distance so remote, where was the political consideration to demand it from us? There was none. We are asked to do what France did for us. Mr. F. said, the United States had already done more, openly, for La Plata, than France ever did for the United States, prior to her determination to go to war with England. The United States were now in advance of all the nations of the earth, except the Government of Brazil, in kindness to Buenos Ayres. France, prior to the capture of Burgoyne, forbade her subjects to supply us with arms and munitions of war; would not suffer our vessels of war to enter her ports, but, according to the provisions of the Treaty of Utrecht, when driven in by stress of weather, and their stay was limited to the duration of the danger. We openly permit the exportation of every necessary for the use of the people of La Plata. Their vessels enjoy every privilege enjoyed by Spanish vessels, or the armed vessels of any other nation, in our harbors. We wish them success: they know it well; we do not conceal, or affect to conceal, it from Spain. These privileges are denied them by all the powers of Europe, or if granted, are yielded to them in secret by England.

We have proclaimed a strict neutrality; regulated our conduct by the rule of the national law. "In civil wars foreigners are not to interfere in the internal government of an independent State. It belongs not to them to judge between the citizens whom discord has roused to arms, nor between a Prince and his subjects. Both parties are equally foreigners to them, and equally independent of their authority." The circumstance to which the Speaker referred, if correctly stated, is the most certain evidence that our conduct has been consistent with our professions. We have pleased neither party, while more fortunate England has succeeded in pleasing both parties. Honorable neutrality is never grateful or pleasing to either of the belligerents; pretended neutrality and secret assistance is grateful to that power to whom aid is given. England may have been artful enough to persuade Spain that her four hundred thousand pounds was intended for this purpose, while her secret supplies of arms have satisfied the United Provinces that England desired only to promote their success. Our duty cannot require us to do what is useless—what is calculated to confirm a charge made against us, of fomenting the disturbances in Spanish America; a charge to which probable evidence is already afforded by the expeditions of Miranda, of Carrera, of Mina; all of whom sailed from these States to their places of respective destination. It is the duty and the interest of England to stand forth as the protector or first friend of the new Government. She enjoys the fruits of their separation from the parent country; she fomented the quarrel. Then let her take the risk, as she will take the honor and the profits of the recognition of the new power. Mr. F. was at a loss to conjecture why it had not already been done by England, unless she feared the undefined and undefinable obligations of the Holy League, or was content to reap the present profits, reserving to herself the power to secure the future, either by recognizing the new people on favorable conditions, or by restoring them by her mediation to their former master, on conditions equally favorable to her commercial interest.

At what risk, it may be asked, will this recognition be made? At the hazard of a war with Spain. The gentleman from Kentucky says it is not justifiable cause of war. Does he mean in the eye of reason, or in the opinion of nations? In the opinion of nations it certainly is justifiable cause of war; and it is not to be doubted that, were situations reversed, such a recognition of the independence of one of these States of the Union—Louisiana, for example—by Spain, would be instantly followed by war. The Speaker seemed, indeed, to doubt the soundness of this position, as he pressed principally the want of ability in Spain to make war, not the deficiency of just motive for declaring it. That war would follow with England, should Spain venture upon a contest with us, Mr. F. did not believe. She would have the most powerful motives for neutrality. The glorious opportunity of ruining our commerce would be afforded, and would be seized with avidity. The increased expense of shipments in American vessels would throw the whole of our trade into British bottoms, and our flag would be driven from the ocean, except where it floated over our public or private armed ships. Mr. F. would encounter this danger of a war with Spain, with all its consequences, for an adequate motive; but he would not, by hurrying to do an act useless at best, and which might hereafter be performed without hazarding any thing. At all events, he was unwilling to encounter it until La Plata had shown, by indisputable testimony, that she was independent, and had the power and the will to maintain it.

Was there a free Government in La Plata, for whose existence we ought to encounter any hazard? Was there a Government independent of Spain, and which could not be compelled by the power or seduced by the cajolements of Spain to its former vassalage? The character of the Government might be read in the history of its formation, in the changes which preceded it, and in acts since it was established. The disturbances in the Peninsula induced the Viceroy of Buenos Ayres (Cissneros) to call a Junta in May, 1810, composed of the officers of the Royal Government. In April, 1811, a new Government was formed by the inhabitants of the city of Buenos Ayres, having been called together for that purpose by the municipality of the city. This Government—which, like the other, was but a name for a new organization of the regal power—was composed of three members and two secretaries. According to the El Estatuto, one member, exercising the Executive power, was to vacate his seat at the expiration of six months, and his place was to be supplied by election. The deputies of the municipalities of the provinces were to form the electoral college. The first assembly for the election of one of the members of the Executive authority met on the 5th day of April, 1812, and nominated Puerrydon for one member of the Government. They proposed to form a constitution, but were dissolved by the existing authority—Puerrydon deriving no power from this nomination. The second assembly met on the 6th of October, 1813, and elected Medrano; but, pursuing the track of their predecessors, they met a similar fate. The municipality, people of the city, and troops, opposed their measures, and the assembly was dissolved by military force.

A meeting of the inhabitants of Buenos Ayres, Cabildo Abierto, was convened on the 8th day of October, 1812, and the administration was vested in Pena, Passo, and Johnte. Thus perished the first constitution, after existing twelve months, and being violated in all its provisions. In January, 1813, a new assembly met; the Constituyente, composed of deputies, nominated by the electoral colleges of the towns and cities of Rio de La Plata. The chief acts of the new assembly was the change of the title of the Government from Gobierno Superior to Supremo Poder Executivo, and the decree of freedom to the children of slaves. The same decree compelled a sale of every third male slave to be enrolled in the army, the price being a debt due to the owners by the State. In December, 1813, the government of those persons was annulled by the assembly, and Pozados was chosen Supreme Director, to give strength by concentrating the Executive powers. In January, 1815, Pozados having resigned, Alviar was appointed Supreme Director. In April, 1815, there was a new revolution. A meeting of the inhabitants of Buenos Ayres was convened, and the authority of Alviar and the Assembly disowned. The municipality was vested with the supreme command. The municipality formed a junto called De Observacion, by whom a new constitution was published. Rondeau was named Director, but being in military command with the army, Colonel Alvarez, a ringleader in the revolt, was made his substitute. Alvarez convoked a Congress, but before it assembled he was dispossessed by another commotion of the power he held in the absence of Rondeau. Belcora was then appointed Supreme Director, but was soon after removed, and the administration placed in the hands of a committee. The Congress of Tucuman met in 1816, chose Puerrydon Supreme Director, and declared the independence of the Provinces of La Plata on the 3d of July; proposed to publish a manifesto, which was published in 1817, and to form a constitution that has not yet been matured. In this hasty sketch of the events which led to the establishment of the Government as it now existed, it must have occurred to the members of the committee that there was no agency of the people in its organization, except the commotions in the city of Buenos Ayres; they seem to have been the idle spectators of the movements of the constituted authorities and the military. For aught that appeared, the ancient institutions below the head of the Government remained as formerly. Mr. F. would not detail the accusations, trials, executions, and banishments which were the consequences of these changes. That the people were not deeply interested in the successive changes, and did not appear to have derived essential benefits from them, was sufficiently obvious, and all he desired to establish. The conduct of Puerrydon to Carrera, since this declaration of independence, may serve further to illustrate the character of this new power. Carrera was a Chilian, the author of the revolution there; in the decline of his fortune he came to the United States, and after procuring resources for renewed efforts, returned to La Plata to execute his designs; he carried with him the hopes and good wishes of all the friends of freedom in the United States. Unfortunately, he expected assistance from La Plata, and sailed with confidence into her ports. An expedition having been prepared in La Plata against Chili, instead of receiving aid from Carrera, in the deliverance of his country from slavery and oppression, the ostensible motive for this expedition, he was seized, imprisoned, and finally banished; the only satisfaction he received is to be found in that part of Puerrydon's exposé that has been read by the Speaker, in which he deplores the rudeness which he has been compelled to show, so contrary to the politeness and urbanity of his own nature and that of his Government. The motives for this course may be collected from the recent accounts from Chili. A letter of the 7th of October says, "More than eighty persons of the first distinction have been seized and thrown into dungeons by the military, on the ground of attachment to General Carrera, and the treasures of Chili were exhausted by contributions to Buenos Ayres, and the people of Chili are experiencing the benefits of that kind of deliverance from the Royal Spaniards, by O'Higgins and the army of Buenos Ayres, that France has experienced under the Bourbons, supported "by the armies of Wellington and Alexander." The power of Spain had not been exerted against this new Government—not a Spanish soldier or bayonet had been sent from Old Spain since the restoration of Ferdinand. Was the new Government possessed of the physical and moral strength to resist her efforts when they should be made? Gentlemen should not deceive themselves. Spain, inert and powerless as she was, was a formidable power to Spanish America, by the nature of the Government and the superstition of its inhabitants. She had ample resources for the purchase of assistance, should she be driven to this resort. The time had not arrived when the Spanish Monarch asked himself the important question—What part of my dominions will I surrender for the preservation of the rest? When he is willing to make great sacrifices he can procure ample assistance. Those who sold him ships for money will sell him men for territory. His European territories may tempt Russia—his possessions in the West Indies, England—to assist him in the subjugation of his rebellious subjects. He may sell La Plata for Portugal, and the parties to the holy league may guarantee their respective cessions to each other. Shall we find in La Plata the unanimity, energy, and virtue to resist such arrangements, where Province is arrayed against Province, under Puerrydon and Artegas, viewing each other with a hostility more deadly than the proverbially mutual hatred of Spaniard and Portuguese? A still more fatal course may be pursued. The King of Spain may choose to try persuasion, giving to England the promise of free commerce with the Spanish Main; may he not easily procure another mediation, the condition of which shall be the conditional return of La Plata to her dependent state? England knew well how to make such a mediation effectual. Let it not be said her honor forbids it, or her interest. Her interest is promoted by the commercial monopoly such an arrangement will give. Her honor always bows obedient to the dictates of her commercial interest; if she should feel some qualms of conscience, the island of Cuba will calm her scruples. But has she ever promised more than to secure the commercial independence of Spanish America? What a contemptible figure should we make in the eyes of all mankind—how degraded in our opinions—if we should recognize La Plata, and the Government should shortly after voluntarily return to the Spanish yoke! That the committee might not be deceived by the supposed attachment felt by the new Government for the United States—by the profession of an anxious desire to follow our example and imitate our virtue, Mr. F. would mention a few facts, at once illustrating the ardor of their attachment to the United States, and the justice and honor of the Government in its dealings with individuals. The American brig Savage, of Baltimore, sailed to Buenos Ayres with a cargo of military stores; they there sold them to Government, to be delivered in Chili. The voyage was performed; four months elapsed, under various pretences, before the cargo was received, and after this delay the payment was made, not according to contract, but at the discretion of the Government. The owner was thus plundered of his property, and injured by this delay of his plunderers. The ship Enterprise, of Philadelphia, Captain Coffin, was employed, by contract, to carry three hundred exiles from Juan Fernandez to Valparaiso, from whence they had been formerly banished by the royal party. He was to have received $7,200. He performed his contract—restored the exiles to their country and their homes. After a detention of two months, he was paid $2,500—St. Martin, the Washington of America, as he is called, alleging that this was enough.

In the armies of La Plata, English and French officers are employed without scruple; Americans seldom, if ever. Our countrymen do not suit their manners, opinions, or Government. Juett, formerly of the army of the United States, and Kennedy, formerly of the marine corps, sought in Valparaiso, in 1817, commissions in the army of St. Martin. He suspected them of attachment to the Carreras, and threw them into a dungeon, and whence they were not released until the captain of a vessel, who procured their liberation, entered into an engagement to take them immediately from a soil they were deemed unworthy to tread. To judge of the character of the nation from the cruelty and harshness or injustice of an individual, was not reasonable; but when that individual was the theme of universal admiration in his own country, it could not be considered as improper to make him the standard by which to estimate the opinions and character of his countrymen.

Every arrival from this land of promise brings us the history of the oppressions of the existing Government, and the fearful forebodings of our countrymen, that the people for whom our anxious wishes are hourly expressed will derive no benefits from the change of their governors; that the Spanish power will be restored in all its rigor; or that the new authorities will ever be exercised with the same contempt of the principles of justice and of freedom, that distinguished the ancient tyranny. It might be urged that this was newspaper information, derived from persons of doubtful authority. This objection was of the same force, in its application, to all the information possessed of that country. It was of such materials its history was composed. A powerful, an irresistible argument, to induce the committee to refrain from the commission of an act of doubtful propriety, might be drawn from this source; but Mr. F. would not trespass longer upon their patience, exhausted as it must be by attending to the long and animated address of the Speaker, and his own desultory reply.

And the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, March 26.

Spanish American Provinces.

Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana.—I should not have risen to express my opinion on the present occasion, if I had not, at an early period of the session, indicated my intention to do so, whenever a proper opportunity should occur; but for this circumstance, I should have been contented to give a silent vote, for I am well aware, from my more than usual ill health, that there will be nothing in either the manner or the matter of my address to compensate the committee for that attention which their indulgence may induce them to bestow.

I unite with the gentleman from South Carolina in considering the proposition of the Speaker as involving in its decision the views of this House, in respect to the independence of the Government of Rio de la Plata, and as to the expediency of acknowledging it. On both these points my opinions are formed, and I shall give them utterance, without equivocation or hesitation, notwithstanding certain cabalistic words, of great efficacy with old women and men of weak minds, of the use of which the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. LOWNDES) has availed himself. I allude, sir, to his remarks on the danger of war, and the impropriety of casting censure on the conduct of the Executive.

I beg leave to assure the committee that I have no wish to involve the country in war; that I agree in every thing my friend from South Carolina has said as to the inappreciable advantages of peace. I would even go further; I almost think that peace is necessary to the existence of liberty. Rarely indeed does the freedom of nations survive the expensive and bloody contests in which they are too prone to indulge; liberty, morals, prosperity, all depend upon peace; they are too precious to be wantonly hazarded; I would sanction no measure that would endanger them but under the most imperious circumstances. Nothing, too, is further from my intention than to censure the conduct of the Executive; so far from it, I wish to give to the President the strongest proof of my agreeing with him in opinion, by furnishing him with the means of executing his wishes in regard to the people of South America. Has he not told us, sir, that he feels the sincerest sympathy in their behalf, and has he not told us further that they were a people engaged in civil war, and entitled to equal rights with their enemies; and can it be otherwise than gratifying to him, that this House should concur in his views, and enable, nay more, encourage him with the cheering influence of its approbation, to give effect to his benevolent and kind feelings, and to do justice to the revolutionists, by acknowledging their independence, sending them an ambassador, and placing them in that situation of equality which, he says, they are entitled to enjoy? Sir, it cannot be otherwise than agreeable to the President to know the opinion of Congress on so momentous a subject; if that opinion, independently expressed, shall concur with his own, he will act conformably to it; on the other hand, if, from the position he occupies in the Government, from his better information, or from any other circumstances, unknown to the public, he shall think it best to continue, unchanged, the state of our relations with South America, he will do so. For one I shall not object, if he does but exercise his right to judge and decide for himself; and I am too much in the habit of pursuing my own opinion to blame others, whether in public or private stations, for exhibiting a like independence.

But the gentleman from South Carolina seems to contend that it is the exclusive right of the Executive to manage our foreign relations; that he is better informed on these subjects, and that this House ought not to interfere so far as to suggest an opinion or a wish, unless it is meant to be understood that strong disapprobation is felt towards the course which has been pursued. I think, too, it may be inferred from the remarks of the gentleman, that the President is not only better informed on all questions of this kind than Congress or the nation, but that it is right and proper that he should keep his information to himself, and not part with it too freely or too frequently. Now, I dissent from all such doctrine; I look upon it to be the duty of Congress to express its opinion freely upon all questions which concern our domestic or foreign affairs, and I consider it as the solemn duty of the Chief Magistrate of a popular Government to disseminate among the people all information that can instruct them on points so important as their situation in regard to other Governments.

I would ask, sir, how else can the wise measures of a virtuous administration receive rational approbation, or how a vicious Government be arrested in its mad career? Shall it be justified in managing in secret the whole interests of the public, in plunging into war after a long concatenation of events, which, if known, might have been prevented, or in allowing the nation to repose in security, when, from its own acts, or those of other Governments, it stands on the brink of a precipice? Ought there not rather, in such a Government as ours, to be the most unreserved and frank communication of facts, of whatever kind they may be? Ought there not to be felt and evidenced, towards the people, the most entire and unaffected confidence? Will the people long continue to confide in those who manifest distrust, by covering their proceedings, whether of an external or internal nature, with a veil of mystery and secrecy?

I cannot approve of the observations of the gentleman from South Carolina, and I do hope that the present Administration will act on no such principles. In the examination of the present subject, I shall not indulge myself in so wide a range as some of the gentlemen who have preceded me. I will endeavor to show that the Government of Rio de la Plata is independent, and that it is expedient to acknowledge that independence. To establish the fact of its independence, let us inquire whether it has declared itself independent? Of this there is no doubt; this fact is not disputed by any one. I state it thus specifically, because it is far from being itself an unimportant circumstance. In our own case it was not so considered. In the language of one historian, Ramsey, after that event "we no longer appeared in the character of subjects in arms against their sovereign, but as an independent people, repelling the attacks of an invading foe." And Marshall says, "we changed our situation by the Declaration of Independence, and were no longer considered as subjects in rebellion." From that time, too, we date our actual independence. It has not been permitted to be deferred till its acknowledgment by other nations, nor until the peace; and so has the fact been established, as well by political as judicial decisions, both in England and in the United States. Buenos Ayres remained faithful to Spain under circumstances extremely favorable to her throwing off the yoke. When the Peninsula was overrun by a foreign army and torn by domestic faction, the people of Buenos Ayres submitted to be governed as a colony; they were willing to continue their former connection, while the Government was in the hands of Charles, or Ferdinand, or Juntas, having the semblance of power; but, when the whole of the Peninsula, except Cadiz, fell into the possession of France, they declared themselves independent; this was done by the Viceroy Cissneros. But the final and great act of 1816 flowed from the people; they then declared themselves independent of Spain and the Bourbons; established a Government for themselves, and have ever since enjoyed the most perfect exemption from every thing like foreign control. They now appoint their own Executive Magistrate, their legislators, their judges, lay taxes, raise armies, and build navies, with which they not only secure their own independence, but diffuse that blessing over the neighboring Governments of Chili and Peru. They are more independent than we were at any one moment previously to the peace of 1783. Their soil is free from the pollution of a foreign hostile foot; and, if it be said that they have their factions, so had we ours. We had, in addition to our foreign foes, our tories and domestic traitors. But it is objected that the provinces are not all united under one Government, and that Artigas is in possession of the province of Montevideo. But the possession of Artigas is not the possession of Ferdinand; the whole of the Banda Oriental is as free from his authority as Buenos Ayres itself; and the sole question at present is as to the independence of Rio de la Plata of its former European master. The freedom of Venezuela, New Grenada, and Mexico, is, unhappily, less assured; but they, too, have declared themselves absolved from the tyrant's yoke. Many years ago the Executive of the United States laid before this House the constitution of Venezuela, and a resolution was adopted by the committee to whom it was referred, declaratory of the interest this House felt in their success, and promising to recognize them as independent when they should take a stand among the nations of the world. In regard to Buenos Ayres, that happy period has arrived; and it becomes us to realize the hopes to which our promises have given rise. The fate of New Grenada has been various; it has sometimes enjoyed self-government, and has been again subject to the temporary control of the usurpers of its rights. The gentleman from Georgia tells us that Mexico has been preserved to the royal cause by its own native population; that it has not been found necessary to send over foreign troops to secure its allegiance to its sovereign. But the gentleman forgot to inform us that Mexico has been always filled with European troops, and that the number already there rendered any augmentation unnecessary. But for the Europeans in Mexico, a dissolution of its connection with Spain would long ago have taken place.

But, sir, for what purpose has the gentleman from Georgia dwelt so long and so earnestly on the motives of the people of South America for declaring themselves independent, and on the manner in which the struggle has been conducted? The only question is, whether they are or are not independent. But the gentleman is as mistaken in his views on these subjects, as it is unkind in him, professing, as he does, to wish success to their cause, to pass their conduct, distorted as it is, in review before us, when nothing renders such investigation necessary. The gentleman says that their revolution did not begin on principles favorable to individual liberty; but I would ask, sir, what revolution ever did? What revolution ever stopped at the point to reach which it commenced? What revolution, at its origin, ever advanced the principles on which, in its progress, it was conducted? What revolution ever terminated where the particular grievances were removed which gave it birth? A candid examination of our own history will sufficiently elucidate these views. We did not commence our contest with the mother country with any avowal, whatever might have been the intention of the intelligent and virtuous, of a wish to throw off colonial subjection; far from it; our professions of attachment and fidelity to the monarch were never before so frequent nor so strong. We complained of trifling grievances: proceeded cautiously to remonstrances, then to resistance; declared ourselves, after a lapse of some years, independent, and ultimately overturned the entire fabric of that Government, which, in the beginning, we so often praised, and merely affected to disapprove in some comparatively immaterial points. So the South American patriots act cautiously in regard to their former masters; profess, for a convenient time, entire devotion to their will, and take advantage of circumstances to effect the liberation of their country. But I acknowledge that individual freedom does not seem to be with their leaders a subject of sufficient concern, and perhaps on this point it is no more difficult to excuse them than on that connected with their national independence. Let it be kept in view that they have two great objects to attain—the one, obnoxious to Spain, their national independence—the other, hateful to all Governments except our own, individual liberty. As they, in common with all revolutionists, have found it necessary to mask their designs on the first point, so may it be politic in them to be as silent as possible in regard to the other. Where, throughout this enslaved world, are they to look for countenance or support, if they should dare to announce too openly their attachment to democratic forms of government? Will the combined despots of Europe smile upon their efforts? Can they look across the Atlantic for the cheering influence of approbation, when even here, in this Republic, they meet with cold indifference? Do they not perceive that the nations of Europe, although friendly to their independence, are hostile to their freedom? And may not this account, if it be true indeed, for the carelessness exhibited by them, according to the gentleman from Georgia, on the subject of individual rights?

Mr. Chairman, the combined despots of Europe cannot, as formerly, indulge themselves in the royal sport of arms; they cannot wage wars of amusement or ambition; they are sufficiently employed in keeping their own subjects in subordination. Admirable as their Governments may be, something like coercion seems necessary to impress that opinion on the minds of their people. The armies of Europe are not now intended to guard against, or to make foreign conquests; they are to keep their inhabitants in slavery, and the kings on their thrones; three millions of soldiers in arms are all necessary for that purpose; they have no occasion to look abroad for employment; they need not come across the Atlantic. Sir, the impulse given to the human character by the American and French Revolutions still survives; the principles of despotism and superstition are dead—they do not suit the age; they may be sustained a little longer by the force of bayonets, but the love of liberty lives in the heart, will again before long have utterance, and ultimately succeed and triumph. Blind, indeed, must that man be, who does not see in the large standing armies of the Governments of Europe, the fear—the just fear—in which they stand of those whom they rule and oppress. Sir, we may manage our own affairs in our own way, without the fear of kings before our eyes. They have enough to do to keep things in order at home; their vigilance is more and more necessary every day; if they relax, they are hurled from their usurped dominion. I rejoice in this state of terror and alarm, and I most seriously wish that many years may not pass away before sufficient proof may be given that their fears are not unfounded and visionary.

But, sir, admitting, as is, on the main, generally admitted, that war would not be the consequence of sending a Minister to Buenos Ayres, yet it is contended that we have no interest, commercial or political, in their independence —indeed, it is pretended that it would be better for us, that they should continue in a state of colonial subjection. Sir, I feel an aversion seriously to combat so vile a proposition. I cannot believe that the happiness of others is incompatible with our own—such a principle does not enter into the great scheme of nature —it is the pitiful emanation of counting-house calculation, and is as untrue, as it is unworthy of any thing but contempt. Sir, the independence of South America is the common cause of all commercial powers—for the question is, whether its trade, by the subversion of its independence, will be again monopolized by Spain; or, by the establishment of it, laid open on equal terms to all the world; whether it is our interest to participate in the commerce of the colonial possessions of Spain, amounting in exports and imports to two hundred millions of dollars, or to be excluded from it entirely. This is the view of the subject; for it must not be forgotten that a return of these countries to the state of colonies, brings along with it the concomitant effects of the monopoly enjoyed by the Metropolitan Government. The commerce which we now enjoy would be lost to us; and when we take into consideration the number of our vessels already engaged in trade with the Atlantic ports, as well as those with, and without licenses, interchanging their cargoes with those on the Pacific, we cannot even now doubt of its importance. Our navigation would be benefited by carrying for them a portion of their valuable productions to Europe, and returning to them the manufactures of that quarter of the world in exchange. In carrying our productions too, wherever we might obtain the means of purchasing commodities suited to their markets, our manufactures, too, if we become a manufacturing people, will then find additional demand; and I believe it may be also established, that our agriculture would receive essential benefit. It may be fairly assumed, that the price of the raw material will be enhanced in the proportion of the demand for the manufactured article; and the demand for the manufactured article depends upon the number, the wants, and the wealth of the consumers. Who can, then, deny that these facts depend materially upon the independence of South America? Independence will bestow upon the people every blessing—it will add to their numbers, to their industry, to their wealth, to their disposition and their ability to consume commodities, many of which will be manufactured from our raw materials—thus giving encouragement to agriculture; and, being conveyed to them by our vessels, adding to the prospects of commerce, and the prosperity of navigation. An estimate of the value of a free commerce ought not to be made from the present situation of this interesting and unfortunate people, depressed and poor, from the combined effects of superstition and despotism, habituated to privations, and ignorant of the importance of the world to them, or of themselves to the world. Their present value in the scale of nations is comparatively inconsiderable, yet their imports and exports exceed our own, and, when we reflect, under the colonial system, on the necessarily enormous price of imports purchased exclusively from Spain; or, if obtained in any other country, burdened and clogged with heavy duties, payable into the King's treasury, we may arrive at something like just conclusions. When looking into futurity, we find millions of slaves converted into freemen—their industry, their wealth, and their wants increased, the products of their labor augmenting in value, and the articles of their consumption diminishing in price. But I do not consider the direct pecuniary advantages to our country, however great and certain they may be, as of so much importance as the political and moral effects growing out of a liberal and manly policy towards that people. It will have a tendency to give us confidence in the firmness and virtue of Government—it will prove that it is not forgetful of the high character which belongs to us as a powerful and free people—that the reputation we have acquired, at the expense of so much blood and treasure, is not to be sacrificed by timidity, or an undue spirit of accommodation towards the monarchs of Europe—that we will do what our principles require, in spite of imaginary terrors, artfully excited by the enemies of freedom—in fine, that, cautious of giving just cause of offence, we will pursue the path of fidelity and honor, in defiance of the views and wishes of those whose political institutions make them necessarily hostile to human happiness and human rights—that we dare at least do, what we are sustained in by right and truth, in favor of the liberties of mankind, without being deterred by those who promote, with unhallowed violence, at the expense of every sacred obligation, the dogmas of priestcraft, and the doctrines of despotism. And if we are asked by the officious and intermeddling representatives of kings, why it is that we not only feel, but manifest sympathy for a people struggling to be free, let us refer them to their own unholy combinations, in support of the execrable principles of their Government—let us tell them of their wars for thirty years past against liberty—that if the safety of monarchies in Europe depends on the annihilation of republics, the security of a republic in America will not be injured by other republics growing up by its side; and that, if they have presumptuously broken down, by force, whatever stood in the way of the establishment of tyranny, we may at least hope to be forgiven for going so far as to assert an abstract proposition in favor of freedom; for, sending or receiving a Minister from La Plata, is no more.

Mr. FLOYD, of Virginia, rose, for the purpose of offering his view of this interesting subject, to the consideration of the committee, in support of the amendment proposed by the honorable Speaker; and said, as he knew the House must be weary at this late hour of the day, the only apology he could make was, that he would not detain them long. I am, said he, strongly impressed with a belief that an appropriation of this kind would well comport with the disinterested views of this Government, and would enable the President at any time to do justice to this Republic, which has achieved an object so glorious to itself, and of such signal benefit to mankind. The present is a favorable moment, when our affairs are prosperous and quiet—the world calm, and no political ebullitions to distract us. This would be the safe course—the dignified course—dictated by the true policy of the United States, and one calculated to free them from the odious doubts and suspicions of partiality which have been cast upon them, and would place their conduct in a high point of view, both for magnanimity and justice.

The spectacle presented to our view is sublime and wonderful; a brave people, disdaining the shackles of a foreign despot, wading through rivers of blood to erect their constitution upon a firm basis, which will secure to them the enjoyment of personal liberty, and give them a stand among the nations of the earth, as free and independent. Through the storms of revolution, their institutions have been purified. Warring now to maintain their freedom, they appealed to this nation for justice, and ought to have demanded our attention. This nation, free as air, cannot envy the enjoyment of the world besides, will bestow a part of its deliberations upon that appeal; nor now refuse to listen to the dictates of justice, of policy, or to the cries of suffering humanity, in adopting this amendment; that the appropriation may be made; that justice be dealt out with an even hand—as I should be sorry to believe the United States could at any time so far forget the great principles of equal rights, equal liberty, and equal law, as to give the smallest grounds for complaint to any nation, and surely the situation of these people entitles them to this appellation.

The civil dissensions which for some time so convulsed the Spanish monarchy, have at length assumed a determinate shape, and war is now no longer the war of revolution, or a civil war, but the efforts of contending Governments. This young Republic, powerful in its resources, recovering with renewed vigor from every disaster, believes herself justified by the law of nations, in demanding a recognition of her rights as a free and independent nation.

Spain, bloated with pride, inherited through a long line of ancestors, is incapable of imitating the noble and magnanimous conduct of Great Britain, who, after seven years of war with us, came forward as Great Britain ought to have done, and acknowledged our independence. Yet that Monarch, who boasts the sun never sets upon his dominion, parts with reluctance from the smallest piece of soil, and wars by withholding his assent to independence, when hostilities have ceased, through inability to prosecute them. Miserable as she is, without resources, without finances, bankrupt at home, that monarchy still lingers, like the gamester, upon the delusive hope that a fortuitous concurrence of circumstances may again bring under her dominion half a revolted world.

And now we are told by the honorable chairman of the Committee of Foreign Affairs, (Mr. FORSYTH,) that he is unwilling to make the recognition, because it will interfere with our dispute with Spain. Surely that ought not to weigh with him from whom, recollecting his declaration a few days ago on this floor, it is expected some strong measure will be proposed with regard to Spain. Is it a declaration of war? then why should he oppose this recognition? Is it a proposition to take possession of Florida? Why in that case should he oppose it? rather ought it to be a cogent reason for adopting this measure. Yet, inadequate as Spain is, to a task so unequal as that of reducing a Government fully organized since their revolution, and exercising the rights of sovereignty for years, building fleets, raising and equipping armies, and marching them to distant provinces to finish there a work which themselves had consummated—notwithstanding these strong and decided proofs of independence, exhibited in the fullest powers of government, unmolested by hostile troops within their territory, still we hear of Europe; as if, to measure justice, we should consult the frowns or smiles of another continent!

From some cause or other, lively apprehensions have arisen in the mind of the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, (Mr. LOWNDES,) that an acknowledgment of this kind migh involve us in national difficulties. Can he, of all others, who is so well acquainted with laws of nations, hint this result of an acknowledgment, admitted by all the writers on that law, to be no cause of war? Whilst I would, with the most scrupulous care and exactness, avoid what might endanger the tranquillity of my country, I would likewise avoid whatever might give a pang to this budding Republic; and if to pursue the right, and administer strict impartiality and justice, cannot secure to this nation her amicable relations undisturbed, it would be madness or folly in the extreme, to believe any course free from the dangerous tempests which as often arise from mistaken policy as conflicting interests. I am sorry that gentleman (Mr. LOWNDES) has insinuated that the proposed measures was in hostility to the Executive; it is to be lamented that any such opinion should have escaped him; from his usual benevolence it was not expected, and if any thing has been contemplated of that kind, he might have spared those who advocate the measure from honest convictions. But against any such motive for myself I utterly protest, nor do I believe any such motive to have actuated the honorable mover of the proposition. I have been impelled by the convictions of my own mind, and, whilst ever I have the honor of a seat in this House, such only will govern me.

In this fear of giving offence, and this zeal to convince the nations of Europe of the rectitude of our intentions, are we not bound to take care of the interests of America, that she should not complain? As she has already been considered, and that too by high authority, as engaged in civil war, a situation in which all know, that in justice each party is entitled to equal rights and respect; and, as seems manifest, warring to maintain an independence which she has already wrested from the iron grasp of oppression, and ought to be regarded by the world as the germ of general emancipation. Clear as these facts seem to be, we are told, with a doubtful inquiring look, as if listening for danger, that we are observed by Europe, and that we should not excite their jealousy or distrust, as if the justice of nations was the result of fear; I know, too, there are many excellent men whose feelings are enlisted for these brave patriots, struggling against a power which still annoys them, who pause in their decision because this Hydra Europe is constantly presented to their view. Sir, it will be a black and sorrowful day to this Republic, when this imaginary course of Europe is to be held over its deliberation like a lash of scorpions to goad it on to any thing, or stop it in its course. Can that alarm the nations of Europe which is bottomed upon the law of nations, since they have been so lately engaged in apportioning that plundered continent without consulting our jealousies or our fears? For my own part I cannot imagine such fears—radically inimical as I am to an interest which of late had nearly involved us in ruinous difficulties; I have too high an opinion of the quick sagacity of the British cabinet, not to believe they would discern their own unequivocal interest in doing this act of justice. The fears of Europe! What can the petty States of Italy fear from our acknowledging the independence of the Republic of La Plata? These wretched Governments, enveloped in the legitimate fogs of Europe, are unseen in the scale of nations. What can Russia fear? Surely none can be so politically bewildered, as to believe she can fear any thing; she has her views nearer home; with a boundless extent of territory, comprising one-twenty-eighth part of the whole surface of this huge globe—a population so vast as to overturn, like a resistless torrent, every thing which opposes it; still anxious to extend her dominions to the south, and acquire territory on the Mediterranean; she will before long give employment to her neighbor there, and it were well for the powers of Europe to look to their own safety in time. Could England view a measure of this kind with jealousy or suspicion, when at this very instant efforts are making throughout Europe, not loud, but deep and dangerous, to exclude from their markets every species of her manufactures? Witness the conduct of France, Holland, Sweden, Russia, and other powers, as it regards the cotton manufactures. Witness the large private associations in these countries, binding themselves by the solemn obligation of an oath, to use their every effort to exclude from their country the use of British fabrics of every description. This, sir, is a continental system more terrible to England, or soon will be, than all the colossal power of the Great Napoleon, enforcing the same object. Is it not rather her true interest to support this infant power, even with arms, where she will find a tenfold market for her merchandise, unrivalled, and increasing perhaps for one hundred years? These then are the only powers which have any concern in these events. The rest of Europe is a mere mockery upon the independence of nations. Germany and Sweden, with her Bernadotte, any thing Russia pleases, and Prussia almost an appendage—Holland and Portugal at the disposal of England; and Spain, reposing in the embroidered arms of the adored Ferdinand, dissolving by a political hectic, unpitied by the world; and France, lately the gaze of admiring millions, guided by the overwhelming genius of her Emperor, is now little else than the great garrison of Europe, with a pageant King in splendid misery in the midst of it.

But Russia, true to her own interest, has not been inattentive to the great events which have been evolving themselves in South America; her attempt to acquire territory on the Gulf of California, and even, if the news be true, upon our very borders, is a proof of this; she is willing to acquire territory by every change, and every event, for territory has been the hereditary mania of her monarchs. Unwilling to commence hostilities at all times, disappointment only results in new efforts on new objects, at distant and different points, which must eventuate, if permitted by the powers of Europe silently to progress, in her controlling the commerce of the world. England, actuated by different motives, has approved, by her conduct, and fostered those brilliant successes, by which the patriots of South America have raised to fame a column of glory so bright, as to shed a blaze of renown over half the world, and has embalmed forever the name of her heroes.

What have we done? The honorable chairman of the Committee of Foreign Affairs (Mr. FORSYTH) tells us that the patriots captured a vessel belonging to a citizen of the United States, and refused others employment in their service; that the only sympathy felt is felt by us; that the sympathy is all on our side. Then, sir, I must say they are languid indeed! for instead of those vivid sympathies which should have watered with our tears the rosy bed of immortality, on which sleep many of the heroic defenders of that Republic, we passed an act, like a one-eyed warder upon the watchtower, who sees only on one side, and calls out "all is well," whilst danger and ruin nearly approaches on the other. Sir, if our apprehensions prevent us from doing them justice, let them not induce us to do injustice; let us not impede their high destinies by a law which operates unequally, since that wonderful wisdom which willed the destiny of empires, hath willed it so, for the happiness of America and the safety of Europe; else if Spain, a few little years ago, had seen on her throne a monarch such as he who now sways the ponderous sceptre of Russia—a man whose talents and sagacity were equal to the population, the wealth, and the extent of her dominions—the crash of falling thrones would have resounded throughout Europe, and their legitimacy, instead of a protocol, would have been thundered from her cannon's mouth. If, Mr. Chairman, the United States shall turn from this question, other nations will not; England, more generous than we, will do them justice, and reap the fruits of their grateful benedictions. These colonies, for a long time settled for the purposes of commerce, had no political existence, or any part in the great agitations of the world—too distant from the mother country to feel any thing of national prejudices or predilections, they have become a new people, under the influence of a different climate, where the productions, the scenery, the physical conformation of the country, and even the very sky and the stars of heaven are so different, that nothing of the Spaniard is left but the name, and that now no more.

In vain has the fond remembrance of their forefathers endeavored to cherish the recollections of their youth, by giving to the hills, the valleys, the rivers, and mountains, of their adopted country, the names of the places of their childhood. These names no longer produce a forceful feeling; the heart has ceased to vibrate at the sound; the meaning unknown to the present generation. Under this different climate, new habits, new wants have been generated, national remembrances have been obliterated; all is new, all is changed.

Heretofore the young American, accustomed to hear his country contemned and despised, had no incentive to action. He had been told that in America all was degeneracy, all was savage, barbarous ignorance; and grave philosophers and naturalists have written books to prove the fact. Notwithstanding, he was prohibited from going to the mother country to enlighten his mind by an education, and by their inexorable laws forbidden to go even from one province to another. Thus, like a vegetable fastened to the soil, was he doomed to live, to die, and disappear forever, not even leaving a trace of his ever having existed.

Unable to govern himself, all officers of the Government, of every rank and condition, have been sent to him from Europe, to administer justice to him in his peaceable repose; but, sir, at the very sight of those officers they turned pale, and trembled at the sound of Spanish justice.

Thus have they lingered on, a listless life of acquiescence and patient resignation, for three hundred years, until this bright beam of liberty broke through the dark cloud of royalty, which had nearly overshadowed them for ever; but which, I trust, will light them to peace and to happiness as it has to independence.

If there are any doubts about their independence, from the circumstance of a part of Chili being still occupied by the royal forces, and a force of native Americans under Artigas opposed to the Republic, as stated by the gentleman from Georgia, let those doubts be dissipated when it is remembered, that, late in our own Revolutionary war, when the chances in the minds of many good men nearly poised between independence and subjugation, the celebrated battle of King's Mountain was fought between Whigs and Tories—a battle which has crowned the names of Campbell and Shelby with immortal glory—a battle which measurably decided the fate of this Republic—nor let us longer doubt, when we reflect, that, by nature, every man in America is a General for enterprises like these.

American wiles and stratagems, quick advance, attack, and fight, insure success; the slow and expensive formalities of European warfare, defeat.

These unfortunate people, sunk in despotism, have borne the contumely of all nations for their Spanish gravity, jealousy, and suspicion; but had even this been examined with indulgent kindness, it would have been found to be the mark which distinguished the slave of every country. This national gloom stamps itself upon the face of every Spaniard as soon as he is capable, from his own reflections, to distinguish that the tyranny of his Government, haunted continually by the phantoms of the imagination, has environed him with racks, and tortures, and the inquisition, where a living death of sufferance awaits more terrible than all. He dare not speak—he knows not but that every one who hears him is a spy upon his conduct—silence is his only retreat—his liberty, his property, at the disposal of any clandestine informer—his life, his reputation, his honor, at the disposal of an implacable priest, who knows no mercy or forgiveness. Well might they exclaim, with a rapturous fervor, Oh! for a revolution—it were celestial happiness compared with this!

If, in the commencement of this conflict, many bloody and revengeful acts have been committed, the noble spirits who direct the revolution cannot be implicated, or their cause condemned, nor ought it in justice to be used as an argument against them. The horrors of our own Revolution afford us proof of this, where the father and the son have been armed against each other—where cold-blooded murders have been perpetrated, butcheries and indiscriminate massacres of men, women, and children, because they were Whigs, or because they were Tories. These things, it is true, happened only in certain sections of the country, but they did take place; we have heard but little of them; the English historians seem disposed to cast a veil over them, and the American at this time is not disposed to tear it aside; then, in such a state of things, can we wonder if, in the fury of contending armies, these generous patriots should have left unpunished crimes, which, in other times, their gentler natures would have wept at with tears of the bitterest sorrow? These things should not be attributed to them, but to their true source. Attribute them to that frenzied power which sees nothing but the bloody dagger before it, and drives the most unresisting temper to madness and despair. The South Americans are now free, and long may the blessings of a republic attend them; for I am happy in being one of those who believe the liberties of a republic can be enjoyed by a Spaniard, or by any body; the enjoyment of freedom is not peculiar to any nation; all will admit that the Greeks once had it; the Romans, the Dutch, and many others, as dissimilar in their national character as the English and the French. Consult the annals of the world, and I believe it will be found, that, wherever men are capable of making an effort to obtain their freedom, they are capable of enjoying it. Then why not have the benevolence to allow these brave patriots at least a capacity for freedom, since they have given so strong a proof of it as to establish their Government through revolution and maintain it in war?

If, Mr. Chairman, the law of nations is to be regarded by a just people; if the political whirlwinds which, for some time back, so desolated the civilized world, has left them any thing but a wreck, or the hopeless resort of the weak and the impotent, I would say, that, whenever a contest became doubtful between contending powers, without any regard whatever to the manner, cause, or origin of that contest, the world at large has a right to consider them equal, and even decide between them, if necessary, and is bound to extend to the one all the other had a right to expect. The case of James II., King of England, is a clear illustration of this position, and is acknowledged by all the writers on the law of nations as correct; and if a case more strong were necessary, as being a parallel in all respects to the present, I would cite that of the revolt of the Low Countries against Philip II., King of Spain, of "exterminating" memory, already spoken of by others, but with different impressions. Their independence, they declared, was acknowledged by Queen Elizabeth, of England, the wisdom, moderation, and justice of whose government, is celebrated and acknowledged by all, even at this distant day, and places her among the most illustrious monarchs of the world. Philip remonstrated; her answer was—the law of nations gave her the right, and her interest prompted her to acknowledge their independence. Philip was content; nor did he even require his Ambassador to leave London. And is not England now precisely situated as she was then—the same necessity, nay, stronger inducements of interest? And will the present monarch, instructed by history, be less wise?

An honorable gentleman from Maryland (Mr. SMITH) has told us that the trade of the United States would receive no benefit from that country. He has told us that the article of wheat has been brought from Chili round to Brazil, or the West Indies, and sold at a lower rate than it could be taken from the United States. I would ask what the price of wheat has to do with the acknowledgment of the independence of those Republics? The inquiry has, too, been made with an air of triumph, what the United States would gain by an acknowledgment of this kind? I will not retort the question by asking what we could possibly lose by the acknowledgment; but I would ask, if it is a thing they, by the law of nations, have a right to give, without doing injustice to Spain, or any power whatever, why not grant the request?

But, sir, I contend that the United States would gain, and gain essentially, too. Certainly nothing could be more desirable to this nation, so full of enterprise, than a free and direct trade to these countries, the most luxuriant and extensive in the world; so rich in every thing we want, and containing such inexhaustible abundance of the precious metals, and needing many things we have to spare. There is the strongest probability that our exports, instead of sixty or seventy millions, would be increased very many millions, and would be much benefited, were it only from the advantages of our contiguous situation. Nor can I perceive the force of the remarks of the honorable member from South Carolina, (Mr. LOWNDES,) luminous as he is on all subjects, when he tells us that injury will result to us, as our trade to that country, when compared with the trade of Great Britain to the same place, is according to the little book from Philadelphia, in the ratio of one hundred thousand to seven millions. Surely, if we cannot receive all or most of the benefit, it cannot be a reason why we should not receive some benefit.

But the grand object and advantage would be in systematizing a policy for America; that we might be disenthralled—that we might not feel the effects of that political plexus which has so entangled the nations of Europe, by producing those intimate connections and combinations by which the movements and operations of one power are so felt by all, as to influence their councils, and produce corresponding motions. When now we negotiate, it is in Europe; when we are inconvenienced here, we send off an Ambassador there; they are governed by the principles and policy of continental Europe, and not by any thing here. Do difficulties arise in Canada, they are adjusted in London. Do the same difficulties arise in Mexico, the province of Texas, or in Florida, it is settled in Madrid. Thus are we compelled to negotiate all our affairs upon the basis of European policy, because even the best interests of the colonists must give way to the policy of the mother country.

But when the independence of the South Americans shall be acknowledged, and they take their stand among the great nations of the earth, there will then be an American policy, and a European policy, which may, in negotiation upon just and honorable principles, be fairly opposed to each other. Nor does it militate against this position, whether, in the end, these Governments shall be imperial or royal, instead of republican, which they now are. The great interests of America will be the same; and if, unhappily, difficulties should arise exclusively on this side the ocean, there will be no European convenience to consult, delay, or obstruct their adjustment in terms of complete reciprocity.

FRIDAY, March 27.

Spanish American Provinces.

The House having resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the general appropriation bill—to which an amendment had been moved by Mr. CLAY to introduce an appropriation for the outfit of a Minister to Buenos Ayres—

Mr. A. SMYTH, of Virginia, said, that he was opposed to the proposition under consideration, and should contend, in the first place, that the measure proposed is an act of usurpation, an invasion of the Executive authority. Secondly, he would contend, that the conduct of the Executive branch of the Government, as respected Spain and her American provinces, has been perfectly impartial and honorable, and such as was required by the interest and honor of the United States; that, therefore, no interference on our part was necessary. And, thirdly, he would contend that the measure proposed was pregnant with evil, and may jeopardize the safety of the United States.

The constitution, said Mr. S., grants to the President, by and with the consent of the Senate, power to appoint Ambassadors and public Ministers, and to make treaties. According to the usage of the Government, it is the President who receives all foreign Ministers, and determines what foreign Ministers shall or shall not be received. It is by the exercise of some one of these powers, in neither of which has this House any participation, that a foreign power must be acknowledged. Then the acknowledgment of the independence of a new power is an exercise of Executive authority; consequently, for Congress to direct the Executive how he shall exercise this power, is an act of usurpation.

To give such direction must be an act of usurpation, if it shall have any effect. Should the direction be given, by adopting the proposition under consideration, and have effect, then the President will send a Minister to Buenos Ayres, not according to his own opinion, but according to the opinion of Congress. Then the President will perform his proper constitutional duties as Congress shall be pleased to direct. Will not this be changing the constitution, by usurpation? It is for the Executive branch of the Government to decide to whom, and when, a public Minister shall be sent. Congress undertake to decide when and to whom a public Minister shall be sent; is not this usurpation?

You possess the power of impeachment, and, consequently, may discuss, and, by resolution, express, an opinion on any past act, either of the Executive or of the Judiciary; but you have no right to give a direction to either.

The President is responsible for the proper execution of his constitutional powers; he may be punished for abusing them, or for neglect of his duty. This House is the proper body to prosecute him, if he shall fail to do his duty. We are not, in like manner, responsible and punishable. If we direct the President to do an act, however injurious to the nation it may prove, we cannot make him responsible. Is it proper thus to deprive the people of the security which they have reserved to themselves, in the President's constitutional responsibility?

The President is re-eligible at the end of four years; it is, therefore, fair that he should be left free to execute his constitutional powers; that the people may be enabled to judge the manner in which he has executed them. If you undertake to direct the President in the performance of his duties, you deprive him of the merit of those acts which the people might approve. Let it be supposed that the President intends to do the act which it is proposed that we shall direct him to do, and that the act is one which deserves, and will receive, the approbation of the people. If you shall direct him to do the act, his performance of it will be ascribed to your direction, and all the credit due to the act will be given to you, and withheld from the President. On the contrary, should the President disapprove of the proposed measure, resist the usurpation, and maintain his constitutional rights, the consequence must be, that either the President or Congress must sink in the estimation of the people.

By adopting the proposition under consideration, you will pronounce to the world, that the President will not voluntarily do his duty; and that it has become necessary that you, by directing, should compel him. You certainly intend that your direction shall have effect, and it can have no effect, unless it compels the President to do an act which otherwise he would not have done. You do not intend merely to place Congress in collision with the President; to raise an opposition to him, in case he shall have firmness enough to maintain his constitutional rights, and to act according to his own views of the interests of the United States.

The people have, by the constitution, distributed distinct powers to the several departments of the Government: the Executive power they have confided to the President, either alone, or by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; they have adopted a particular mode of electing the President, intended to secure to the office of Chief Magistrate the greatest wisdom, knowledge, patriotism, and integrity. They have a right to the free and voluntary services of the citizen whom they have selected, as possessing those qualities, to fill the Presidential Chair; a right to all the advantages to be derived from his talents and his information. And at no time has the Executive department of this Government more deserved the public confidence than at present. At no moment since the formation of the constitution, did the Cabinet possess, in so great a degree, the qualities which a Cabinet ought to possess, viz: talents, knowledge, political information, and harmony.

Yet, at the very moment when the President has his agents in those countries, which claim to be admitted to the rank of nations, for the purpose of ascertaining their true situation, and to discover what order of things will probably be ultimately established, it is proposed that you shall prematurely interfere, and that, before the desirable information has been obtained in such a mode as may be relied on, you shall, on such information as the Speaker (Mr. CLAY) has gleaned from newspapers and pamphlets, direct the President to send a Minister to Buenos Ayres. Should your interference be at any time expedient, certainly this is the most improper time to interfere. The want of information on this subject has been fully shown by this discussion. No one will pretend that the members of this House generally are well informed concerning the actual and political state of the Spanish provinces, and the contradictory nature of the information given to the committee, by those members who have taken pains to procure information, proves that we have none that is worthy of being relied on.

It is by the President only that the United States communicate, negotiate, and treat, with foreign nations. To them, as has been properly observed by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. LOWNDES,) we should present a single front. The measure proposed seems, in itself, of little importance; but it will be understood by the speeches of the honorable mover, and others by whom it is supported. Thus understood, the proposition goes to degrade your President in the eyes of foreign nations. If Congress shall assume power to direct the President, this House becomes the efficient Executive. Who would be President on such conditions?

I proceed to show that the conduct of the Executive, as relates to Spain and the provinces, has been impartial, honorable, and such as comported with the true interest of the United States.

The honorable Speaker has been pleased to say, that the conduct of the Executive towards Spain and the provinces was calculated to irritate both parties, and conciliate neither. This brings to our recollection what he said on a former occasion—that the acts of the Executive had been all on one side, and bearing entirely against the colonists. This charge, which has never been answered, was made by a gentleman whose assertion will be respected as authority throughout Europe, as well as throughout this country, by those who do not examine for themselves.

If we examine those acts of the Executive which have any bearing on the contest between Spain and the colonies, it will be found, that the greater number was favorable to the patriots; and those were the result of the free will and discretion of the Executive, while the acts complained of, which have had a bearing against the patriots, were performed by the Executive in obedience to the laws, and were not the result of the exercise of discretion.

The acts of the Executive of the United States favorable to the Spanish provinces, I will notice in the order of time.

In Mr. Madison's Message of November, 1811, we find this passage: "An enlarged philanthropy, and an enlightened forecast, concur in imposing on the National Councils an obligation to take a deep interest in their destinies; to cherish reciprocal sentiments of good will; to regard the progress of events; and not to be unprepared for whatever order of things may be ultimately established." Here is a voluntary act, favorable to the cause of the provinces; and this recommendation was followed by an act of Congress giving a considerable sum to the people of Venezuela.

The next act favorable to the provinces, was the issuing by Mr. Madison to the collector of the customs instructions to admit the flag of the provinces; by which their ships became entitled, in the ports of the United States, to every privilege granted to the ships of other foreign powers. The President was at liberty to have considered the patriots as rebels against their Sovereign, and to exclude their flag from our ports; or to consider them as a party in a civil war, and as such to admit their flag into our ports; he decided favorably to the patriots, and admitted their flag.

The next act of the Executive, favorable to the Spanish provinces, was the declaration by the present Chief Magistrate, that those provinces are parties to a civil war, in which their rights, as relates to neutrals, are equal to the rights of Spain; the President thus looking on the independence of the provinces as actually existing.

The next Executive act which has a bearing favorable to the provinces, was the construction given by the President to the law of March, 1817, respecting the neutral duties of the United States. That act, in consequence of the omission of the words "district, colony, or people," in one of its sections, perhaps admitted of a construction that would have denied to the patriots equal rights with the subjects of Spain in the ports of the United States. We have employed some time on a bill intended to remedy the defect; but the construction given by the President to the act of March, 1817, had rendered its operation perfectly equal as related to Spain and the provinces, so far as the Executive authority is concerned. In a letter written by the Secretary of the Treasury, which may be considered as official, is this paragraph: "Having declared that the flags of Spain and of independent Governments established in Spanish America should be treated in the same manner in the ports of the United States; the Executive authority would not hesitate to consider the flag of Venezuela that of a foreign State, within the meaning of the fourth section of the act."

The last act that I shall mention, manifestly favorable to the provinces, is the act of sending commissioners to ascertain what is their situation; to prevent misunderstandings; to correct errors; perhaps to redress past grievances, and prevent their recurrence in future.

These various acts of the Executive, having a bearing favorable to the patriots, and all of them resulting from the discretion of the Executive, were overlooked by the Speaker, when he said that the acts of the Executive were all on one side, and bearing entirely against the colonists.

Let us now examine those acts of the Executive of which the Speaker complains as having so unfavorable a bearing against the patriots. These are, the proclamation of Mr. Madison, issued for the purpose of dispersing the armed force collected under Toledo, in violation of the law of the United States; and the suppression by the President of the establishment at Amelia Island, made by McGregor, with a force unlawfully prepared within the United States, and maintained by Aury, who pretended to act under the authority of Mexico, New Grenada, and Venezuela.

As to the proclamation which was issued for dispersing the armed force collected under Toledo, it will be remembered that President Madison was sworn faithfully to execute his office, the chief duty of which is to take care that the laws be faithfully executed. An act provides that when the execution of the laws of the United States is opposed or obstructed by combinations too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, the President may call forth the militia; but he shall by proclamation command those who thus oppose or obstruct the laws, to retire peaceably to their respective abodes, within a limited time. The force collected by Toledo came within the meaning of the law; and Mr. Madison had no discretion to exercise. The law pointed out his duty, and he performed it.

The suppression of the establishment made by McGregor, and continued by Aury at Amelia Island, was required by the interests and the honor of the United States. The world knew that the Executive was authorized to take East Florida against any foreign power. Those who follow the profession of arms, must either be robbers or pirates, or they must have some power. The friends of Aury will not admit that he was a pirate; then they must contend that he served a foreign power. Let us admit that Aury served the Republic of Venezuela, a power whose flag is admitted into the ports of the United States, under the laws respecting the vessels of foreign powers. If Venezuela had been formally acknowledged as an independent State, the act of 1811 authorizes the President to occupy Florida against the attempt of Venezuela to take possession of it; and the want of such formal acknowledgment cannot diminish the rights of the United States. It being the duty of the President to execute the laws, and the case contemplated by the act of 1811 having happened, a foreign power having attempted to take possession of Florida, and having in execution of that attempt made an establishment at Amelia Island, the President was bound to suppress the establishment maintained there by Aury.

Had no such law existed, the conduct of the President would have been worthy of approbation. A nation has a right to protect itself from the evils of bad neighborhoods. Upon this principle it was that the act for taking possession of East Florida was passed. So when Louisiana was transferred from Spain to France, our Minister at Paris most seriously remonstrated against the occupation of that country by the forces of Napoleon; and many of our distinguished politicians urged the expediency of taking Louisiana by war, rather than admit a dangerous neighbor to come there. Perhaps Louisiana might have been obtained by war, at an expense of one hundred and fifty millions; but the wisdom and moderation of Mr. Jefferson obtained it by purchase for the tenth part of the sum. It was to preserve herself from the evils of bad neighborhood that Prussia involved herself in war, first with Great Britain and afterwards with France, rather than have French troops in possession of Hanover. Is there any nation more interested in avoiding neighbors of a certain description than the United States? Would it be safe to allow Florida to be revolutionized by black troops? We have said, and I presume will continue to say, that no power except Spain shall come there.

I have shown that the conduct of the Executive, as respects Spain and her American possessions, has been impartial. The honorable member did not indeed say that it was partial; but he could not be understood as meaning any thing else, when the acts of the Executive were all on one side, bearing entirely against the colonists. I will now proceed to show that the conduct of the Executive, as respects those parties, has been most honorable.

I have said, sir, that the measure proposed is pregnant with evil, and may jeopardize the safety of the United States. I hope and trust that we are able to resist any combination that may be formed against us, even at this time. I am confidently certain, that in twenty years we shall be able to set at defiance the power of the world: and in a century we shall be able to give it laws. I therefore, deem it most important, that we should let the present moment of peril pass away; that we should gain time, and go on to improve our resources by the acts of peace.

If any event can jeopardize our safety, it is a war with the combined powers of Europe at this time. Sir, if a hundred measures were devised for the purpose of destroying our national existence, and this was among them, it would be the very measure that I should deem most likely to succeed. If there is a measure, the adoption of which can produce such an event, it is one which shall amount to a declaration that we are the patrons of revolutions; one, by which we shall proclaim, that, wherever a province shall make insurrection against the authority of the parent country, we will consider it our business and duty to take the new people by the hand and introduce them into the family of nations.

Sir, the coalition still hangs together. And what is their common bond of union? It is the cause of legitimacy—the cause of hereditary thrones. The combined powers have proven, that they do not mean to confine their views to Europe, by interfering in the controversy between the Courts of Spain and Brazil. Is it not the object of their holy leagues to bring back mankind to the state of mental darkness in which they were for ages subsequent to the reign of Constantine? Has not Great Britain signified to you, that the Mississippi ought to be your boundary? Has not France done the same? Has not Spain claimed that boundary? Do not these circumstances indicate concert between those powers? Shall we then, at such a time, do an act utterly useless to us, equally useless to Buenos Ayres, (for the Speaker admits, that there can be no concert between us, and that we have not the means to aid her;) an act, the effect of which will be to bring Congress and the President into collision; which act may by any possibility, however remote, involve us in a contest with the combined European powers?

Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, said, that at this late period of the discussion, he could only claim the indulgence of the committee upon a principle, which never failed to secure to those who asked it their patient attention. He found that upon this occasion, he should be in a small minority of the delegation from his own State, and was, therefore, peculiarly solicitous of explaining the reasons of his differing from his honorable colleagues, for whose opinions he felt the greatest respect and deference. There was, indeed, another reason of no tless importance. This proposition had been supported upon a variety of principles, and by various arguments: nor would gentlemen be surprised to learn that his own views of a subject, which had so many aspects, had not been exactly presented, when they recur to the fact, that scarcely any two persons, who had spoken on this occasion, had entirely coincided. The honorable Speaker had declared himself for this proposition, but was opposed to war or the occupation of Florida. The gentleman from Georgia is against this proposition, but is in favor of the occupation of Florida. My friend from Louisiana is in favor of both; and my friend from South Carolina (Mr. LOWNDES) is in favor of neither. Among these various opinions, I am inclined to the adoption of this proposition, though I coincide otherwise entirely in the pacific policy of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means; an opinion which I shall probably endeavor to support upon grounds considerably different from those which have been advanced by the Speaker.

Sir, I have said, on a former occasion, that I am opposed to involving the nation in war, unless a great and important occasion shall require it. I have said, that I am unwilling to entangle ourselves in the contest now raging between Spain and the provinces of South America, but, that I would maintain an honorable, impartial, and dignified neutrality. I am opposed to war, because I see no adequate advantages to be derived from it; because the occasion does not seem to justify so important and momentous a measure; because the amount of the losses for which we seek indemnity, and of the property we wish to get possession of, bears no comparison with the hazards which we must encounter, whenever we engage in war; and, because I conceive a state of war always replete with danger to the principles of our constitution. It has long been my settled and deliberate opinion, that nothing is so apt to sap the foundation of our liberties as frequent wars. Every laurel that we gain is at the hazard of some principle of free government; every field that we win endangers some part of our constitution. The urgency must, therefore, be pressing, the necessity imperious, which drives us to war; and, were I less convinced than the gentleman from South Carolina, of the unprofitable results of a Spanish war in other respects, the consideration I have mentioned would suffice to dissuade me from giving my voice for waging it in the present state of things.

But, sir, while opposed to war; while averse to every measure which will probably lead to it, and which the honor and interest of the nation does not require, I have said that I would preserve a strict, impartial, and dignified neutrality; and I do most sincerely believe, that, in the pursuit of this end, the measure under consideration ought to be adopted.

I cannot but regret, Mr. Chairman, the manner in which this proposition has been discussed, and the remarks that have been introduced by its opposers. I allude to the harsh expressions that have been used in speaking of these unhappy people, who have long been struggling to throw off the most galling yoke, the most hateful slavery that has ever yet tortured and degraded man. The honorable gentleman from Georgia tells us, that he sympathizes in their cause, and earnestly wishes for their success. I doubt not his sincerity. Yet I would appeal to every member of the committee, whether the harsh colors in which he has represented them, and the dark picture he has drawn of their ignorance and depravity, is calculated to transfuse into other bosoms the sympathy of his own. I will appeal to himself whether his glowing language is likely to win us to their cause, and to disseminate, through the nation, an interest in their prosperity, when he represented them as having lit the torch of revolution, without possessing a sentiment of liberty; with conducting it by massacres and enormities, which render them unworthy of freedom; and with terminating it in a tyranny, not inferior to that which they have overthrown. According to this view of the subject, their Revolution has commenced in ignorance; its course has been stained by murder; its end has been the subjugation of the people; and we should feel not one emotion of pity for their sufferings, or of solicitude for their welfare. Sir, I am aware that this course of remark was, in some measure, drawn from the gentleman by the observations of the Speaker. But, while he protests against the comparison of the patriots with the heroes of our Revolution, he might have spared them, at least, the contrast which he has so vividly drawn. He tells us that they hugged their chains, and loved the tyranny; and that the origin of their Revolution had no foundation in the principles of freedom. He does not attend sufficiently, I think, to the nature of revolution, or sufficiently consider the situation of this people. What would be said of that man, who, turning over the pages of our history, should charge the sages and patriots of our Revolution with hugging their chains and loving their tyranny, because of the repeated and loyal remonstrances and memorials presented to the Crown? What should we think of the statesman, who, looking only to the surface of things, should attribute our glorious struggle to a mean and mercenary spirit, which revolted only at a twelvepenny stamp, or a trivial duty on a pound of tea? Sir, those who sat at the helm were men of profound wisdom and political sagacity; deeply versed in the knowledge of their rights as freemen, and intimately acquainted with the principles of human action; and, in conducting us over the tempestuous ocean of revolution, they looked with a steady eye to the liberties of their country, while they availed themselves of all these popular breezes, to waft the vessel of state into the haven of freedom and independence. Such may be the case with the Revolution of the Spanish provinces. We are too imperfectly acquainted with the facts which led to their convulsion to pronounce them destitute of the noble principles of liberty.

Nor are sufficient allowances made for the situation of these unhappy people for many centuries. Two or three hundred years have they been groaning under a tyranny the most oppressive that has ever overwhelmed a wretched people. Nothing parallel to the misery and slavery of Spanish America can be found in the annals of the inhabitable globe. It has been governed with an iron rod, by monarchs who have been most distinguished always by whatever is most horrible in tyranny, most detestable in bigotry, and most contemptible in imbecility. They have been involved, for centuries, in the deepest gloom of ignorance and superstition, into which it is the interest of tyrants forever to plunge the victims of their power. And when, at length, a beam of liberty has pierced the cloud which has so long benighted them, shall we be surprised that it has not, in a moment, dispelled the darkness, and spread abroad, throughout their land, the splendor of the meridian sun? Let us rather rejoice that light hath broken in upon them, and look with confidence to yet brighter moments. Let us remember that the throes of revolution are most violent where the mind has been least enlightened, nor wonder that, in the struggle to throw off the Spanish yoke, greater outrages should be committed than in our own Revolution. We are told of the massacres of their enemies, and the enormities of their Revolution. Unfortunately these are evils, too, necessarily connected with civil war. Even we were not without them. The Carolinas were the scene, during our Revolution, of events that we shudder to recollect. Brother was armed against brother—neighbor against neighbor. Our foe, too, was generous and merciful, compared with the cruel and unrelenting tyrants of those wretched and struggling people. Yes, sir, the cruelties perpetrated on the Spanish patriots by the inhuman monsters who seek their subjugation, cannot find a parallel in the annals of nations, if you except the history of Spain herself. Tear but away the page in which her bloody deeds are recorded, and you will find no parallel to her late enormities. She is, indeed, "her only parallel." And is it to be expected that, in a war like this, forbearance can be found among those who are goaded into madness by treachery and cold-blooded massacre? It is impossible!

Sir, it is for these struggling people that I own my sympathies are excited. I am not ashamed to avow them. I know it is not very fashionable to declaim in favor of liberty, and had I the disposition and the talent I should be saved the effort by the nervous eloquence of the gentleman who spoke on yesterday, (Mr. ROBERTSON.) I always listen to him with pleasure, but on yesterday with delight. His speech was dictated by a Roman spirit and a genuine republicanism—a republicanism that knows no change; which, during the lapse of nearly thirty years that I have known him, has remained unaltered and unimpaired.

There is, Mr. Chairman, another course of remark that I cannot but regret on this occasion. It has been said that this proposition implies a censure on the Executive. I am well aware that the gentleman from South Carolina did not mean to intimate any thing personal by the remark. Yet it cannot but have its effect.

[Mr. LOWNDES rose and explained, saying that, as he frequently differed from the Executive himself, he could not disapprove a similar freedom of opinion in others.] Mr. TUCKER continued—

The explanation of the gentleman was unnecessary. His uniform urbanity furnished a sufficient assurance that the remark was not intended with any personal view. But, though this is the case, yet the intimation that the proposition is not in consonance with Executive opinion is not without effect. The high standing and commanding talents of the gentleman may render it personally unimportant to him, whether his course conflicts with Executive opinion or not. It is not always so with others. The Executive branch of the Government, though it possesses not a very extensive direct influence, is vastly powerful in its indirect and reflected influence over this body. Elected by the suffrages of the whole nation, there are many who look upon him as the Northern Star of the political firmament, which alone preserves its place in the heavens, "fixed and unshaked of motion;" and by him they discern the aberrations of the lesser constellations of the system. I will not pretend to say that to a certain extent this may not have its advantages; but this I can venture to advance, that he who acts with candor and frankness, and with a sole view to the honor and interest of the nation, will not fail to receive approbation rather than censure for his frankness and independence. Our constituents will deal liberally by us so long as our motives are pure; and by this standard I am willing to be tried whenever I am found in collision with the Executive. But to whom are we to look on the present occasion in order to discern its opinions? To either of the two honorable chairmen, from whom we might most reasonably expect such information? No; they differ with each other. And the occupation of Florida, which one of them proposes, seems generally to be supposed at variance with the Cabinet opinion. Thus situated, I beg leave not only to disregard the intimation that this measure implies censure, but I utterly disavow and disclaim, on my part, any such idea. So far from it, that, according to my notion of things, the vote which I shall give will be founded on principles that confirm the propriety of the course pursued by the Government. What is the character of the proposition? It appropriates the usual sum for the outfit and salary of a Minister, for the purpose of sending a representative of this Government to Buenos Ayres, whenever the Executive, in the exercise of its constitutional discretion, shall think it advisable. It commands nothing, but it intimates, in a proper and constitutional manner, the readiness of this House to go hand in hand with the Executive in the interesting measure of opening an intercourse with the Government of La Plata, by sending and receiving Ministers. It is in this way, and in this way only, that I understand the proposition. Is there any direct censure of the Executive here? Not at all. Is there any implied? A construction which would give to it this character must be forced and unnatural. It is only upon the hypothesis of the gentleman from South Carolina that such a construction has the air of plausibility. He tells us that, as the Executive have the power, this House ought not to interfere, unless there has been culpable negligence in its exercise; unless there has been unreasonable delay in sending a Minister to a foreign power. If his doctrine be admitted as a general rule, yet cases like the present must form an exception to it. There is an evident distinction between sending Ministers to old-established Governments, and sending a Minister for the first time to a new Government, separating itself from one to which it had formerly been attached. The one leads to no dangerous results; the other, we are told by gentlemen, will put to hazard the peace of the country. You may send a Minister to Turkey or to Italy, to Denmark or to Austria, without offending any one. But we are told that if we send a Minister to La Plata, we shall involve ourselves in a quarrel with Spain. Be it so. Is it not, then, a sufficient reason for the expression of the opinion of this House, the immediate representative of the people—the constitutional organ for declaring war—that a contemplated measure may lead to a state of war? Is it fair to expect the Executive branch of the Government to assume, alone, the responsibility of a measure involving such momentous consequences, while we stand silently by, unwilling to share the hazard of expressing an opinion? Or, is it consistent with the spirit of our constitution, that the Executive should pursue a course which leads to hostilities, without an intimation of the opinion and wishes of the nation, expressed through the legislative body, on so important a concern? I think not, sir; and so far from censuring the forbearance of the Executive, hitherto to send a Minister to La Plata, I applaud it; because, although I do not think it would give just cause of war, yet, as it might lead to a rupture with Spain, a proper respect for the rights of this body required that they should await its opinion on the subject. Nor ought they to send a Minister, or to receive one, without the sanction of the legislative body, until the lapse of time or the acquiescence of Spain shall have removed every hazard of hostility. It is, then, with a view of expressing, at this time, our willingness to go hand in hand with the Executive in this affair, whenever it shall think it advisable to act, that I shall give my support to this proposition.

But, gentlemen seem to consider this an interference with the constitutional powers of the Executive. I do not think so. This House has at all times, and on all subjects, a right to declare its opinions, leaving to the Executive to act upon them or not, according to its pleasure. Nay, it has often done more. Wherever the act to be done by the Executive has been intimately connected with the constitutional powers of this body, it has always deemed itself competent to act. Thus, before the treaty for the purchase of Louisiana was made, $2,000,000 were put at the disposal of the Government for a purchase of Southern territory. Here there was an act perfectly analogous. This body had no right to make a purchase, or to command the President to do so; but, as the purchase, if made, would have called upon the legislative body for an appropriation, it was thought advisable to make it beforehand, and thus indicate a correspondence of views on a subject, where correspondence was necessary. Could it have been said at this time, that the Executive were censured by Congress for delaying to make a purchase the interest of the nation called for? Could it then have been objected that we were trenching upon the constitutional powers of the Executive? Could it have been alleged to be useless and frivolous, because the Executive could make the purchase without a law? If not, neither can it be said now. The act of the Executive there would only have called for a small appropriation. The act of the Executive here might have the effect of a declaration of war, which it is within the constitutional powers of the legislative body alone to make. It would appear to me indeed of the utmost importance, that this correspondence of views should be preserved between these two branches of the Government. How embarrassing to the Executive must it be, if, after a treaty has been made calling for a large appropriation, this body should refuse to make it, and to sanction a contract entered into with a foreign State. How much more embarrassing if, in the exercise of its constitutional powers, the Executive should involve the nation in a war against the wishes of its Representatives. The jarring and confusion, and inefficiency that would result, might have the most fatal influence on the national success. No, sir, frankness and candor, and a free and unreserved communication of the feelings and opinions of each by the other, can never have any other than the happiest influence upon the National Councils.

The propriety of an expression of an opinion by this House on important occasions being established, it behooves us to consider the necessity of an interference at this time. Although we cannot perhaps speak very certainly of the situation of the Spanish provinces, yet no doubt can exist that a civil war is at this time raging between the colonies and the mother country. Nor can there be more reason to doubt that the power de facto in the Spanish province of Buenos Ayres is in the hands of the revolutionary patriots. And what is the principle of the law of nations applicable to this state of things? It is, that all foreign nations have a right to consider the two contending parties as two independent nations in all respects; that foreign nations have no right to judge which party is in the right, are justified in looking no farther than to the possession of the power, and in considering those who are possessed of the power, de facto, as the Government of the country. It is a wise and natural principle of the law of nations. It flows from the source of all national law: the rights of nations to protect themselves and to seek their own advantage without injury to others. Nations, it is said, treat and communicate with each other to procure commercial and other benefits; to obtain redress for injuries sustained, or to provide against their occurrence. It matters not to the neutral nation whether the parties at war are right or wrong; it may be its interest to make arrangements with both; it may be necessary to treat and communicate with each, to obtain satisfaction for wrongs, or to regulate their intercourse so as to prevent those infractions of neutral right so common in a state of war. In this view, it is only important to the neutral that the parties are possessed of the physical power of doing injuries or conferring benefits. With a people possessed of the physical power, or power de facto, though in a state of civil war, the laws of nations admit the neutral to communicate as with an independent power. They consider them in all respects as sovereign for the time being, and of course they justify communications with them by Ministers. If it were otherwise, nations at peace might suffer the direst wrongs from the parties in a civil war, without the possibility of redress, since the only way of demanding it is by Ministers.

An application of these principles to our own case will show the reasonableness of the rule. Spain and her colonies are at war; should they continue hostile (as Spain did with the Netherlands for half a century, without acknowledging their independence, though they were completely sovereign) can it be believed that, according to the laws of nations, all other powers are to be debarred of the advantages of trade and commerce which they hold out? And how shall treaties of commerce be made without Ministers? Or, suppose the Republic of La Plata cruises on our commerce, or takes our shipping under illegal blockades, or attempts to enforce improper laws of contraband, or throws our citizens into dungeons, (as Spain has done with Mr. Meade,) shall we have no redress? Can we not demand satisfaction; the release of our property; the discharge of our citizens; and compensation for the injury? And how is this to be done without a Minister? And if through a Minister you make this demand, is it not a demand upon them as sovereigns for the time being? You have sent agents, or whatever they are called—(for gentlemen do not seem to agree by what name they are to be styled; they seem to be considered at present a sort of nondescripts)—and it is contended that they are not Ministers, nor invested with the mantle of ministerial inviolability—suppose they are seized and confined as spies? will you have no right to send and demand their release? And if you send another representative, shall he, too, be unprotected by the laws of nations? or will you send a Minister whom, on the principles of all civilized people, they will be bound to respect? The latter assuredly—the laws of nations would justify you, and Spain would have no right to complain; because, although the mission would acknowledge the existence of civil war, and that the power to whom you sent, held for the time being the power de facto, it would decide nothing as to the rights of the parties or the justice of their cause; and so long as the neutral avoids this, so long is the belligerent without just cause of complaint.

The debate here terminated; and, the question being taken, by yeas and nays, on agreeing to the proposition of Mr. CLAY to insert in the general appropriation bill a provision for an outfit and one year's salary for a Minister to the United Provinces of La Plata, it was decided in the negative.—For the motion 45, against it 115.

MONDAY, March 30.

History of Congress.

Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana, from the committee appointed on the petition of Gales & Seaton, made a report thereon, which was read; when Mr. R. reported a bill authorizing a subscription to the History of Congress, which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole, to which is committed the bill to provide for the publication of the laws of the United States, and for other purposes. The report is as follows:

The committee to whom was referred the memorial of Gales & Seaton, report: That the memorialists are engaged in publishing a history of the Congress of the United States, from the commencement of the Government to the present day, and a continuation of the same history, to keep pace with the present and future transactions of that body. The memorialists solicit the aid of the Government in this their laborious and expensive undertaking. The committee are fully impressed with the importance of this work. Nothing can be more useful than a correct legislative history of the United States. It is a source of much regret that one has not heretofore existed; and now, that it is proposed to be published, there can be no hesitation in giving it encouragement. The views and opinions of the great actors on the theatre of government, are not less necessary to be known than their acts themselves. The utility of judicial reports is very generally admitted; and if the reasons of the judge ought to accompany his exposition of the law, how much more proper is it that this should be the case in respect to the views of the legislator, the author of the law itself. To a right understanding of statutes, nothing is more essential than a knowledge of the causes and motives which produced their enactment; and this can in no way be so satisfactorily obtained as by a resort to contemporaneous debate.

That the aid of Congress is necessary to this work, arises out of the great labor and expense attending it, whilst, at the same time, no adequate remuneration can be expected from its sale. The agriculturist, the merchant, the mechanic, and the physician, who purchase other books, will feel comparatively but little interest in this, however useful it may be to the politician, the historian, and the law-giver. The work will not afford amusement to the general reader; but without it the archives of the nation are defective.

Congress has not been backward in giving aid to publications of a similar character. Of the new edition of the laws of the United States, a subscription was directed of one thousand copies, before the work was commenced. Three or four hundred have been since purchased of that work, and it is now proposed to purchase eight hundred copies more. A subscription was, in like manner, authorized to Wait's edition of the public documents, and it is further proposed to purchase an equal number of copies of an additional volume of that work, about to be published. The policy is not less just than liberal, which provides for the widest attainable diffusion of whatever concerns the development of the springs and principles of our Government.

With such views it is, that at the present session, the publication of the journals of the Convention, and of the secret journal of the old Congress has been authorized; and, with such views, the committee ask leave to report a bill "authorizing a subscription to the History of Congress."

Spanish American Provinces.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kentucky, then rose and renewed the proposition unsuccessfully made in Committee of the Whole by Mr. CLAY, to appropriate a sum not exceeding $18,000 "for an outfit and one year's salary of a Minister to the United Provinces of the River Plata, the outfit to be paid and the salary to commence whenever the President shall deem it expedient to send a Minister to the Government of the said provinces."

The question was taken on the motion, and decided in the negative, by yeas and nays, by exactly the same vote as decided the question in Committee of the Whole, viz: yeas 45, nays 115, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anderson of Pennsylvania, Anderson of Kentucky, Barber of Ohio, Bellinger, Bloomfield, Blount, Boden, Claiborne, Comstock, Cook, Crawford, Desha, Drake, Earle, Floyd, Gage, Harrison, Herkimer, Herrick, Holmes of Massachusetts, Johnson of Virginia, Johnson of Kentucky, Jones, Kinsey, Merrill, Murray, New, Ogle, Owen, Patterson, Porter, Quarles, Robertson of Kentucky, Robertson of Louisiana, Rogers, Shaw, Spencer, Tarr, Townsend, Trimble, Tucker of Virginia, Upham, Walker of North Carolina, Walker of Kentucky, and Whiteside.

NAYS.—Messrs. Abbott, Adams, Allen of Massachusetts, Allen of Vermont, Anstin, Baldwin, Ball, Barbour of Virginia, Bassett, Bateman, Bayley, Beacher, Bennett, Boss, Burwell, Butler, Campbell, Clagett, Cobb, Colston, Crafts, Cruger, Culbreth, Cushman, Darlington, Edwards, Ellicott, Ervin of South Carolina, Folger, Forney, Forsyth, Garnett, Hall of Delaware, Hall of North Carolina, Hasbrouck, Herbert, Hitchcock, Hogg, Holmes of Connecticut, Hopkinson, Hubbard, Hunter, Huntington, Irving of New York, Kirtland, Lawyer, Linn, Little, Livermore, Lowndes, W. P. Maclay, McCoy, Marr, Mason of Massachusetts, Mason of Rhode Island, Mercer, Middleton, Moore, Morton, Mosely, Mumford, Jeremiah Nelson, H. The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

TUESDAY, March 31.

The Cumberland Road.

The orders of the day being announced, on the bill making appropriations; the first, $52,984, to pay the claims now due at the Treasury; and the second, of $260,000, to meet the demands that will be made under existing contracts, towards completing the Cumberland road—

Mr. SPENCER, of New York, rose, and moved that the Committee of the whole House be discharged from the consideration of the bill, and it be postponed indefinitely.

This motion brought on a short debate on the merits of the bill; in which the postponement was advocated by the mover, by Mr. BASSETT, and Mr. LIVERMORE; and opposed by Messrs. TUCKER of Virginia, HARRISON, TARR, PINDALL, BEECHER, TRIMBLE, MERCER, and SMITH of Maryland.

The question on postponing the bill was finally negatived—yeas 56, nays 82.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the above bill.

WEDNESDAY, April 1.

Cumberland Road.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act making further appropriations, for the construction of the Cumberland road," was read the third time. And on the question, "Shall it pass?" it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 74, nays 56.

Sword to Colonel Johnson.

A resolution awarding a sword to Col. Richard M. Johnson, in consideration of his valor and good conduct at the battle with the combined English and Indian forces on the river Thames, in Upper Canada, on the 5th of October, 1818, was read twice and put on its passage.

Mr. CLAIBORNE rose to offer an amendment to the resolution. While the House was dispensing rewards, he said, for meritorious services, he wished to introduce to attention the names of two other characters. One was Major General Carroll, of Tennessee. That officer was engaged in the public service from the commencement of the late war to its glorious termination at New Orleans. Mr. C. briefly recapitulated some of the distinguished services which this officer had rendered. He had organized the force which repaired from Tennessee to the defence of New Orleans, and which by its rapid march under the direction and exertion of Gen. C., had reached that place in time to save the city from the enemy; and he had rendered other services too prominent to need being mentioned, and which would not permit him to be overlooked on this occasion. Mr. C. next mentioned Brigadier General Coffee, whose name was familiar to every one. At the commencement of the war that officer volunteered his services, and by his zeal and influence induced a great many others to enter the service. For his merit he was promoted from captain of a mounted company to the command of a brigade; and his gallant conduct in the Creek war, at Talladega, at New Orleans, &c., had proved him worthy of the distinction. Mr. C. concluded by moving to insert the names of these officers in the resolution.

Mr. POINDEXTER rose to second the motion of the honorable member from Tennessee. The distinguished services of General Carroll, from the commencement of the Creek war to the close of the late contest with Great Britain, Mr. P. said, were known to the nation, and appreciated by all who witnessed his meritorious conduct. At the critical and interesting period, when a powerful and well-disciplined army of the enemy invaded the State of Louisiana, and menaced the city of New Orleans, the exertions of General Carroll were particularly conspicuous, and eminently contributed to the glorious result which gave security to that city and renown to the arms of our country. The division of militia from the State of Tennessee, under his command, destined to participate in the defence of the Southern frontier, descended from Nashville to New Orleans with unexampled rapidity, and arrived at a moment the most auspicious to the safety of that important point. Without this reinforcement General Jackson would have been destitute of the force called for by that great emergency. The consequences of such deficiency might be imagined. During that memorable campaign, the gallantry of this corps and of its intrepid commander elicited the thanks of a grateful people, and of the illustrious General under whom they fought and conquered. I accord my hearty assent, said Mr. P., to the proposition made by the gentleman from Tennessee to reward these services by a suitable manifestation of the national gratitude. But Mr. P. suggested to him the propriety of presenting it in a distinct resolution, properly digested and matured.

Mr. DESHA made a few remarks in support of the expressions of the resolution, as to the gallant conduct of Colonel Johnson, on the occasion referred to. He was present when those services were performed, and could bear testimony to the intrepidity displayed by Col. J.

Mr. CLAIBORNE, according to the suggestion of Mr. POINDEXTER, withdrew his proposition for the present; and the resolution then passed nem. con.

THURSDAY, April 2.

Honors to the Brave.

Mr. CLAIBORNE, agreeably to the intimation which he had yesterday given, to submit a resolution for awarding to certain officers testimonials of the respect of Congress for their distinguished services, offered the following joint resolution:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be requested to cause gold medals to be struck, with suitable emblems and devices, and presented to Major General William Carroll and Brigadier General John Coffee, in testimony of the high sense entertained by Congress of their gallantry and good conduct in the several conflicts during the late war, at Talashatchie, Taladega, Enotochopko, Emuckfaw, Tehopeka, and New Orleans.

Resolved, That the President be requested to cause a gold medal to be struck, with suitable emblems and devices, and presented to Major General Joseph Desha, in testimony of the high sense entertained by Congress of his gallantry and good conduct in the conflict of the river Thames, in Upper Canada.

Mr. CLAIBORNE said he had not yesterday named General Desha, in the remarks he then made; it escaped his recollection at the moment; but that officer was well entitled to the notice of the House. General Desha, it would be recollected, had left his seat in Congress, in the Summer of 1813, when the Northwestern campaign was a subject of great anxiety, and joined the Northwestern army, as commander of a division of Kentucky troops, and to his intrepidity and good conduct was in a great degree owing the result of the battle on the Thames. On that occasion he occupied, with his division, a situation of imminent danger; and at a moment when the enemy pressed with great force on that part of the line, it was by General Desha's courage and example, and denouncing death to the first man that broke, that the ground was maintained, the tide of victory turned, and the day crowned with success. Mr. C. next turned to the services of Generals Carroll and Coffee, and enforced what he had yesterday said of them, by referring again to the various instances of the zeal, activity, and bravery which had characterized their conduct, and which, under the Almighty, had saved the city of New Orleans from a ferocious enemy.

Mr. HARRISON said, that with regard to the conduct of General Desha, in the action on the Thames, he had mentioned it with approbation in his official report of the action, and he now repeated that he there performed his duty, and did every thing that he could do. But, so did General Henry, who was third in command, whilst General Desha was fourth; they stand in that respect, perfectly on an equality.

Mr. H. moved, therefore, that the name of General William Henry be inserted in the second resolution. Mr. H. gave some explanations of the positions occupied by the two divisions in the action, and stated that it was the division of General Henry which occupied the front line, and was most pressed by the enemy; that of General Desha formed with it a right angle, and though less exposed, yet General Desha himself, he believed, was at the point of junction where the fire was most heavy.

Mr. CLAIBORNE had not called to mind the particular circumstances of the affair, or doubtless he should have recollected the name of General Henry, and would have included him in the resolutions which he had offered. These were honorary rewards that cost the nation little, and he was always willing to bestow them upon gallant services. He had intended to propose swords on this occasion, but he found, by the precedents, that medals were more customary, though the cost of the latter was perhaps not less.

Mr. OGLE suggested a doubt whether, if these resolutions passed, it would not be proper also to seek out the meritorious officers of the Revolution. He had no objection to voting a medal to each of the gallant officers named, but protested against selecting the officers of the late army, and passing by those of the Revolution, for, if the former merited one medal, those of the latter deserved two, and he moved that the subject be referred to the Military Committee, that resolutions might be reported conformably to his ideas; or at least that the distinguished officers of the Revolutionary Army might be included in these honorary rewards.

Mr. COLSTON, though feeling the highest respect for the officers mentioned, and for their eminent services, yet objected to these resolutions on the ground that it was neither customary nor proper, in voting these rewards, to go below the commander of an army who had to bear the disgrace of defeat, and who it was right should reap the rewards of success; that to pursue a different course would involve the necessity of awarding the same to numerous other cases, as there were at least fifty others who had rendered important services and were entitled to notice; and it was better to stop, or Congress would be overwhelmed with cases of this kind, &c. Mr. C. referred to the evils which he had witnessed in Virginia, of making these rewards too common; and referred to the circumstance of the Legislature of that State being called on to appropriate fifteen thousand dollars, at one time, for the purchase of medals, &c., which had been voted to gallant officers from that State. He had opposed the practice then, and felt himself bound, however high his sense of the merits of the distinguished officers in question, to do it here.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said a few words to Mr. CLAIBORNE, to show that the vote of a gold medal had always been considered a higher honor than to bestow a sword, and that medals had, therefore, been generally given to the Commander-in-chief of any army, and swords to the inferior officers.

Mr. CLAIBORNE observed, in reply to Mr. COLSTON, that the services of the officer named in the first resolution were as important and valuable as those of any Commander-in-chief in the nation; and if these distinctions had been granted in numerous other instances, as he could show they had been, it was highly proper they should be in this case, particularly when some who had received the honor had not served so long, nor rendered services half so important as the officers he now brought forward in the first resolution. Mr. C. then referred, severally, to the resolutions voting thanks and medals to General Brown, to General Scott, to Generals Ripley, Miller, and Porter, to General Gaines, and to General McComb, accompanied by thanks to their officers and men, and relied on these resolutions to show that the honors of Congress had not been confined to the Commanders-in-chief, but, on the contrary, they were nearly all subordinate officers, and some not higher than the rank of Colonel. Generals Carroll and Coffee, if they had not the reputation of Commanders-in-chief, deserved the applause of saving a city from a merciless enemy, whose rallying words were "Beauty and Booty." Mr. C. adverted to the circumstances under which these officers received the news of the danger of New Orleans, and the great exertions which enabled them to reach it in time. Coffee was returning home from the Creek war, with an exhausted army, when information of the danger of New Orleans reached him at Baton Rouge. With his exhausted men and worn-down horses he instantly started for the scene of action. No rest did he permit himself, day or night, but hastened with a celerity unexampled and astonishing, and arrived just in time to save the city, and win a conquest which will ever be regarded as a most important and most glorious one. Would the House deny to such men as these the poor and pitiful reward now proposed? Carroll had been twice wounded in the Creek war, and was called on, at a moment's warning, to repair to New Orleans. He hastily collected his troops, organized them for the field in less time than was ever known, and with a rapidity never witnessed before, by his unwearied exertions reached the city just in time to insure the victory and share in its glory. Mr. C. agreed to what had been said about the Revolutionary veterans, but hoped, if it was thought proper to reward them in this way, that gentlemen would bring them forward in a separate proposition, and he would cheerfully support it. If he asked for what was not given to others, turn them away. If he asked for what they did not deserve, turn them away. But if he asked for them what others had received, and which they deserved much more than some who had received this distinction, he hoped it would not be denied to them.

Mr. HOPKINSON made a few remarks to dissuade the House from adopting these resolutions. It was a painful task to urge this course; but, he said this House had no wealth to bestow; these honors were all it had to give; they ought, therefore, to be given sparingly, and not wasted. The honors of Congress ought not to be given, he said, for fidelity, for diligence, and bravery, because these were to be expected, and belonged to every American officer; but were intended for some signal action above all, to be rewarded above all. Instead of confining these marks of distinction to proper occasions, all history did not furnish as many of them as the history of this country for the last two or three years, and the practice was so common that it would cease to be any distinction at all. Mr. H. did not make these objections from any insensibility to the gallant services of the officers referred to by Mr. CLAIBORNE; but, besides his opposition on national grounds, he thought that delicacy towards these officers themselves ought to forbid the passage of the resolutions. It was now three years since the close of the war, and the public would ask why these officers had not received this reward before; why, for the first time, they were brought forward at this late day? And, after being so long neglected, might not the proceeding now be imputed to personal favor? Mr. H. concluded by moving that the resolutions lie on the table.

Mr. POINDEXTER hoped that the motion to lay the resolutions on the table would be withdrawn, that the two resolutions might be separated, and the sense of the House taken on each by itself. The subject of the Northwestern and of the Southern officers ought, he thought, to be introduced separately, and then gentlemen in the House, acquainted personally with the officers in the two armies, could speak of them, respectively, from their own knowledge. He supported the propriety of adopting these resolutions by referring to the votes of thanks, &c., which had been passed at this very session, and the sword which only yesterday was awarded to a gallant officer. To reject the cases now before the House, under those circumstances, would be invidious as well as unjust.

Mr. RHEA hoped the resolutions would not be laid on the table. Had they not been brought forward at all this session he should have been satisfied, because the reputation of these gallant men was too well secured to make this distinction necessary; but as the resolutions had been offered, he was anxious they should not be rejected. These brave men did not rest when they were going on the floods to meet the enemies of their country, and he hoped the resolutions for rewarding them would not be allowed to rest on the table, but would be adopted.

Mr. HARRISON again rose to bear testimony to the gallant services of the gentlemen of the Northwestern army, and took the opportunity of expressing briefly his sense of the distinguished honor which he had recently himself received at the hands of Congress—a reward more dear to him than any other that could be conferred on him, but which he must look on as due to the gallant army which he had the honor to command, rather than to his merits, &c.

After some further opposition by Mr. CLAIBORNE to laying the resolution on the table, the question was taken on that motion and carried—ayes 58, noes 54.

FRIDAY, April 3.

State of Illinois.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to enable the people of Illinois Territory to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on a footing with the original States.

Mr. POPE moved to amend the bill by striking out the lines defining the boundaries of the new States, and to insert the following:

"Beginning at the mouth of the Wabash river; hence up the same, and with the line of Indiana to the northwest corner of said State; thence east with the line of the same State to the middle of Lake Michigan; thence north along the middle of said lake to north latitude 42 deg. 30 minutes; thence west to the middle of the Mississippi river; and thence down along the middle of that river to its confluence with the Ohio river; and thence up the latter river along its northwestern shore to the beginning."

The object of this amendment, Mr. P. said, was to gain, for the proposed State, a coast on Lake Michigan. This would afford additional security to the perpetuity of the Union, inasmuch as the State would thereby be connected with the States of Indiana, Ohio, Pennsylvania, and New York, through the Lakes. The facility of opening a canal between Lake Michigan and the Illinois river, said Mr. P., is acknowledged by every one who has visited the place. Giving to the proposed State the port of Chicago, (embraced in the proposed limits,) will draw its attention to the opening of the communication between the Illinois river and that place, and the improvement of that harbor. It was believed, he said, upon good authority, that the line of separation between Indiana and Illinois would strike Lake Michigan south of Chicago, and not pass west of it, as had been supposed by some geographers who had favored us with maps of that country; and, Mr. P. added, that all the country north of the proposed State, and bounded by Lakes Michigan, Huron, Superior, and of the Woods, and the Mississippi river, must form but one State, Congress being restricted, by the ordinance of 1787, from erecting more than five States in the Northwestern Territory.

This motion was agreed to without a division.

Mr. POPE then moved further to amend the bill by striking out that part which appropriated the State's proportion of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands to the construction of roads and canals in said State, and to insert the following:

"For the purposes following, viz: two-fifths to be disbursed, under the direction of Congress, in making roads leading to the State; the residue to be appropriated by the Legislature of the State for the encouragement of learning, of which one —— part shall be exclusively bestowed on a college or university."

Mr. P. said that the fund proposed to be applied for the encouragement of learning had, in the other new States, been devoted to roads; but its application had, it was believed, not been productive of the good anticipated; on the contrary, it had been exhausted on local and neighborhood objects, by its distribution among the counties, according to their respective representation in the Legislature. The importance of education in a Republic, he said, was universally acknowledged; and that no immediate aid could be derived in new counties from waste lands was not less obvious; and that no active fund would be provided in a new State, the history of the Western States too clearly proved. In addition to this, Mr. P. said, nature had left little to be done in the proposed State of Illinois, in order to have the finest roads in the world. Besides, roads would be made by the inhabitants as they became useful, because the benefits are immediate; but not so with endowments to schools. The effects of these institutions were too remote. Nor would the interest of the United States be impaired by this plan. The land on the roads was generally private property before the opening of the road; and the benefit resulting to the United States from the stipulation would be found alone in the exemption from taxation, for five years, of lands sold in the State.

This motion was also agreed to without a division; and after receiving some further amendments, the most important of which was one moved by Mr. TAYLOR, to exempt the soldiers' bounty lands in the State from taxation for three years—

The committee rose and reported the bill to the House, and it was ordered to be engrossed, as amended, and read a third time, nemine contradicente.

History of Congress.

On motion of Mr. SERGEANT, the House proceeded, by a vote of 60 to 58, to consider the report of the Committee of the Whole on the bill authorizing a subscription (of one thousand copies) to the History of Congress, proposed to be undertaken by Gales & Seaton.

The House having refused to concur with the Committee of the Whole, in striking out the first section of the bill, Mr. S. with a view of removing the objections made by some gentlemen to the bill in its present shape, moved to add to the first section the following proviso:

Provided further, That, before receiving any payment on account of said work, the publishers shall enter into bond in a penalty of twenty thousand dollars, with security to be approved by the First Comptroller, that the said work shall not exceed ten volumes in extent, to be brought up to the end of the second session of the fourteenth Congress, and shall be completed within ten years from the day on which the first payment on account thereof is demanded: And Provided, also, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed to preclude Congress from rescinding their subscription to the said work, whenever it shall to them seem expedient.

This amendment was agreed to without a division; when Mr. HITCHCOCK moved to reduce the subscription from one thousand to one hundred copies; which motion he afterwards modified, by moving two hundred and fifty.

This motion was opposed by Mr. SERGEANT, because, he argued, it would be equivalent to a rejection of the bill; as the great labor of the compilation, the expense of preparing the work for the press, the expense of printing volumes of the magnitude proposed, &c., could not be undertaken without aid from Congress, to the extent proposed by the select committee; and because a work of this nature could not depend on private subscription, &c. Mr. S. also enforced and enlarged on the national importance of the work proposed, as well as its importance to Congress in its legislative business, &c.; in which he was supported by Mr. SIMKINS, Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, and Mr. LIVERMORE.

The bill was opposed earnestly by Mr. PITKIN, Mr. HITCHCOCK, and Mr. BUTLER, principally on the ground of the expense, and the unimportance of the work compared with that expense.

Mr. HITCHCOCK's motion to reduce the number of copies to be subscribed for was agreed to —ayes 74, noes 56—when, on motion by Mr. BASSETT, the bill was ordered to lie on the table.

THURSDAY, April 9.

Case of R. W. Meade.

The House, on motion of Mr. TRIMBLE, took up the report of the select committee on the resolution of the 12th February, and the memorial of sundry citizens of Philadelphia, respecting the imprisonment of Richard W. Meade, by the Spanish Government. The report concludes with recommending to the House the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the House is satisfied that the imprisonment of Richard W. Meade, is an act of cruel and unjustifiable oppression; that it is the right and duty of the Government of the United States to afford to Mr. Meade its aid and protection; and that this House will support and maintain such measures as the President may hereafter adopt, to obtain the release of the said R. W. Meade from confinement, should such measures be proper and necessary.

The resolution having been read, Mr. TRIMBLE proposed the following substitute therefor, by way of amendment:

Resolved, That the demand made by the President of the United States upon the King of Spain for the liberation of Richard W. Meade, a citizen of the United States, detained in confinement at the Castle of Santa Catalina, at Cadiz, ought to be supported and enforced, by vesting in the President an authority to make a reprisal upon a Spanish Consul, in the event of a failure on the part of Spain promptly to discharge the said Meade.

Mr. TRIMBLE rose in support of his motion, and addressed the House as follows:

If I may find favor in the sight of the House, I would ask a short indulgence at their hands. I know how much they are exhausted in the consideration of various complicated questions, touching our internal prosperity and exterior relations; and I am more than sensible of my utter inability to repay their attention with a fair equivalent.

The resolution reported by the committee is, in my opinion, unequal to the emergency of the case—I would prefer a stronger measure. Had the vindication of this amendment fallen to the lot of some members whom I could designate, they would tell us a round, unvarnished tale, that would nail us to our places—a tale that would "rouse the slumbering dead to hear." They would show you a captive through the gratings of his prison window; that captive a citizen and brother, your agent and vice consul, languishing in a foreign dungeon, unpitied and forgotten; secluded from the cheerful light of day; bereft of all the endearments of social life—the solace of children, wife, and friends, and peaceful home—pining and wasting away in misery and despair, with but one solitary ray of hope, "that gleams from the star-spangled banner which waves over the land of the free and the home of the brave." But I have no thoughts that scald, or words that burn, or plaintive tones of supplication, that would wring reluctant succor and compassion from Congress and the nation. Mine are humble powers, that have no eloquence of speech, save what the subject lends to grace its memory. Let no man judge me of meaning more than I explain. In the full spirit of candor, I declare, before the highest of all tribunals—the Judge of quick and dead—that, if I know myself, there is no temptation which would induce me to do a deed that would bring dishonor on my country; and I swear by all that is sacred in me, that in my opinion we are bound in duty, in justice, and in honor, to give this citizen immediate succor, even at the hazard of our lives. Suppose a change of cases, and I and you, and all of us would ask it and expect it. Let us remember the golden rule of him who spake as never man spake—let us do to others as we would have them do to us; for on this hangs the duty of the nation. If the measure which I offer and advocate is dangerous or premature, there is a redeeming spirit in the superior wisdom and better judgment of the House, which will shield us from its consequences; and I am sure there is a fund of charity within these walls that will forgive the well-meant, but mistaken zeal, which may lead me beyond the boundary of cold caution.

Permit me to waste a few moments in glancing over the facts, as reported. I intend to rely entirely on the evidence of the Spanish documents, and for that reason shall omit many considerations which give a favorable color to the case; as, for instance, Mr. Meade's loan of forty thousand dollars in cash to the Regency, to assist them in suppressing a mutiny of the troops at Cadiz; the enormous sum of more than half a million which they owe him for property sold the Government; and the fact of his being put under military guard until his warehouses were pillaged by order of the Regency, because he refused to sell any more property, flour, tobacco, &c., until he could get pay for what they already owed him. Let these, and many others like them, pass for nothing. The naked case is this: Mr. Meade held in his hands about fifty-two thousand dollars, as trustee under the bankrupt laws of Spain, subject to the direction and control of the Consulado at Cadiz. One Glass claimed this money for himself; and one Hunter, by his agent, (McDermot,) also claimed it. The Consulado ordered the money to be paid to McDermot, on condition that he would give security. This he failed to do, and the Consulado suddenly made an order, directing Mr. Meade to deposit the sum in the King's Treasury. He made the deposit in "effective specie," which the same treasury owed him, viz: in libramientos—that is, treasury notes or cash scrip. These treasury notes may have been at a discount in the market, but that could make no difference; for it would have been more than dishonest in the treasury to refuse its own paper, because it was at a discount. Between Meade and the treasury there was no ground of complaint, and could be none; for, if he had paid the deposit in specie, the treasurer must have instantly repaid it to him, in discharge of the libramientos—that is, treasury notes—and the result would be exactly the same. And as Meade was then pressing the treasurer to pay his cash scrip, it is easy to see that the treasurer obtained a respite from further importunity, until Glass or Hunter should call for the money at the end of their lawsuit.

Some time after this, McDermot brought suit against Mr. Meade for the same sum, before the same court. He pleaded their order and the deposit in the King's treasury, and vouched the treasury to respond the money; but the court gave judgment that he should pay again. He appealed at the Alzadas, and the cause was withdrawn from that court by the Council of War, at the instance of McDermot; and it is still pending before the Council of War. Mr. Meade petitioned the King against the oppressive conduct of that court, and the King ordered five new judges to be associated with the old ones, and directed that no proceedings should be had in the cause, in the absence of the new judges. McDermot suggested to the Council of War, that Meade was about to leave Spain, and the old judges, in the absence of the new ones, and contrary to the King's order, authorized the Consulado at Cadiz to hold Meade to security for the money; and the Consulado resolved, that the only security they would take should be another deposit of the money in their Treasury. This Meade refused to do, and he was sent to the castle, and put in the felons' prison. Other aggravating facts and circumstances may be found in the documents sent by the President in his Message on this subject.

Our Minister near the Court of Madrid complained of these outrageous proceedings, as a violation of the 7th and 20th articles of the treaty of 1795, and also a violation of the laws and usages of Spain, and the King expressed his entire disapprobation of the conduct of the courts, and ordered that justice should be immediately done in the cause; but at the same time issued an order, directing the proceedings to be suspended as long as possible, suggesting as his reason for this, that in any event, his treasury must refund the deposit as soon as the cause should be decided; and that he had no money in his treasury to refund. This is said at the time when his Minister of Finance states in his exposé to the King, that the annual expense of the King's household amounts to seven millions of dollars. And this is what Don Onis calls "Immaculate Purity," and I would say that it caps the climax of Spanish villany and treachery. I challenge all history to produce its parallel. Are we not bound to protect this citizen against such a flagrant outrage? I read in the books that nations are in a state of nature, and have only two modes of compelling each other to do justice; war and reprisal. I say nothing of big words hung up in resolutions. They are the index of imbecility; the mask of cowardice. I abjure all hectoring, and gasconading, and gostering between nations or individuals. In this case war would only increase the injury by protracting the confinement. Reprisal is the only efficient remedy. The amendment before you proposes, that a law be passed, authorizing the President (in the event of a failure on the part of Spain, to liberate this citizen) to make reprisal by seizing a Spanish subject, a consul or vice consul, and confine him as a hostage. This will support the President in his late demand, and put a weapon in his hand to chastise the insolence which Spain may offer to this Government in the reply which she may make. So far as precedent goes, this amendment is supported by the law of 1799, which authorized and required the President, ADAMS, to make reprisals upon French citizens in the cases there mentioned. If examples are called for, they are to be found in the history of every nation. The world would never be at peace, if all causes of complaint were redressed by war. Humanity and sound policy approve the practice of reprisals, and require that it should sometimes be resorted to. Why should a nation change its peaceful habits, and gird on the armor of war, and waste millions to obtain redress for an injury, which can be redressed by the seizure and confinement of a single individual? Would you spill the blood and squander the treasure of your own people, where redress can be obtained by the pressure of coercion on the people of your adversary? Shall this outrage be placed upon the calendar of grievances, to be discussed upon thirteen years forbearance? Promptitude is justice in a case like this. If it must terminate in a war of words, we have proof positive that Mr. Adams can drive Don Onis from the field of battle; but, in my opinion, we have retreated far enough from Spain; and unless we make a stand upon reprisal, we shall take shelter behind the ramparts of disgrace.

When I had the honor of presenting the resolution for reprisals, some objection arose because it did not define the nature and extent of reprisals meditated. In this amendment I have attempted to obviate the objection. But it is due, in candor to the House and nation, that I should so explain myself, that no one can mistake me. In the event of a failure on the part of Spain to surrender Mr. Meade, upon the late demand, I would seize a Spanish subject and Consul of equal property and respectability, as a hostage; confine him at Castle William in the harbor of Boston, and treat him, in all respects, as it shall be made to appear that our citizen is treated at the Castle of Santa Catalina. That would be equal justice—subject for citizen, Consul for Consul, castle for castle, and treatment for treatment. No, sir, I humbly crave the pardon of my country—that would not be equal justice—for as "one day, one hour, of virtuous liberty is worth a whole eternity of bondage," so, also, one honest, upright, independent freeman is worth a kingdom, an empire, of servile, crouching, sycophantic Spanish slaves.

I will not say that this amendment has been drawn up with all the skill and scholar-craft which might have been employed in its production; but I will boldly affirm that the redress which it indicates, is more than justified by the case, and fully supported by the laws and usages of nations. I know not what others may think on this subject, but, for myself, I have no hope of redress but from coercion—for that sovereign who forfeits his word of honor, and brings his reputation and his justice into question, will not easily unhand his victim or forego his vengeance. I am, therefore, bold to say that I will use retortion. The States surrendered to the General Government the right of making reprisals; and, in their name, I ask you to exercise the power—I demand it in the name of the people. Gentlemen may shake their heads, if they mean to say that the demand is too broad—that I have no right to speak for them and their States. Then, sir, I demand it in the name of the people whom I represent—in the name of the State from whence I come. I know them, and can speak for them—I know their love of liberty and hatred of oppression, and will answer for their readiness to support the honor of the country, and their promptitude in chastising all infractions of personal liberty.

Mr. HOPKINSON, of Pennsylvania, expressed his belief that the report of the committee went as far as the duty of this House required it to go in such a matter. There was a limit beyond which it was improper to go, in an affair intrusted to the Executive; and Mr. H. hoped, that what had been done by the Executive would be found amply sufficient for all the purposes of this case. The first movement in this business had been made by this House; the President had, in consequence thereof, opened a correspondence with the Spanish Minister in a very decided and dignified manner; and the report of the committee is, that this House will support the Executive in any further measures to obtain the release of Mr. Meade, which shall be just and necessary. In doing more than this, at present, Mr. H. asked if the House might not proceed, without distinctly seeing the result? But Mr. H. wished to see something of the practical effect of the proposition; with that the gentleman had not favored the House. The resolution offered by the gentleman from Kentucky authorized the President to make reprisal for the imprisonment of Mr. Meade—to seize a Spanish subject, and confine him in prison until Meade shall be released. Now Mr. H. denied that this Congress could give the President any such despotic power. Every man in this country, whether foreigner or citizen, is under the protection of the laws. Who was the President to select for reprisal? Shall he, as is suggested, by some unknown process, seize a Consul, living under our laws, and lodge him in jail, uncharged with debt, or crime, or any violation whatever of the laws of the land? If despotic Governments do these things, we should avoid, not follow, the example. We, said Mr. H., must follow the course of the laws, and cannot depart from it. There was no process, he said, by which a man could be seized and imprisoned in this country, because a citizen was improperly imprisoned in a foreign country. There was nothing in the laws of nations, or our own laws, to justify it. The case quoted by Mr. TRIMBLE was an authority given to the President to make reprisals when we were actually in a state of war. Such acts might be proper in a time of war, but not in a time of peace like the present. Mr. H. admonished the House not to stretch this thing too far, in their anxiety to obtain justice for the citizen in question. He knew Mr. Meade and his family, and his feelings were as strongly excited to their sufferings as any gentleman's; and he wished to do every thing to produce his liberation which was consistent with propriety. Did the gentleman mean to make this a subject for war? Yet there was no act beyond the one proposed by him but war. What precedent, or law, Mr. H. asked, could the gentleman find for the reprisal he recommended, and what would prevent the judges from discharging any man, brought up by habeas corpus, from such an arrest? Mr. H. contended, that the report of the committee was sufficient for the present, and went far enough. Hereafter, after it was seen what effect the President's remonstrance should produce, stronger measures might be taken, if it should be found necessary—even war itself.

The question was then taken on Mr. TRIMBLE's substitute, and decided in the negative, only about fifteen rising in its favor; and the resolution reported by the select committee was agreed to without a division.

FRIDAY, April 10.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have disagreed to the amendment proposed by this House to the bill, entitled "An act to make valid certain acts of the justices of the peace in the district of Columbia." They have passed the bill, entitled "An act to provide for the publication of the laws of the United States, and for other purposes," with amendments. They have also passed bills of the following titles, viz: "An act for the relief of John Hall, late a major of marines;" and "An act in addition to an act to prohibit the introduction of slaves into any port or place within the jurisdiction of the United States, from and after the first day of January, in the year of our Lord, 1808, and to repeal certain parts of the same;" in which amendments and bills they ask the concurrence of this House.

Fugitives from Justice and Service.

A motion was made by Mr. PINDALL, that the House do now proceed to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate, to the bill, entitled "An act to provide for delivering up persons held to labor or service in any of the States or Territories, who shall escape into any other State or Territory." And the question being taken thereon, it was determined in the negative—yeas 63, nays 73, as follows:

MONDAY, April 20.

Six o'clock, P. M.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a resolution

* This seems to have been the end of the bill—the House refusing, at the end of the session, to take up the Senate amendments for consideration.

for the appointment of a joint committee to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him of the approaching recess of Congress; and have appointed a committee on their part.

The House took up the said resolution, and being read, it was concurred in by the House; and Mr. HARRISON and Mr. PITKIN were appointed a committee, conformably thereto, on the part of this House.

The said committee having reported that the President had no further communication to make to Congress, the SPEAKER adjourned the House until the third Monday in November next, the day fixed by law for the next meeting of the Congress of the United States.

FIFTEENTH CONGRESS.—SECOND SESSION.

BEGUN AT THE CITY OF WASHINGTON, NOVEMBER 16, 1818.

PROCEEDINGS IN THE SENATE.

MONDAY, November 16, 1818.

The second session of the Fifteenth Congress commenced this day at the city of Washington, conformably to the act passed the 18th of April, 1818, entitled "An act fixing the time for the next meeting of Congress;" and the Senate assembled.

PRESENT:

DAVID L. MORRILL, from the State of New Hampshire.

PRENTISS MELLEN, from Massachusetts.

JAMES BURRILL, junior, from Rhode Island and Providence Plantations.

ISAAC TICHENOR and WILLIAM A. PALMER, from Vermont.

DAVID DAGGETT, from Connecticut.

RUFUS KING and NATHAN SANFORD, from New York.

MAHLON DICKERSON and JAMES J. WILSON, from New Jersey.

ABNER LACOCK and JONATHAN ROBERTS, from Pennsylvania.

ROBERT H. GOLDSBOROUGH, from Maryland.

JAMES BARBOUR and JOHN W. EPPES, from Virginia.

NATHANIEL MACON, from North Carolina.

JOHN GAILLARD and WILLIAM, SMITH, from South Carolina.

JOHN WILLIAMS and JOHN HENRY EATON, from Tennessee.

BENJAMIN RUGGLES, from Ohio.

ELEGIUS FROMENTIN and HENRY JOHNSON, from Louisiana.

JAMES NOBLE and WALLER TAYLOR, from Indiana.

WALTER LEAKE and THOMAS H. WILLIAMS, from Mississippi.

JOHN GAILLARD, President pro tempore, resumed the Chair.

PRENTISS MELLEN, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Massachusetts, to supply the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Eli P. Ashmun; WILLIAM A. PALMER, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Vermont, to supply the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of James Fisk; and JOHN HENRY EATON, appointed a Senator by the Executive of the State of Tennessee, to supply the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of George W. Campbell, respectively produced their credentials, were qualified, and took their seats in the Senate.

A quorum being present, a message was sent to the House of Representatives, notifying that body of the fact.

A committee was appointed, jointly with a committee to be appointed by the other House, for the purpose of waiting on the President of the United States, to inform him that the two Houses were organized, &c. Messrs. MACON and DAGGETT were appointed of the committee on the part of the Senate.

TUESDAY, November 17.

JEREMIAH MORROW, from the State of Ohio; and ALEXANDER C. HANSON, from the State of Maryland, attended this day.

President's Message.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Fellow-citizens of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

The auspicious circumstances under which you will commence the duties of the present session will lighten the burdens inseparable from the high trust committed to you. The fruits of the earth have been unusually abundant; commerce has flourished; the revenue has exceeded the most favorable anticipation, and peace and amity are preserved with foreign nations on conditions just and honorable to our country. For these inestimable blessings we cannot but be grateful to that Providence which watches over the destiny of nations.

As the term limited for the operation of the commercial convention with Great Britain will expire early in the month of July next, and it was deemed important that there should be no interval, during which that portion of our commerce, which was provided for by that convention, should not be regulated, either by arrangements between the two Governments, or by the authority of Congress, the Minister of the United States at London was instructed, early in the last Summer, to invite the attention of the British Government to the subject, with a view to that object. He was instructed to propose, also, that the negotiation which it was wished to open, might extend to the general commerce of the two countries, and to every other interest and unsettled difference between them; particularly those relating to impressment, fisheries, and boundaries, in the hope that an arrangement might be made, on principles of reciprocal advantage, which might comprehend and provide, in a satisfactory manner, for all these high concerns. I have the satisfaction to state, that the proposal was received by the British Government in the spirit which prompted it, and that a negotiation has been opened at London embracing all these objects. On full consideration of the great extent and magnitude of the trust, it was thought proper to commit it to not less than two of our distinguished citizens, and, in consequence, the Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States at Paris has been associated with our Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary at London; to both of whom corresponding instructions have been given; and they are now engaged in the discharge of its duties. It is proper to add, that, to prevent any inconvenience resulting from the delay incident to a negotiation on so many important subjects, it was agreed, before entering on it, that the existing convention should be continued for a term not less than eight years.

Our relations with Spain remain nearly in the state in which they were at the close of the last session. The convention of 1802, providing for the adjustment of a certain portion of the claims of our citizens for injuries sustained by spoliation, and so long suspended by the Spanish Government, has at length been ratified by it; but no arrangement has yet been made for the payment of another portion of like claims, not less extensive or well founded, or for other classes of claims, or for the settlement of boundaries. These subjects have again been brought under consideration in both countries, but no agreement has been entered into respecting them. In the mean time events have occurred, which clearly prove the ill effect of the policy which that Government has so long pursued, on the friendly relations of the two countries, which, it is presumed, it is at least of as much importance to Spain, as to the United States, to maintain. A state of things has existed in the Floridas, the tendency of which has been obvious to all who have paid the slightest attention to the progress of affairs in that quarter. Throughout the whole of those provinces to which the Spanish title extends, the Government of Spain has scarcely been felt. Its authority has been confined almost exclusively to the walls of Pensacola and St. Augustine, within which only small garrisons have been maintained. Adventurers from every country, fugitives from justice, and absconding slaves, have found an asylum there. Several tribes of Indians, strong in the number of their warriors, remarkable for their ferocity, and whose settlements extend to our limits, inhabit those provinces. These different hordes of people, connected together, disregarding, on the one side, the authority of Spain, and protected, on the other, by an imaginary line, which separates Florida from the United States, have violated our laws prohibiting the introduction of slaves, have practised various frauds on our revenue, and committed every kind of outrage on our peaceable citizens, which their proximity to us enabled them to perpetrate. The invasion of Amelia Island, last year, by a small band of adventurers, not exceeding one hundred and fifty in number, who wrested it from the inconsiderable Spanish force stationed there and held it several months, during which, a single effort only was made to recover it, which failed, clearly proves how completely extinct the Spanish authority had become, as the conduct of those adventurers, while in possession of the island, as distinctly shows the pernicious purposes for which their combination had been formed.

This country had, in fact, become the theatre of every species of lawless adventure. With little population of its own, the Spanish authority almost extinct, and the colonial governments in a state of revolution, having no pretension to it, and sufficiently employed in their own concerns, it was in a great measure derelict, and the object of cupidity to every adventurer. A system of buccaneering was rapidly organizing over it, which menaced, in its consequences, the lawful commerce of every nation, and particularly of the United States; while it presented a temptation to every people, on whose seduction its success principally depended. In regard to the United States, the pernicious effect of this unlawful combination was not confined to the ocean. The Indian tribes have constituted the effective force in Florida. With these tribes these adventurers had formed at an early period, a connection, with a view to avail themselves of that force, to promote their own projects of accumulation and aggrandizement. It is to the interference of some of these adventurers, in misrepresenting the claims and titles of the Indians to land, and in practising on their savage propensities, that the Seminole war is principally to be traced. Men who thus connect themselves with savage communities, and stimulate them to war, which is always attended, on their part, with acts of barbarity the most shocking, deserve to be viewed in a worse light than the savages. They would certainly have no claim to an immunity from the punishment which, according to the rules of warfare practised by the savages, might justly be inflicted on the savages themselves.

If the embarrassments of Spain prevented her from making an indemnity to our citizens, for so long a time, from her treasury, for their losses by spoliation and otherwise, it was always in her power to have provided it, by the cession of this territory. Of this her Government has been repeatedly apprised, and the cession was the more to have been anticipated, as Spain must have known that, in ceding it, she would, in effect, cede what had become of little value to her, and would likewise relieve herself from the important obligation secured by the treaty of 1795, and all other compromitments respecting it. If the United States, from consideration of these embarrassments, declined pressing their claims in a spirit of hostility, the motive ought, at least, to have been duly appreciated by the Government of Spain. It is well known to her Government that other powers have made to the United States an indemnity for like losses sustained by their citizens at the same epoch.

There is, nevertheless, a limit, beyond which this spirit of amity and forbearance can in no instance be justified. If it was proper to rely on amicable negotiation for an indemnity of losses, it would not have been so to have permitted the inability of Spain to fulfil her engagements, and to sustain her authority in the Floridas, to be perverted, by foreign adventurers and savages, to purposes so destructive to the lives of our fellow-citizens, and the highest interests of the United States. The right of self-defence never ceases. It is among the most sacred, and alike necessary to nations and individuals. And, whether the attack be made by Spain herself, or by those who abuse her power, its obligation is not the less strong. The invaders of Amelia Island had assumed a popular and respected title, under which they might approach and wound us. As their object was distinctly seen, and the duty imposed on the Executive, by an existing law, was profoundly felt, that mask was not permitted to protect them. It was thought incumbent on the United States to suppress the establishment, and it was accordingly done. The combination in Florida, for the unlawful purposes stated, the acts perpetrated by that combination, and, above all, the incitement of the Indians, to massacre our fellow-citizens, of every age, and of both sexes, merited a like treatment, and received it. In pursuing these savages to an imaginary line, in the woods, it would have been the height of folly to have suffered that line to protect them. Had that been done, the war could never cease. Even if the territory had been, exclusively, that of Spain, and her power complete over it, we had a right, by the law of nations, to follow the enemy on it, and to subdue him there. But the territory belonged, in a certain sense, at least, to the savage enemy who inhabited it; the power of Spain had ceased to exist over it, and protection was sought, under her title, by those who had committed on our citizens hostilities which she was bound by treaty to have prevented, but had not the power to prevent. To have stopped at that line would have given new encouragement to these savages, and new vigor to the whole combination existing there, in the prosecution of all its pernicious purposes.

In suppressing the establishment at Amelia Island, no unfriendliness was manifested towards Spain, because the post was taken from a force which had wrested it from her. The measure, it is true, was not adopted in concert with the Spanish Government, or those in authority under it; because, in transactions connected with the war in which Spain and the colonies are engaged, it was thought proper, in doing justice to the United States, to maintain a strict impartiality towards both the belligerent parties, without consulting or acting in concert with either. It gives me pleasure to state, that the Governments of Buenos Ayres and Venezuela, whose names were assumed, have explicitly disclaimed all participation in those measures, and even the knowledge of them, until communicated by this Government, and have also expressed their satisfaction that a course of proceedings had been suppressed, which, if justly imputable to them, would dishonor their cause.

In authorizing Major General Jackson to enter Florida, in pursuit of the Seminoles, care was taken not to encroach on the rights of Spain. I regret to have to add, that, in executing this order, facts were disclosed respecting the conduct of the officers of Spain, in authority there, in encouraging the war, furnishing munitions of war, and other supplies, to carry it on, and in other acts, not less marked, which evinced their participation in the hostile purposes of that combination, and justified the confidence with which it inspired the savages, that, by those officers they would be protected. A conduct so incompatible with the friendly relations existing between the two countries, particularly with the positive obligation of the 5th article of the treaty of 1795, by which Spain was bound to restrain, even by force, those savages, from acts of hostility against the United States, could not fail to excite surprise. The Commanding General was convinced that he should fail in his object; that he should in effect accomplish nothing, if he did not deprive those savages of the resource on which they had calculated, and of the protection on which they had relied in making the war. As all the documents relating to this occurrence will be laid before Congress, it is not necessary to enter into further detail respecting it.

Although the reasons which induced Major General Jackson to take these posts were duly appreciated, there was, nevertheless, no hesitation in deciding on the course which it became the Government to pursue. As there was reason to believe that the commanders of these posts had violated their instructions, there was no disposition to impute to their Government a conduct so unprovoked and hostile. An order was in consequence issued to the General in command there to deliver the posts—Pensacola, unconditionally to any person duly authorized to receive it; and St. Marks, which is in the heart of the Indian country, on the arrival of a competent force, to defend it against those savages and their associates.

In entering Florida to suppress this combination, no idea was entertained of hostility to Spain, and, however justifiable the Commanding General was, in consequence of the misconduct of the Spanish officers, in entering St. Marks and Pensacola, to terminate it, by proving to the savages and their associates that they should not be protected even there; yet the amicable relations existing between the United States and Spain could not be altered by that act alone. By ordering the restitution of the posts, those relations were preserved. To a change of them the power of the Executive is deemed incompetent. It is vested in Congress only.

By this measure, so promptly taken, due respect was shown to the Government of Spain. The misconduct of her officers has not been imputed to her. She was enabled to review with candor her relations with the United States, and her own situation, particularly in respect to the territory in question, with the dangers inseparable from it; and, regarding the losses we have sustained, for which indemnity has been so long withheld, and the injuries we have suffered through that territory, and her means of redress, she was likewise enabled to take, with honor, the course best calculated to do justice to the United States, and to promote her own welfare.

Copies of the instructions to the Commanding General; of his correspondence with the Secretary of War, explaining his motives, and justifying his conduct, with a copy of the proceedings of the courts-martial, in the trial of Arbuthnot and Ambrister; and of the correspondence between the Secretary of State and the Minister Plenipotentiary of Spain near this Government: and of the Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States, at Madrid, with the Government of Spain, will be laid before Congress.

The civil war, which has so long prevailed between Spain and the provinces in South America, still continues without any prospect of its speedy termination.

The information respecting the condition of those countries, which has been collected by the Commissioners, recently returned from thence, will be laid before Congress, in copies of their reports, with such other information as has been received from other agents of the United States.

It appears, from these communications, that the Government of Buenos Ayres declared itself independent in July, 1816, having previously exercised the power of an independent Government, though in the name of the King of Spain, from the year 1810: that the Banda Oriental, Entre Rios, and Paraguay, with the city of Santa Fe, all of which are also independent, are unconnected with the present Government of Buenos Ayres: that Chili has declared itself independent, and is closely connected with Buenos Ayres; that Venezuela has also declared itself independent, and now maintains the conflict with various success; and that the remaining parts of South America, except Montevideo, and such other portions of the eastern bank of the La Plata as are held by Portugal, are still in the possession of Spain, or, in a certain degree, under her influence.

By a circular note addressed by the Ministers of Spain to the allied powers with whom they are respectively accredited, it appears that the allies have undertaken to mediate between Spain and the South American provinces, and that the manner and extent of their interposition would be settled by a Congress, which was to have met at Aix-la-Chapelle in September last. From the general policy and course of proceeding observed by the allied powers in regard to this contest, it is inferred that they will confine their interposition to the expression of their sentiments; abstaining from the application of force. I state this impression, that force will not be applied, with the greater satisfaction, because it is a course more consistent with justice, and likewise authorizes a hope that the calamities of the war will be confined to the parties only, and will be of shorter duration.

From the view taken of this subject, founded on all the information that we have been able to obtain, there is good cause to be satisfied with the course heretofore pursued by the United States, in regard to this contest, and to conclude, that it is proper to adhere to it, especially in the present state of affairs.

I have great satisfaction in stating, that our relations with France, Russia, and other powers, continue on the most friendly basis.

In our domestic concerns we have ample cause of satisfaction. The receipts into the Treasury, during the three first quarters of the year, have exceeded seventeen millions of dollars.

After satisfying all the demands which have been made under existing appropriations, including the final extinction of the old six per cent. stock, and the redemption of a moiety of the Louisiana debt, it is estimated that there will remain in the Treasury, on the first day of January next, more than two millions of dollars.

It is ascertained that the gross revenue which has accrued from the customs during the same period amounts to twenty-one millions of dollars, and that the revenue of the whole year may be estimated at not less than twenty-six millions. The sale of the public lands during the year has also greatly exceeded, both in quantity and price, that of any former year; and there is just reason to expect a progressive improvement in that source of revenue.

It is gratifying to know, that, although the annual expenditure has been increased by the act of the last session of Congress, providing for Revolutionary pensions, to an amount about equal to the proceeds of the internal duties, which were then repealed, the revenue for the ensuing year will be proportionally augmented, and that, while the public expenditure will probably remain stationary, each successive year will add to the national resources, by the ordinary increase of our population, and by the gradual development of our latent sources of national prosperity.

The strict execution of the revenue laws, resulting principally from the salutary provisions of the act of the 20th of April last, amending the several collection laws, has, it is presumed, secured to domestic manufactures all the relief that can be derived from the duties which have been imposed upon foreign merchandise, for their protection. Under the influence of this relief, several branches of this important national interest have assumed greater activity, and, although it is hoped that others will gradually revive, and ultimately triumph over every obstacle, yet the expediency of granting further protection is submitted to your consideration.

The measures of defence, authorized by existing laws, have been pursued with the zeal and activity due to so important an object, and with all the despatch practicable in so extensive and great an undertaking. The survey of our maritime and inland frontiers has been continued; and, at the points where it was decided to erect fortifications, the work has been commenced, and, in some instances, considerable progress has been made. In compliance with resolutions of the last session, the Board of Commissioners were directed to examine in a particular manner the parts of the coast therein designated, and to report their opinion of the most suitable sites for two naval depots. This work is in a train of execution. The opinion of the Board on this subject, with a plan of all the works necessary to a general system of defence, so far as it has been formed, will be laid before Congress, in a report from the proper department, as soon as it can be prepared.

In conformity with the appropriations of the last session, treaties have been formed with the Quapaw tribe of Indians, inhabiting the country on the Arkansas, and with the Great and Little Osages north of the White River; with the tribes in the State of Indiana; with the several tribes within the State of Ohio, and the Michigan Territory; and with the Chickasaws; by which very extensive cessions of territory have been made to the United States. Negotiations are now depending with the tribes in the Illinois Territory, and with the Choctaws, by which it is expected that other extensive cessions will be made. I take great interest in stating that the cessions already made, which are considered so important to the United States, have been obtained on conditions very satisfactory to the Indians.

With a view to the security of our inland frontiers, it has been thought expedient to establish strong posts at the mouth of Yellow Stone River, and at the Mandan village, on the Missouri: and at the mouth of St. Peters, on the Mississippi, at no great distance from our northern boundaries. It can hardly be presumed, while such posts are maintained in the rear of the Indian tribes, that they will venture to attack our peaceable inhabitants. A strong hope is entertained that this measure will likewise be productive of much good to the tribes themselves; especially in promoting the great object of their civilization. Experience has clearly demonstrated, that independent savage communities cannot long exist within the limits of a civilized population. The progress of the latter has, almost invariably, terminated in the extinction of the former, especially of the tribes belonging to our portion of this hemisphere, among whom, loftiness of sentiment, and gallantry in action, have been conspicuous. To civilize them, and even to prevent their extinction, it seems to be indispensable that their independence, as communities, should cease, and that the control of the United States over them should be complete and undisputed. The hunter state will then be more easily abandoned, and recourse will be had to the acquisition and culture of land, and to other pursuits tending to dissolve the ties which connect them together as a savage community, and to give a new character to every individual. I present this subject to the consideration of Congress, on the presumption that it may be found expedient and practicable to adopt some benevolent provisions, having these objects in view, relative to the tribes within our settlements.

It has been necessary, during the present year, to maintain a strong naval force in the Mediterranean, and in the Gulf of Mexico, and to send some public ships along the Southern coast, and to the Pacific Ocean. By these means, amicable relations with the Barbary Powers have been preserved, our commerce has been protected, and our rights respected. The augmentation of our Navy is advancing, with a steady progress, towards the limit contemplated by law.

I communicate, with great satisfaction, the accession of another State, Illinois, to our Union; because I perceive, from the proof afforded by the additions already made, the regular progress and sure consummation of a policy of which history affords no example, and of which the good effect cannot be too highly estimated. By extending our Government, on the principles of our constitution, over the vast territory within our limits, on the lakes and the Mississippi, and its numerous streams, new life and vigor are infused into every part of our system. By increasing the number of the States, the confidence of the State governments in their own security is increased, and their jealousy of the National Government proportionally diminished. The impracticability of one consolidated Government for this great and growing nation will be more apparent, and will be universally admitted. Incapable of exercising local authority, except for general purposes, the General Government will no longer be dreaded. In those cases of a local nature, and for all the great purposes for which it was instituted, its authority will be cherished. Each Government will acquire new force and a greater freedom of action, within its proper sphere. Other inestimable advantages will follow: our produce will be augmented to an incalculable amount, in articles of the greatest value for domestic use and foreign commerce. Our navigation will, in like degree, be increased; and, as the shipping of the Atlantic States will be employed in the transportation of the vast produce of the Western country, even those parts of the United States which are most remote from each other, will be further bound together by the strongest ties which mutual interest can create.

The situation of this District, it is thought, requires the attention of Congress. By the constitution, the power of legislation is exclusively vested in the Congress of the United States. In the exercise of this power, in which the people have no participation, Congress legislate in all cases, directly on the local concerns of the District. As this is a departure, for a special purpose, from the general principles of our system, it may merit consideration, whether an arrangement better adapted to the principles of our Government, and to the particular interests of the people, may not be devised, which will neither infringe the constitution, nor affect the object which the provision in question was intended to secure. The growing population, already considerable, and the increasing business of the District, which it is believed already interferes with the deliberations of Congress on great national concerns, furnish additional motives for recommending this subject to your consideration.

When we view the great blessings with which our country has been favored, those which we now enjoy, and the means which we possess of handing them down, unimpaired, to our latest posterity, our attention is irresistibly drawn to the source from whence they flow. Let us then unite in offering our most grateful acknowledgments for these blessings to the Divine Author of all Good.

Deported Slaves.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate of the United States:

In compliance with the resolution of the Senate, of the 25th of last month, requesting to be furnished with such information as may be possessed by the Executive, touching the execution of so much of the first article of the late Treaty of Peace and Amity between His Britannic Majesty and the United States, as relates to the restitution of slaves, and which has not heretofore been communicated, I lay before the Senate a report made by the Secretary of State, on the 1st instant, in relation to that subject.

JAMES MONROE.

DECEMBER 2, 1818.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Dec. 1, 1818.

The Secretary of State, to whom has been referred the resolution of the Senate, of the 13th ultimo, requesting information not heretofore communicated, relating to restitution of slaves, conformably to the first article of the late Treaty of Peace between the United States and Great Britain, has the honor of reporting to the President of the United States, that the difference of construction given by the two Governments to that part of the first article of the Treaty, and the claim of the citizens of the United States to indemnity for slaves carried away contrary to its stipulations, form one of the subjects of negotiation now pending in England; which negotiation having commenced towards the close of the month of August, no report of its progress has yet been received at this Department, from the Plenipotentiaries, to whom, on the part of the United States, it has been committed.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

The Message and documents were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

FRIDAY, December 4.

WILLIAM HUNTER, from the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, attended this day.

NINIAN EDWARDS and JESSE B. THOMAS, respectively appointed Senators by the Legislature of the State of Illinois, produced their credentials, were qualified, and took their seats in the Senate.

Memorial of Matthew Lyon.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the memorial of Matthew Lyon, of Eddyville, in the State of Kentucky, praying reimbursement of a certain fine, imposed in the year 1798, at the suit of the United States, together with the costs and other losses attending the same, to wit: "That the prayer of the petition ought not to be granted." Whereupon,

Mr. CRITTENDEN submitted the following motion as an amendment:

Resolved, That all persons, who were prosecuted and fined under and by virtue of the second section of the act of Congress, commonly called the sedition law, approved the 14th day of July, 1798, and entitled "An act in addition to the act entitled 'An act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States,'" ought to be reimbursed and indemnified out of the public Treasury, to the amount of the fines imposed upon, and paid by them, respectively.

Mr. CRITTENDEN said he considered the sedition act as having been unconstitutional, not only from a defect of power in Congress to pass such a law, but because its passage was expressly forbidden by the constitution. The sense of the nation had unquestionably pronounced it unconstitutional, and that opinion being generally entertained, it ought to be solemnly pronounced by the Legislature, that history and the records of the country may not hand it down to posterity as a precedent for acts of similar usurpation. If a revision of the proceedings in that case was important in a public point of view, it was certainly so as it related to the individuals who became the subjects of prosecution under that act. To each of them, and to every citizen of the United States, the Constitution of the United States had guaranteed certain rights, which had been violated by that law. This guarantee entitled them to indemnity in cases wherein those rights were violated; of this indemnity, the decision of courts ought not to deprive them. If they did, he said, there is no redeeming spirit in the constitution. Legal sanctions cannot vitiate constitutional provisions. The Judiciary is a valuable part of Government, and ought to be highly respected; but is not infallible. The constitution is our guide—our supreme law. Blind homage can never be rendered by freemen to any power. In all cases of alleged violations of the constitution, it was for Congress to make a just discrimination. In doubtful cases, he said, he would not interfere; but, when the constitution forbade a law, he would not hesitate to interpose for the relief of those who suffered by its inflictions. The case now before the Senate, he considered a fair case for the interposition of Congress. It had a peculiar character. The individual had a right to remuneration; this right ought not to be sacrificed to contingencies, or to speculative opinions. We may not do wrong that right may come of it. Justice to the individuals, to the constitution, to the country, all required this course. Let us add, said Mr. C., new defences and guards to the constitution in this assailable point. Let us secure it, as far as in our power, from future infraction on the ground of precedent.

Mr. BURRILL said he hoped the amendment would not prevail. If it was negatived, the gentleman would yet have it in his power to try the general question by introducing a bill embracing his proposition. But, Mr. B. said, not a fact alleged in the petition now before the Senate was supported by any proof, though the facts were extraordinary in their nature, and not to be believed without proof. The petitioner had asked relief from Congress, on the ground of not having had a fair trial. Ought not this to be proved, instead of being merely asserted? He had called Judge Patterson a second Jeffries, himself an Algernon Sydney; but this was not a ground on which the Senate could found a legislative act. The question regarding the constitutionality of the act of Congress, which had been agitated, Mr. B. said he would not argue; not that he had any doubts on the subject, but because it was unnecessary now to discuss it. The question really before the Senate was one which could be discussed without reference to the character of Judge Patterson, and without reflecting on the administration of justice in the courts of our country. The facts alleged were not proved, and Mr. B. believed they were not susceptible of proof.

Mr. BARBOUR said he had not intended to speak on this question, unless impelled by an imperious sense of duty. He was happy, he said, that the question presented to the Senate, instead of being decided on the merit or demerit of an individual, was to be decided on the broad ground of principle. Was the course proposed in the amendment, he asked, an unusual course? Was it not a daily practice to include all who were in the same predicament in the same remedy? An individual, Mr. B. said, was responsible for any charges he made; and they are not to be received as facts until satisfactorily proved. Let not, therefore, the great constitutional question now presented rest on the merit of the claim of a single individual, or be encumbered by questions of fact peculiar to an isolated case. The true question now to be decided, was, did the Government, by the sedition act of 1798, from improper motives of party feelings, violate the constitution and oppress individuals? If they did, ought not the new trustees to whom the people had confided their authority, to remedy the evil as far as in their power? The public sentiment, he said, called upon Congress to repair the wrongs which had been inflicted, and to administer, like the good Samaritan, the healing balm to every wound. This, he thought, was a propitious moment to retrace the former steps, in deference to the opinion of the people, and erect a barrier against the recurrence of similar aggressions of power on inherent and constitutional right. This, he said, was not the tribunal to take cognizance of judicial delinquency: that was the province of the other House. But it was quite within the power of this body, as one branch of the Legislature, to pronounce that those who gave the authority exercised by the judiciary had no right to do so, and that, therefore, the judiciary had proceeded unconstitutionally in executing the law, the constitution being the paramount law. He believed, he said, our courts were the purest in the world; but those who composed them were mere men, and some of them, possibly, bad men. Was there any thing, he asked, in the ermine robe, which conferred on the wearer exemption from human frailties? It was rather calculated to inflate the vanity, and increase the confidence of the judge in his own infallibility. He would not, he said, act indelicately towards the judiciary, or any member of it; but, in regard to the violation of the constitution, in the passage and execution of the sedition law, a tribunal from which there was no appeal, had decided on it. There was among the people, at this day, scarcely a dissentient voice on that subject. Would the decision of four or five individuals counterbalance this unanimous opinion? The sedition act, Mr. B. proceeded to say, was one of the most conspicuous among the acts of misrule, in consequence of which the party who then held the reins of Government was precipitated from power. The law, he said, was unconstitutional, and Congress ought to say so, and to repair the ravages made under color of its authority.

Mr. OTIS said, this debate was wholly unexpected by him, until the gentleman from Kentucky gave him an intimation a day or two ago, that he intended to oppose the report of the committee. He did not then intend to interfere, as he believed the few observations he might make would be wholly unprofitable; and nothing but some allusions which had been made, would induce him to address the Senate. He was the only member of Congress, now in the Senate, who voted for the sedition law; and there were but four or five in the other House, who had aided in passing this law. It might be expected he would let the world see he was not ashamed of his old friends, nor of his old principles. He was not now an advocate for a sedition law. The public opinion, as clearly ascertained, forbade it. He respected this opinion as sincerely as those who much oftener referred to it. It was his inclination, as well as his duty, to conform to it. But, though he would not repeat the offence, he could not repent it. In supporting that law on its passage, he acted from a sense of duty. Those who acted with him, were governed by motives equally honorable. He admitted the law was inexpedient, but he thought gentlemen mistaken when they pronounced it unconstitutional. This question had been ably discussed, as well by those who were opposed to the law, as by those who advocated it; and he should not now enter deeply into the subject. Every Government had an inherent right to punish offences which endangered its existence; and on this definition he relied for a justification of the law. If the President and Congress were convinced there was a *necessity for such a law, they had a right to enact it. It was passed in a period of great danger and alarm. It was true, it had been said these were chimerical. He trusted this would not now be said. It was a period of war, and of threatened invasion. Our ministers of peace had been spurned by the French Republic, who had demanded more money. The nation was preparing to resist. At this moment the law was passed. It was a measure of defence—a part of the general system. Of this system WASHINGTON approved, and accepted the command of the army. Mr. O. did not wish to excite unpleasant feelings, and would endeavor to avoid it. There was one argument more he would urge. Had gentlemen lately read the law? If they had, they would remember that its second section only punished the publication of false, scandalous, and malicious matter, and admitted the truth to be given in the defence. He had always been surprised that this section was found fault with, while the first section, defining a conspiracy, and prescribing its punishment, had been passed over without animadversion. The law was doubtless inexpedient, but it was not new in principle. Similar provisions existed in several of the States; and this act was deemed essential for the defence of the constitution and its authorities. It was not intended to affect the poor individuals who became its victims; but it was thought that France, who was everywhere endeavoring to extend her influence by intrigue and corruption, would, by her agents, busy herself in our concerns, and that the provisions of this act were necessary to defeat their efforts, and preserve the Government. No matter whether those apprehensions were unfounded or not—they existed. Nor need it be wondered at. We had since seen and heard it asserted, that the finger of Great Britain was discovered in the proceedings of men, whose principles, services, lives, families, and fortunes were certain pledges of their fidelity to their country. But, admitting that gentlemen are correct, and that indelible stigma should be stamped on the law and its authors, can Congress remedy the wrong done? We have no constitutional power to declare any law unconstitutional, in any other mode than by repealing it. If gentlemen thought we had, he would thank them to point out the clause. They could not do it. We have no such power. The Judiciary could do justice in such cases, but the Legislature cannot.

Mr. SMITH said, that, being of the committee who reported against the petition, and of opinion that the prayer of it ought not to be granted, he deemed it a duty to offer his reasons for differing from the gentlemen from Kentucky and Virginia. He was in favor of the report, and against the amendment. His political principles were and always had been republican or (as they had been formerly called, by way of reproach) democratic. His principles had never changed, nor was it probable they ever would. He was sorry gentlemen had gone so deep into the question, as it might awaken feelings which had better be permitted to slumber. When the sedition law passed, public opinion revolted against its principles and provisions, not because it was unconstitutional, but because of the temper manifested in enacting and executing it, which induced a belief that the object was to crush all opposition to the party in power. That party were continually pouring in addresses upon the President, applauding his measures, and denouncing those who differed from them in opinion. The very children presented their adulatory offerings; and it was remarked by some one at the time, that the President had as many addresses in his bureau as James the First had. The Democrats were denounced, and the President called on to remove them all from office; and on every removal of one of them, addresses were sent to the President approbating his conduct. This created the alarm. To this violence the sedition law owed the opposition it experienced, and not to the belief that it was unconstitutional. The times were not now what they were in 1798. The Government now admitted its opponents to a participation in its offices, and its friends did not clamor for their dismissal.

But he would drop this subject, and return to the question. The gentlemen from Massachusetts and Rhode Island justly opposed the assumption by Congress to decide on the constitutionality of a law. Our constitution had very properly separated the powers of Government—the Executive, Legislative, and Judicial. They should be kept separate. The Judiciary was to construe laws. Congress could not reverse their decisions, nor repair their injuries. When they had passed a law, and the President signed it, they could not touch it, unless to repeal or amend it. The opinions of legal men ought to have great weight. The Judiciary was composed of such. They were selected for their legal acquirements. They deliberated well before they decided. They would not have stooped to party purposes, but they gave the law its full operation. This could give Congress no right to interfere. Are you to presume the judges were perjured and prostituted? We ought not to do so without proof; and we have here only the suggestions and recollections of eighteen or twenty years ago. And he must here say, the petitioner had here given evidence that he can now write bitterly, if he did not then. He appealed to gentlemen who had professionally studied law, whether the sedition act was unconstitutional. He was not satisfied it was so, but inclined to think otherwise. In this case at least, the applicant ought not to be believed, as there was no evidence of the truth of his allegations. In the infancy of our Government, the common law of England was adopted. This forbade the proof of any fact alleged, and was much more severe than the sedition law. Under the common law, instead of admitting the truth as a justification, "The greater the truth, the greater the libel." The jury could only decide on the fact of publication, and the court could fine and imprison at their discretion. There was no offence punishable by the sedition act but was indictable at common law, save perhaps in a single case; and while under the former the truth might be given in evidence, and the jury had cognizance both of law and fact, under the latter the truth but aggravated the offence, and the offender was at the mercy of the court. The sedition law was therefore an amelioration of the common law. But the great evil was in the spirit which prevailed in its enaction and administration.

Mr. MACON had hoped the resolution would be discussed on its merits, as it did not even mention Matthew Lyon's name. The true question was, will you review the proceedings under the sedition law, now, while party spirit is hushed, and all is calm? This calm he did not wish to disturb. But if you agree to the report, and reject the petition, how will you bring the question before you? He was told the precedent would be dangerous. He would meet this at once. If any party in power thought it their duty to follow it, let them do so. He did not admire precedent more than the gentleman from South Carolina, but, when wrong was done, it ought to be righted. The adoption of the constitution, and the state of things abroad and at home, which ensued, had excited heats in the country; and he supposed both parties were sometimes wrong. The country is now peaceful, and we can act free from prejudice or party. He should not attempt to discuss the constitutionality of the sedition law. He had often been heard on this subject, and he supposed every man had made up his mind on the question. If the Senate was satisfied the law was unconstitutional, they ought to adopt the resolution; if they had doubts, they ought to reject it. Some facts were stated in the petition not known to him; but he believed Matthew Lyon had remunerated all the members who advanced money to relieve him from his fine. According to some gentleman we were to regard the judiciary more than the law, and both more than the constitution. It was a misfortune the judges were not equal in infallibility to the God who made them. The truth was, if the judge was a party man out of power, he would be a party man in. The office would not change human nature. He had no doubt that the sedition law, and the proceedings under it, had more effect in revolutionizing the Government than all its other acts. He well remembered the language of the times—pay your taxes, but don't speak against Government. The gentleman from Massachusetts admits the inexpediency of the law, but not its unconstitutionality. This was of itself a great concession. Would he, or the gentleman from South Carolina, put his finger on the clause of the constitution which authorized that law? He would not impute evil motives—he had nothing to do with them, but with acts. He would have preferred a silent vote; but, being referred to in the petition, he could not be silent. Money is paid back daily from the Treasury to individuals, without its being called revising the decision of the judges. He did not agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts about the powers of the Government. That gentleman thought it might do any act necessary to its preservation. He, Mr. M., believed it could not go beyond the constitution. We have in this country two governments. The constitution defines the powers of the General Government, and leaves the State governments untouched. He thought the position clear, that if there was no constitutional power to pass the law, the money was taken wrongfully, and ought to be restored. Mr. MACON was sorry the names of judges had been introduced. We ought to pass lightly over the ashes of the dead. Let them sleep quietly with their fathers—he would not disturb them.

The Senate adjourned, without taking the question.

WEDNESDAY, December 9.

Memorial of Matthew Lyon.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Judiciary Committee unfavorable to the petition of Matthew Lyon; Mr. CRITTENDEN's motion to reverse the report, and to make general provision for the indemnification of all similar cases occurring under the sedition law, being yet under consideration:

Mr. MORRILL said, the discussion had taken a course which was unexpected; and he felt it a duty to make some remarks, and assign the reasons which would govern his vote. The question turned on the constitutionality of the sedition law. He was opposed to the resolution, because he believed the law constitutional. The law only punished false, licentious, and malicious writings. The constitution did not mean to prohibit a law to punish these. It was intended to cherish virtue and morality, and to preserve our rights and privileges; and which of these did we esteem higher than reputation? The constitution prohibited any law abridging the freedom of speech or of the press. Now, freedom and liberty are synonymous and convertible terms. The law was not intended to abridge the liberty of the press, but its licentiousness. The second section allowed the truth to be given in evidence. If the publication was licentious, the charge could not be supported, and the offender would be punished. If it contained facts, they could be maintained, and an acquittal would take place. He was opposed to the resolution on another ground—this was not the proper tribunal to decide the question of unconstitutionality. The judiciary was the proper tribunal. If Congress should indemnify in one case, they might in others—and where would we stop? All would be confusion and uncertainty.

Mr. CRITTENDEN felt himself bound to reply to some observations which had been made. The public voice had determined the unconstitutionality of the sedition law: it had removed one party from power, and elevated another. He had expected Congress would confirm the decision of the people. He should be sorry if he were disappointed; but it would be a great consolation that the opinion of the nation was with him. If the law was a violation of the national compact, which guaranteed to every individual freedom to speak and to publish what he chose, could we retain fines incurred under this law? In a moral point of view, the money ought to be refunded; and he knew not on what ground the claim could be resisted. For the judiciary he felt a proper respect; but he would not bow submissively to every thing the judiciary should say. As a man, and as a member of the Senate, he had a right to form opinions for himself. The constitution he regarded as the supreme law, and entitled to our first attention and respect. By this resolution we should cast no stigma on any judge or court: it was not revising any judicial decision; it was no indelicacy to the judiciary. The blame attached to Congress more than to the judiciary. We ourselves have done an injurious act; it is for us to repair the wrong. There was no more indelicacy in the present case, than there would be in moving the repeal of a law. He thought gentlemen quite too sensitive on this subject. He had no wish to cast a stigma on either the judiciary or Congress—no desire to impute impure motives to either; but purity of motive could not make the law constitutional. Victorious parties might pursue their adversaries too far, as well in the Senate as in the field; hence arose the act in question. The stability of the judiciary was not to be affected by this resolution. He judged the law by the constitution. He did not like the judiciary less than others, but he loved the constitution more.

Mr. OTIS said he should not enter into the argument of the question; but would merely suggest a fact which he had before omitted. He believed the people of the United States had never demonstrated their opinion that the sedition law was unconstitutional. After the Virginia Legislature had passed their resolutions, denouncing this law, and circulars enclosing their proceedings were sent to the Legislatures of the several States, those of New England unanimously declined expressing their disapprobation of the law, and so far gave their sanction to it. Virginia again took up the subject, and gave a comprehensive view of all the arguments against the law; and this was carried through the Legislature but by about two to one. He thought at least one-half of the people of the United States might be considered as having expressed their opinion that the law was constitutional; yet, he would not at this time so far outrage public opinion as to vote for a renewal of this law. He hoped it might be done without; but it might have to be recurred to in times of imminent public danger. A crisis might arrive, when it would not be safe to let the press denounce the President of the United States as a usurper and highwayman, and the Congress as swindlers, and participators in his plunder; and to declare that the people had no resource but in a convention of delegates.

The question was taken on Mr. CRITTENDEN's proposition, and decided in the negative—yeas 17, nays, 20, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barbour, Crittenden, Edwards, Eppes, Forsyth, Lacock, Macon, Morrow, Palmer, Roberts, Ruggles, Sanford, Stokes, Talbot, Thomas, Williams of Mississippi, and Wilson.

NAYS.—Messrs. Burrill, Daggett, Fromentin, Gaillard, Hanson, Hunter, Johnson, King, Leake, Mellen, Morrill, Noble, Otis, Smith, Storer, Taylor, Tichenor, Van Dyke, and Williams of Tennessee.

The report of the committee was then concurred in—ayes 20.

CHARLES TAIT, from the State of Georgia, attended this day.

WEDNESDAY, December 16.

General John Stark.

The Senate proceeded again to the consideration of the bill for the relief of General Stark, an amendment having been heretofore agreed to, on motion of Mr. TICHENOR, to change the commencement of the pension from the 4th of July, 1817, to the 16th of August, (the anniversary of the battle of Bennington, in which General Stark so greatly signalized himself,) and the question was on ordering it to a third reading.

Mr. ROBERTS commenced a brief debate on the bill, by objecting to its passage, though under the highest sense of General Stark's merits, on the general ground of being adverse to a system of pensions, when not justified by disability incurred in the public service; that, if a pension were granted in this case, the same argument would justify pensions in numerous other cases, and because, in this instance, the relief was not solicited by General Stark himself, but by others for him.

Mr. FROMENTIN replied to Mr. ROBERTS, and advocated the bill with much earnestness, remarking, in substance, that he would act on this single case, without extending his views to other possible cases to which his attention was not called; that the very silence of General Stark was the most eloquent appeal he could possibly make for support, because age and infirmity had rendered him incapable of making his own petition; that, on the score of expense, there was little to apprehend on that account; for, so far from the probability that General Stark would be a burden to the Treasury, there was danger that, ere the present bill could receive the approbation necessary to make it a law, the object of it (now ninety odd years of age) would have descended to the tomb, as was almost the fact in the case of General St. Clair, who did not enjoy his pension more than three months, when he became a tenant of the grave.

Mr. KING rose merely to remark that, if the Senate were composed altogether of men of his age, he believed there would not be a dissenting voice heard against the bill; because they would all have then, as he had, a personal recollection of the singular and extraordinary Revolutionary services of General Stark. Mr. K. mentioned, as particular examples, the unrivalled conduct and services of General Stark at the battle of Bunker Hill; his subsequent success in arresting the triumphant progress of Burgoyne; the feelings of joy and encouragement in the cause, which were diffused throughout all the northern section of the States, by the achievements and success of Stark, and which, if every member were old enough to remember, as he did, there would, he repeated, be not a solitary objection to this bill.

Mr. SMITH followed in opposition to the bill. He argued, in reply to its advocates, that if General Stark was so near his end as was represented, there was the less necessity for this bill, because he could not live to enjoy it, and the doctrine was long since exploded that a man had use for money after his decease—passage-money was no longer deemed necessary. If it was for relief, it was unnecessary; but, if it was intended as a compliment, that was another question. In either view he was opposed to it. Mr. S. denied the power of giving pensions for the purpose of distinction, and he had therefore never given his assent to any pension not previously provided for by law. He did by no means deny the great merits of General Stark; but this being another case in the improper system of pensions, now becoming common, he was opposed to it, and hoped it would not pass.

Mr. MORRILL made a few remarks in reply to some of the observations made by gentlemen on this subject, when before under consideration, and added a few words on the uncommon merits of General Stark—briefly noticing his gallant conduct at Bunker Hill, at Bennington, at Trenton, at Princeton, &c., adducing the voluntary letters of compliment from Mr. Jefferson and Mr. Madison, respectively, on their succeeding to the Presidency, and concluded by saying, that if merit was to be estimated by services rendered to one's country, there was none so deserving as the veteran hero the Senate was now called on to relieve from penury.

The question was then taken on ordering the bill to a third reading, and decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Burrill, Crittenden, Dickerson, Eaton, Edwards, Forsyth, Fromentin, Gaillard, Horsey, Hunter, Johnson, King, Leake, Mellen, Morrill, Morrow, Otis, Palmer, Ruggles, Sanford, Stokes, Storer, Talbot, Taylor, Thomas, Tichenor, Williams of Mississippi, Williams of Tennessee, and Wilson —29.

NAYS.—Messrs. Eppes, Lacock, Macon, Noble, Robertson, and Smith—6.

Illegal Transportation of Slaves.

Mr. WILSON, of New Jersey, rose to offer a resolution. He observed that the resolution he was about to submit required a few words of explanation. The traffic in slaves and servants of color had been carried on to considerable extent from the State of New Jersey; and, under color of this traffic, it was believed many free persons, or who were soon to become free, had been consigned to slavery for life. The Legislature of New Jersey, at its late session, had unanimously passed a law to prevent this traffic; but it was feared this law could not be carried into complete effect, without the co-operation of the revenue officers of the United States, authorized by an act of Congress. The Legislature had therefore instructed their Senators, and requested their Representatives in Congress, to use their endeavors to procure the passing of an act to prevent the transportation of slaves, or servants of color, from any State to any other part of the United States, in cases where, by the laws of such State, such transportation is prohibited. In conformity with these instructions, as well as agreeably to his own feelings and principles, he therefore begged leave to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee on the subject of the slave trade be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making provision, by law, "to prevent the transportation of slaves, and servants of color, from any one State to any other part of the United States, in cases where, by the laws of such State, such transportation is prohibited."

General Jackson and the Seminole War.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 4th instant, for referring to a select committee the Message from the President, and documents, relative to the Seminole war; and, on motion by Mr. EATON, the same having been amended, was agreed to as follows:

Resolved, That the Message of the President, and documents, relative to the Seminole war, be referred to a select committee, who shall have authority, if necessary, to send for persons and papers: that said committee inquire relative to the advance of the United States troops into West Florida; whether the officers in command at Pensacola and St. Marks were amenable to, and under the control of Spain; and, particularly, what circumstances existed, to authorize or justify the Commanding General in taking possession of those posts.

Messrs. LACOCK, EATON, FORSYTH, KING, and BURRILL, were appointed the committee.

THURSDAY, December 24.

Mr. SANFORD presented the memorial of the New York Society for promoting the manumission of slaves, and for protecting such of them as have been, or may be, liberated; and the memorial was read, and referred to the committee on that subject.

THURSDAY, December 31.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate of the death of the honorable GEORGE MUMFORD, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of North Carolina, and that his funeral will take place to-morrow morning at 10 o'clock.

On motion by Mr. MACON,

Resolved unanimously, That the Senate will attend the funeral of the honorable George Mumford, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of North Carolina, to-morrow morning at 10 o'clock; and as a testimony of respect for the memory of the deceased, they will go into mourning, and wear a black crape round the left arm for thirty days.

The Senate adjourned to Monday morning.

WEDNESDAY, January 6, 1819.

DANIEL D. TOMPKINS, Vice President of the United States, and President of the Senate, attended, and took the Chair.

FRIDAY, January 8.

Monument to Washington.

The Senate then resumed the consideration of the bill providing for the erection of a monument over the remains of General GEORGE WASHINGTON, where they now lie.

Mr. BARBOUR moved that the bill be recommitted, with instructions to report a bill appropriating money for the erection of an equestrian statue of General WASHINGTON, in conformity with the resolution of Congress of 1783.

[This resolution was passed on the 7th of August, 1783, and directs substantially that an equestrian statue of bronze be erected at the Seat of Government; that the General be represented in a Roman dress, holding a truncheon in his right hand, his head encircled by a laurel wreath; that the pedestal be of marble, on which to be represented in relief, the following principal events of the war in which General WASHINGTON commanded in person, viz: the evacuation of Boston; the capture of the Hessians at Trenton; the battle of Princeton; the battle of Monmouth, and the surrender of Yorktown. The resolution directed also the inscriptions; that it shall be executed by the best artists, &c.]

The motion produced a short debate, and was finally decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barbour, Burrill, Crittenden, Daggett, Eaton, Edwards, Forsyth, Fromentin, Gaillard, Goldsborough, Horsey, Hunter, Johnson, King, Leake, Macon, Mellen, Morrill, Otis, Palmer, Sanford, Stokes, Storer, Tait, Talbot, Taylor, Thomas, Tichenor, Van Dyke, and Williams of Tennessee—30.

NAYS.—Messrs. Lacock, Morrow, Noble, Roberts, Ruggles, and Smith—6.

Exportation of Domestic Coins.

Mr. TALBOT, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred a resolution of the Senate to inquire into the expediency of prohibiting by law the exportation of the gold, silver, and copper coins of the United States, made the following report, which was read:

The Committee on Finance, to whom was referred a resolution to inquire into the expediency of prohibiting by law, the exportation of the gold, silver, and copper coins of the United States, report:

That, the measure contemplated in the resolution intimately connecting itself with the fiscal concerns of the nation, the committee, through their chairman, addressed a note to the Secretary of the Treasury, requesting his opinion of the propriety of adopting measures for the attainment of the object in contemplation, from whom they received in reply a communication, which accompanies this report, with the arguments and opinions expressed, in which those of your committee substantially correspond.

Of the inefficiency, if not entire impotence of legislative provisions to prevent the escape of the precious metals beyond the territorial limits of the Government, the history of all countries in which the power of legislation has been thus exercised, bears testimony. And, if all the efforts of arbitrary power in despotic Governments, if regulations dictated by the most cautious and jealous policy, guarded by penalties and punishments the most cruel and sanguinary, and enforced with a rigor which knows no mitigation, have been in vain, what hope can be indulged that a Government like ours—the genius and spirit of which breathes mildness and moderation—a country in which cruel and unusual punishments are unknown—could find the means of obtaining, by this mild spirit of legislation, this desirable end? Indeed, no error seems more entirely renounced and exploded, if not by the practice of all nations, at least in the disquisitions of political economists, than that which supposed that an accumulation of the precious metals could be produced in the dominions of one sovereign by regulations prohibiting their exportation to those of any other. The evils resulting to the community from a scarcity, or too small a portion of the precious metals, seem to your committee to be too deeply seated to yield to any remedies within the competency of legislation to afford. It is a malady which admits of no cure but that of time, patient industry, and persevering economy. As long as the balance of trade is against us, so long will a constant efflux of the precious metals be required for the discharge of such balance.

From this axiom in commerce, the correctness of which, it is believed, never was questioned, it follows that it remains with the people themselves to adjust this balance, and to produce a preponderance in favor of our own country. Highly favored as they are by the bounty of Providence; blessed with a country of unparalleled fertility; with soil, climate, and situation almost infinitely diversified; with capacities of rivalling every quarter of the globe in the agricultural productions, as well as in the perfection of their manufactures, raw materials for which are so abundantly furnished them within the bosom of their own country; aided by a moderate and wise economy in a limited enjoyment of foreign luxuries—with these advantages, duly appreciated and fully improved, to what elevated condition in their intercourse with foreign nations may they not aspire? To the protection of our domestic manufactures by the imposition of duties on foreign importations, the National Government seemed to have gone as far as sound policy would warrant or permit; the present tariff having been framed with a view as well of raising the requisite supply of revenue for the support of Government, as, by the amount of the duties imposed on foreign articles of manufacture, to enable our own manufacturer of similar articles to meet the importer of such foreign manufacture, in our own market, on terms of fair and equal competition.

Further than this, it would seem to your committee, the Congress of the United States ought not to go. To commercial enterprise, to the sagacity of this class of the community, sharpened by the keen sense of interest, and enlightened by long experience, it should be left to explore the old, or, seeking new channels of commerce, find out the most profitable markets for the productions of our native and domestic industry, and to bring us in exchange such of the productions of foreign climates, and of foreign labor, as our citizens are willing to purchase. In short, it is the opinion of your committee, that commerce is always destined to flourish most where it is permitted to pursue its own paths, marked out by itself, embarrassed as little as possible by legislative regulations or restrictions.

From these considerations your committee are induced to recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is not expedient for Congress to adopt any regulations for preventing the exportation of the gold, silver, or copper coins of the United States.

TUESDAY, February 9.

Sales of Public Lands.

Mr. MORROW, from the Committee on Public Lands, who were instructed "to inquire into the expediency of so altering the laws respecting the sale of the public lands, that, from and after the —— day of —— next, credit shall not be given on such sales," made a report, accompanied by a bill, making further provision for the sale of public lands; and the report and bill were read, and the bill passed to the second reading.

The report is as follows:

That a view to the extensive territory placed at the disposal of the Government, the increasing demand for new lands for cultivation, arising from the progressive augmentation of the population in the United States, and the influence which the proposed alteration in the system for the sale of public lands, must produce on the interests of a large portion of the community, give, in the opinion of the committee, more than ordinary importance to the inquiry which they are instructed to make.

From the connection that the terms of credit have with the other provisions and conditions provided for the sale of the public lands, a correspondent alteration in the price and size of the tracts offered for sale, will be necessary, when the credit is discontinued on future sales. That provision, alone, would virtually operate an enhancement of the price, and lessen the facility to men of limited capital, of acquiring new lands for settlement and cultivation.

In this view, the committee have considered the expediency of providing for the discontinuance of credit, a reduction of the price, and a subdivision of tracts in future sales. The provisions for the sale of public lands now in force, with some subsequent alterations, were adopted by the act of the 10th day of May, 1800. By its general regulations, a credit is allowed on three-fourths of the purchase-money for the lands sold. The moneys credited may be retained by incurring the charge of simple interest, for five years, from the time of purchase. It would appear that, at the first sales under this law, the long term of credit allowed had induced excessive purchases. The term of credit on these sales expired in the year 1805; and in 1806, it became necessary for Congress to interpose for relief of the purchasers, to prevent extensive forfeitures for failure in payment; and, since that period, nine several acts have been passed for the relief of the purchasers of public lands; and these acts for mitigating the operation for the general provision of the law have been in force more than one-half of the whole time since the system was first organized. The inducements of a long credit, which encourage purchases beyond the means for making payment, the general disposition in men to anticipate the most favorable results from the products of their labor, and the frequent unfavorable fluctuations in commerce, which cannot be foreseen by the most discerning, are the principal causes of the failures in payment by purchasers of public lands. It must appear from the Treasury statement, at the present session, of the amount of outstanding balances, on account of the sales of public lands, with the embarrassments arising from the deranged state of the currency, that any degree of punctuality in the payment of the debts now due is highly improbable. If the laws were left to operate in the rigid exactions of the penalties and forfeitures, the most serious injuries (in the present circumstances of the country) must follow to a large class of the community; and the effect of relief, by an extension for the time for payment, while the sales continue to progress, may produce an accumulation of the debt, and increase the difficulty in making the final payments.

The experience for several years of the effects of this system, the frequent recurrence of circumstances which render necessary the interposition of the Legislature to mitigate the general operation of law, and the extensive forfeitures which have been incurred, notwithstanding the aid of frequent remedial laws for the relief of the purchasers, seem to forbid any calculation on a successful operation of the same system in future sales. It cannot be correct policy to persist in the continuance of a system so much affected by circumstances, as that under consideration; which requires the frequent aid of mitigating expedients to preserve its existence, and to prevent its oppressive effects on a considerable portion of the community. It is not believed that any of the acts for the relief of the purchaser of public lands were unnecessary indulgences. The unfavorable state of things, during the restrictions on our commerce, and the late war, rendered such measures necessary; and the present state of the currency presents claims for indulgence still more imperative. Judging from the experience of the past, without any assurance of a more favorable state of things in future, it may be concluded that the system of credit is not well adapted to the circumstances of the country, and will be injurious so long as commerce is liable to fluctuation. The allowance of credit on the sales of the public lands, could not have been adopted for the benefit of capitalists; to them it is unnecessary, and for them it ought not to have been provided. And yet it is believed that it has operated most to the disadvantage of men destitute of capital. An individual who takes the whole term of credit allowed by law, on the three last instalments of purchase money, is charged on the moneys credited more than ten per cent. per annum above the purchaser who makes prompt payment; and, in many instances, if he possess no other resources than those arising from the land itself, he incurs a forfeiture of the money paid, and the land, with its improvements. If the allowance of credit on future sales was abolished, every subsequent purchaser would, without any liability to error, be able to calculate his means for payment; and if his purchase should not be so extensive, he would at once become an independent landholder, secure and quiet in his possession. In future, those fertile sources of discontent and disquietude, which arise from disappointment, and from the exercise of measures necessary to enforce the payments, as also the frequent distress occasioned by the forfeiture of lands on which settlements have been made, would be avoided; and (as will be proposed) were the public lands offered for sale in tracts of eighty acres, at one dollar and fifty cents per acre, then any individual, on the payment of one hundred and twenty dollars, might acquire a freehold estate, without encumbering himself with any debt whatever. It is believed that an advantage to the general interest of the districts in which the public lands are sold, would result from discontinuing the credit on the sales. The purchaser is in possession of the lands purchased, for four or five years before the completion of his payment. The product of his labor, for that time, is applied in discharge of his debt, and passes into the public Treasury. In as far as the instalments are collected in the district, it operates on the principle of rents collected, and withdrawn from circulation, or of a partial tax on that part of the community. The drain of money from circulation, thus occasioned, has been sensibly felt; and the balance in exchange against the western country, may, on this principle, be accounted for. In case of cash payments, the resources for payment would be drawn from other parts of the country, in as far as emigrants are the purchasers. In a more general point of view, the proposed measure appears important. The accumulation of debt, in particular districts, where the mass of citizens are the debtors, is a consequence attending the credit system. The principles of general policy require that charges on the people, for the necessary supply of revenue, should be diffused over the whole society; by adopting cash payments, this evil would be avoided; and the interest of subsequent purchasers would then be identified with that of the Government.

From the foregoing consideration it is respectfully proposed that credit on future sales shall not be allowed; that the price of the public lands be fixed at one dollar and fifty cents; and that the lands be offered for sale in tracts of eighty acres.

And for that purpose they ask leave to report a bill.

Duelling.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion, submitted yesterday by Mr. MORRILL, to request the President to dismiss certain officers from service.

Mr. MORRILL addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. President, it is with no ordinary degree of sensation that I invite the attention of the Senate to the consideration of the resolution which I had the honor to present. The nature and enormity of the transaction can require but little illustration. It is not my intention to enter into a minute detail of the horror or magnitude of the crime; but, as I had the honor to offer the resolution, it may be expected that I assign some reasons in justification of the proposition. In the first place, sir, I consider the practice of duelling as inhuman. What can be more repulsive to the philanthropic breast than to place before a musket, charged with a ball, at the distance of twelve or fifteen feet, a fellow-citizen for a mark? Humanity shudders, every tender feeling of the heart recoils, and Pagan barbarity itself is put to the blush. But, sir, it is immoral. It tends to demoralize society and corrupt the community. It banishes accountability from the human mind. It represents life and death as of no consequence, and immaterial. It may sometimes deprive society of its useful members.

The practice is unjust and wicked. In consequence of capital offences, by a legal tribunal life may be taken. But shall one citizen, for any trivial offence, take the life of his fellow? It cannot be justified upon any correct principle whatever, either Christian, humane, or civil. Christianity breathes a better spirit; humanity retires with disgust; the civil code condemns and executes the offender. What law, human or divine, will sustain the act? The articles of war forbid it; State laws forbid it; Virginia herself has forbidden it.

But, sir, General Mason has fallen. A husband, a father, a son, thus prematurely ushered into eternity. And, unless invention and vice are more than ordinarily active, he received encouragement to the sad catastrophe in this city; and the more to be lamented, for, is this the case, his blood must, at least in part, rest upon the heads of his guilty abettors and counsellors.

Lamentable fact! that a gentleman of high standing, who had been a member of this honorable body, and probably would have been the next Governor of Virginia, should be so overcome with pride or with passion as to fall a sacrifice to sentiments so absurd. And, sir, what plausible apology is offered to mitigate the crime? The only plea which ingenuity itself can invent, is grounded upon a false notion of honor. A gentleman is bound by his honor to commit an act of murder. His honor must be sustained by the commission of an offence beneath the dignity of the human species. If this be a correct mode of sustaining a gentleman's honor, why is it prohibited in your army? Why are laws against it? If it will sustain the honor of an individual, it will sustain the honor of the community; the honor of your country; and why do your laws condemn that on which your country's glory is erected?

But, sir, it is a gentleman's way of deciding a controversy. Yes, and the servants; the boys in the street, by this practice, learn high notions of honor, and, to display them, must fight a duel. Base practice, indeed; repugnant to all the refined feelings of a cultivated mind. The better feelings of man revolt at the act. Conscience condemns it, and it must, in time and eternity. From this view of the subject, sir, I am induced to offer the resolution, and am led to hope it will be adopted by the Senate. Let this be as it may, I have discharged my duty; I have expressed my opinion without reserve.

Mr. BARBOUR addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. President, the event to which the resolution relates has filled me with the deepest affliction. I claim the melancholy privilege of being the chief mourner here. Mason was my friend —a long and intimate acquaintance, ripened into a sincere friendship by an association in this body for several years, gave me an opportunity of appreciating his distinguished worth. Virginia loved him as one of her favorite sons —in war her shield, her ornament in peace. With her the very name had been consecrated to patriotism, through successive generations. Its lustre lost nothing in the person of the deceased. He united the amiable qualities of the man to the higher virtues of the patriot. His loss will be mourned by his country as a public calamity. In the vigor of life, uniting both the affection and confidence of all, and surrounded with every blessing that promised happiness, he has suddenly fallen the victim of a barbarous practice. Cut off in the commencement of a splendid career, he leaves a wretched mother, a disconsolate widow, a fatherless child, and a weeping country.

Oh, what a scene was there! But yesterday Selma was the abode of happiness; to-day it is wrapped in mourning. See on yesterday the affectionate husband, the amiable wife, the tender infant—the pledge and cement of their happiness. To-day, behold that husband carried into the presence of his wife, bathed in gore. See her, frantic with despair, precipitating herself upon the corpse of her bleeding husband, mingling her tears with his flowing blood, and contending with the icy arms of death for the lifeless prize. She lifts her eyes to heaven, the last refuge of the wretched, and in tones of agony cries out, my God, my God, restore my husband! Her prayers are given to the winds; his disembodied spirit has found its refuge and its home in the bosom of its God, while his earthly remains are consigned to the cold and narrow house appointed for all the living. Peace be to his ashes! And may a kind Providence become the friend of the widow; pour balm into her afflicted bosom, and bind up the broken heart; be the father of the fatherless, and let him be the mother's prop; rock the cradle of her declining years, and be a consolation in her dying hour! If any thing can now administer to the affliction of his surviving friends, it will be the knowledge that Virginia, this day, through all her borders, weeps his untimely fall.

As to the practice of duelling, I have already, long since, given proofs of my sentiments, more substantial than mere professions. Whatever credit, if any, be due to it, to me it belongs, of having first presented to the Legislature of my native State the law against duelling. What will be its result on society, all-trying time must decide. The best hopes of humanity are connected with its success; nor is it presumptuous to hope that Heaven may smile on our efforts.

And yet, sir, with these sentiments, I must still be opposed to the resolution under consideration. As to the rumors to which the mover refers, and on which he rests, in part, at least, the success of this motion, they may or may not be true. Incidents of this kind are generally attended with the most exaggerated statements. If, indeed, they be true, as represented, I should feel no hesitation in pronouncing them as deserving the deepest abhorrence. Of some of the persons concerned in this melancholy tragedy, I know nothing; with others I have a slight acquaintance. Their characters forbid the belief that they have acted dishonorably. The statement made by the mover, unsustained by proof, furnishes a strong reason against the adoption of the resolution. For it is palpably an ex parte proceeding, and we are called upon to consign to infamy men who have had no opportunity of being heard in their defence. Let us not multiply the regrets already attending this melancholy event, by doing an act of injustice. Let us not commit the dignity of the Senate by taking cognizance of a subject which belongs to others. If a crime has been committed, the offenders are subject, if, as the resolution supposes, they be military men, to trial by court-martial, and, in any event, by a civil tribunal. To the President, as Commander-in-chief, belongs the former; the latter to the civil magistrate. By this irregular proceeding, should it prevail, we depart from our own duty in prescribing to others, to whom of right the subject belongs, and of whose remissness there is no imputation. The crime of duelling is not to be corrected by a proceeding of this kind. The roots of the evil are too deep to be extirpated by a solitary paroxysm of zeal. Public opinion is the only corrective. No matter what may be the number or severity of penalties that are denounced against this ferocious practice, they, as experience has evinced, are inoperative, unless their enforcement can be secured by the coincidence of public sentiment, or unless, as with us, the law executes itself by disfranchising the offender. So long as public opinion requires of an individual a submission to what is most improperly called the laws of honor, to maintain his grade in society, it is as capricious as unjust to anathematize those who submit to its decrees. Let the press, let your schools, let the pulpit, let your Legislatures, throughout the nation, make a simultaneous effort, and continue it with zeal and perseverance, to extirpate this practice, the undisputed progeny of a barbarous age. Upon such an undertaking, let us hope for the blessing of Heaven.

After other gentlemen had spoken—

Mr. MORRILL made the following remarks:

Mr. President, I learn with pleasure, from what honorable gentlemen have advanced on this subject, there is but one sentiment with respect to the nature and atrocity of the act. A difference of opinion as to the expediency and policy of the measure proposed, is the only difficulty to be encountered.

The honorable gentleman from Kentucky intimates a want of information, and an apprehension that no guilt can be attached to any implicated in this affair. It is very desirable, sir, that this should be the fact. If no guilt, no blame; and, of course, no injury, can be sustained by the innocent; and no evil is to be apprehended.

But the gentleman suggests that favorable expressions have fallen from gentlemen on the floor of the other House. Is this a fact, sir? it is the more to be lamented, and furnishes another reason why this House should express an opinion on the subject. But, sir, the honorable gentleman from Virginia, with whose eloquence I am generally captivated, and by whose arguments I am commonly drawn into his mode of thinking, has expressed the generous feeling of his heart, on the nature of the act, in a manner in perfect coincidence with my views of the subject. The spontaneous effusions of his heart, thus exhibited, I can by no means doubt, and can hardly suppose the social intercourse which he has holden in this House with the unfortunate sufferer should not have created a more than ordinary attachment. But, sir, the honorable gentleman intimates several reasons why this resolution should not be adopted. It is assuming the exercise of a power vested in another department. Your articles of war do not reach the case. They provide for the punishment of those who give or accept a challenge, but not those who are accessory thereto. As to the civil authority, sir, crimes of this kind, in this region, have passed too long unobserved to justify the most remote expectation that cognizance will be taken of this transaction. But, says the gentleman, it may consign to infamy individuals. If guilty, be it so; to this I have no objection. Would to God that all who are guilty of duelling might, by public disapprobation, be consigned to infamy as lasting as time itself. This would be the most successful and sure way to suppress the practice. The honorable gentleman intimates, the public opinion is incorrect, and this is the best corrective; and it is hard to criminate a person for committing a crime when public opinion requires him so to do to maintain his grade in society. Admit, sir, the public opinion is the best corrective, and that public opinion is incorrect—I would ask that honorable gentleman, what is the best method to correct public opinion? Will resolutions passed in private circles effect the object? Would not the opinion of the President have more influence upon society than that of an obscure individual? Would the gentleman, to purify a stream, cast his corrective into the ocean where it empties, or into the fountain where it originated? I presume, into the fountain. And, sir, upon the same principle, if the public opinion is corrupt, let the correction commence here—in the Senate of the United States. Let the stream be purified. Here, I wish to record my vote against an act so inhuman and wicked. A crime which I detest with all the powers of my soul. But, sir, as my desire is to accommodate the feelings of gentlemen, I will withdraw the resolution and submit a substitute.

Mr. M. then offered the following, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing, by law, for the punishment of all persons concerned in duelling within the District of Columbia.

WEDNESDAY, February 10.

The bill more effectually to provide for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, and for other purposes, was read a third time, and passed.

Statue of Washington.

The Senate then resumed the consideration of the bill providing for the erection of an equestrian statue of General WASHINGTON, in pursuance of the resolution of the Congress of 1783.

Considerable discussion took place on this subject; in the course of which Mr. WILSON moved to postpone the bill to the 5th of March, (to reject it,) with a view of then moving for estimates of expense, &c., to be reported to the House at the next session; which motion was decided by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barbour, Burrill, Crittenden, Dickerson, Edwards, Eppes, Lacock, Leake, Macon, Morrow, Noble, Palmer, Roberts, Ruggles, Tait, Taylor, Williams of Massachusetts, and Wilson—18.

THURSDAY, February 11.

Statue of Washington.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill for the erection of an equestrian statue of General GEORGE WASHINGTON, in the Capitol square.

Mr. OTIS moved to postpone the bill to the 5th day of March, (to reject it;) which motion was decided in the negative, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barbour, Burrill, Crittenden, Dickerson, Eppes, Lacock, Leake, Macon, Morrow, Noble, Otis, Roberts, Tait, Taylor, and Wilson—15.

NAYS.—Messrs. Daggett, Eaton, Forsyth, Fromentin, Goldsborough, Horsey, Hunter, Johnson, King, Mellen, Morrill, Sanford, Stokes, Storer, Talbot, Tichenor, Van Dyke, and Williams of Tennessee—18.

On motion of Mr. DAGGETT, the bill was amended, by adding a proviso, that, if the President should find that the monument would cost more than $150,000, the sum appropriated, he should not proceed to execute the act, but make a report of the estimated cost to the next session of Congress.

The question was then taken on ordering the bill, as amended, to be engrossed and read a third time, and decided affirmatively, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barbour, Burrill, Crittenden, Daggett, Dickerson, Fromentin, Goldsborough, Horsey, Hunter, Johnson, King, Leake, Mellen, Morrill, Otis, Sanford, Stokes, Storer, Talbot, Thomas, Tichenor, Van Dyke, and Williams of Tennessee—23.

NAYS.—Messrs. Eaton, Edwards, Eppes, Forsyth, Lacock, Macon, Morrow, Palmer, Roberts, Ruggles, Tait, Taylor, Williams of Mississippi, and Wilson—14.

WEDNESDAY, February 17.

The PRESIDENT communicated a letter from JOHN FORSYTH, notifying the resignation of his seat in the Senate; and the letter was read; and, on motion by Mr. TAIT, the President was requested to notify the Executive of the State of Georgia of this resignation.

Missouri State Bill.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act to authorize the people of the Missouri Territory to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States."

The two bills last mentioned were read, and passed to the second reading.

On motion, by Mr. TALBOT, the bill to authorize the people of the Missouri Territory to form a constitution and State government was read the second time, by unanimous consent, and referred to the committee on the memorial of the Legislative Council and House of Representatives of the Alabama Territory, praying admission into the Union as a State.

The bill for the relief of David Henley was read a third time, and passed.

Committee on the Seminole War.

Mr. LACOCK submitted the following motion:

Resolved, That a member be added to the committee already appointed on the subject of the Seminole war, in the place of the honorable Mr. FORSYTH, who has recently been appointed to a foreign mission.

After considerable debate, Mr. EATON moved to postpone the motion to the 5th day of March next, [to defeat it,] on the ground that it would be an unnecessary consumption of the time of the Senate, if not a deviation from the line of its duty, to enter at this late period of the session into an investigation and debate on this subject, which, after a debate of unexampled length, had been solemnly decided on in the House of Representatives. To this it was replied, that nothing more was proposed, in this instance, than was on other occasions considered as matter of course. When an inquiry into the conduct of a public officer or officers, was asked from a respectable source, it was invariably granted; and it would be, it was said, no more than consistent with self-respect, to prosecute to some result the inquiry already commenced in this case. This motion to postpone was negatived, by yeas and nays, 21 to 16, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Crittenden, Dickerson, Eaton, Edwards, Fromentin, Johnson, King, Leake, Morrow, Otis, Ruggles, Sanford, Stokes, Storer, Williams of Mississippi, and Wilson.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barbour, Burrill, Daggett, Eppes, Gaillard, Goldsborough, Horsey, Hunter, Lacock, Macon, Mellen, Noble, Palmer, Roberts, Tait, Talbot, Taylor, Thomas, Tichenor, Van Dyke, and Williams of Tennessee.

The motion of Mr. LACOCK to fill up the committee was opposed, and of Mr. EATON to postpone the proceedings, was supported by Messrs. OTIS, EATON, and FROMENTIN; on the other side were Messrs. LACOCK, EPPES, BURRILL, TALBOT, GOLDSBOROUGH, and MACON. It was contended by the former, that, without deciding upon the right of the Senate, abstractly, to institute inquiries into the conduct of public officers, or to exercise a censorial power in other cases than those of impeachment, it was sufficient to show that, in this instance, such an interference would be entirely inexpedient. For, that the conduct of the commanding officer in the Seminole war had been at least excused by the President of the United States, and that, so far as that general officer was censured, there was no difference between the previous orders and a subsequent excuse or justification. In either case, the mantle of his superior officer was a screen for him; and, if the Executive government had thus assumed the responsibility without sufficient motives and reasons, persons other than General Jackson might be held to answer before the Senate in another capacity, and that this body might thus be placed in a situation of embarrassment, unfavorable to a just and impartial discharge of judicial duties. That if this were true in ordinary cases, it was most emphatically so in the present instance. The House of Representatives was the great inquest and constitutional accuser of the nation. And, after a most laborious investigation and debate, had decided in favor of a nol. pros. It would seem then to betray a great eagerness to exercise the faculty of censure and condemnation, to pursue a supposed delinquent after that House had rejected a bill of indictment. The Senate would be placed in an unfavorable and undignified attitude—be chargeable with a spirit of persecution, and would separate themselves, not only from the House of Representatives, but from the people, and excite, in favor of the principal party, feelings of sympathy that would defeat the object of exhibiting the triumph of the civil over the military power. Many remarks were also added to show that to refuse to fill up the committee, or to postpone generally, or to discharge the committee, were equivalent motions, and all in perfect conformity with correct and dignified proceedings.

On the other hand, the filling up the committee was supported and the postponement resisted, upon the suggestion that the committee, after making progress in their inquiries, and after much laborious research, and after a majority of them were agreed on many points, were divided upon others, and that the Senate was bound by the respect due to itself to fill up the vacancy and not stifle the report; and that afterwards, upon a motion to discharge the committee, if it should be offered, conclusive reasons should be shown against that measure. To decline replacing a member, whose sentiments were known to be unfavorable to the proceedings in the Seminole war, and who had received an Executive appointment, would be to expose the motives of the Executive to misconstruction. That the Senate possessed a concurrent right with the House of Representatives to originate any investigation into the proceedings of public officers, or the conduct of public affairs, and was bound as an independent branch of the Legislature to discharge its duty, without any reference to the proceedings of the House, to which all allusions were unparliamentary and improper. It was denied to be the correct doctrine that a military officer is in all cases protected by the command or justification of his superior; and, if it were true, it might be better to disband the army. That the present moment was favorable to sustaining and defining the rights of the Senate. And, finally, that it would not follow of course that the present proceedings would involve a question of censure or approbation of any officer; but the committee might possess evidence (and it was suggested that they did) of irregularities not exhibited to the House, which might demand legislative interposition and reform.

The motion of Mr. LACOCK was then agreed to, and Mr. EPPES was appointed the member.

THURSDAY, February 18.

Public Lands.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill making further provision respecting the sale of the public lands.

[For the following remarks, made by Mr. CRITTENDEN, in conclusion of a speech in support of the bill, we are obliged to a friend who was present at the debate, for being enabled to lay before our readers.—Editors.]

Mr. President, I must acknowledge to you that I feel a peculiar sort of partiality for this bill; and that, independent of the reasons which I have had the honor of submitting, I am influenced by feelings somewhat of a personal character to desire its passage. It is the work of the honorable gentleman from Ohio, (Mr. MORROW,) who is so soon to be finally separated from us. He has long been our Palinurus in every thing that related to this important subject. He has steered us safely through all its difficulties, and, with him for our helmsman, we have feared neither Scylla nor Charybdis. We have heretofore followed him with increasing confidence. We have never been deceived or disappointed. The bill now before you is probably the last, the most important, act of his long and useful political life. If it shall pass, sir, it will identify his name and his memory with this interesting subject. It will be his "perennius ære." A noble monument! which, whilst it guides the course of future legislation, shall perpetuate the remembrance of an honest man. Sir, if the ostracism of former times prevailed with us, I do not know the individual whose virtues would more expose him to its envious and jealous sentence. The illustrious Greek himself, who derived such unfortunate distinction from that ancient usage, did not better deserve the epithet of "just." Mr. President, I do not intend to flatter the honorable gentleman from Ohio. Flattery is falsehood. I burn no such incense at the shrine of any man. The sincere homage of the heart is not flattery. I have spoken the spontaneous feelings of my own breast. I am confident, too, that I have spoken the sentiments of the Senate. But yet, sir, I ought, perhaps, to beg pardon of the honorable gentleman. For, I have much cause to fear that the gratification I have had in offering this poor tribute of my respect, is more than counterbalanced by the pain it has inflicted on him.

FRIDAY, February 19.

British Colonial Trade.

In Executive session—

Mr. MACON, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred so much of the documents accompanying the Commercial Convention with Great Britain, as relates to the colonial trade, made the following report, which was read:

That the object of the negotiation with Great Britain, respecting the colonial trade, is the establishment of a regulation whereby a trade in articles of the produce and manufacture of the United States, and of the British Colonies, may be carried on between them; and secondly, a regulation whereby the shipping of the two countries may be placed on an equal footing in the carrying on of this trade.

In respect to the articles of the trade, the United States would agree that all articles of the produce and manufacture of the United States, and of the respective colonies, should be included, and all other articles excluded. But as Great Britain probably would not consent to this arrangement, the United States would not object to the catalogue of articles of the produce and manufactures of the United States, and of the said colonies, enumerated in the British act of Parliament, and according to which the trade has heretofore been carried on in British bottoms.

As respects duties and charges, they should be placed on a footing of reciprocal equality: if Great Britain would consent to impose no higher or other duties on articles of the produce and manufacture of the United States imported into the colonies, than upon the like articles imported from her continental colonies, (whence only they can be obtained,) the United States might agree to impose no greater or other duties and charges on articles the produce and manufacture of her colonies, than on the like articles from other countries. To this adjustment Great Britain will probably disagree: in lieu thereof, and as a compensation for the stipulation not to impose greater or other duties on the colonial articles of Great Britain, than on the like articles of other countries, it might be stipulated, on the part of Great Britain, that the duties and charges on articles of the produce and manufacture of the United States, should not exceed by more than —— per cent. those which should be imposed on the like articles imported from the British continental colonies.

In no event should articles of the produce and manufacture of the United States pay higher duties and charges in the direct voyage from the United States than in the indirect or circuitous voyage through New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Bermudas, or other intermediate ports; and as the direct trade should not be more restrained in respect to the articles thereof, than the indirect or circuitous trade, no article should be allowed to go or come indirectly or circuitously, which might not go or come directly.

There is nothing in principle or policy that forbids the confining of this trade to articles of the produce or manufacture of the respective countries; that is, of the United States and of the British colonies; articles of produce and manufacture of other portions of the British territories coming through these colonies being excluded from the United States, as articles not of the produce and manufacture of the United States are excluded from Great Britain, and would be excluded from the British colonies.

As respects the shipping employed in this trade, it must be placed on a footing of practical and reciprocal equality, both as respects duties and charges, and the equal participation of the trade; on this adjustment, even, there will exist an advantage in favor of the English navigation; as it will be exclusively employed in the transportation of articles of the produce and manufacture of the United States, between the intermediate colonies aforesaid and the West India Colonies, and likewise in a disproportioned degree, in the distribution of these articles among the British West India Colonies.

Furthermore, as the voyage from the United States to New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, and Bermuda, is a short one, and would yield but little profit, the duties and charges must be as great on the British ships, and the articles of the produce and manufacture of the United States composing their cargoes, arriving in the British West India Colonies, through these intermediate colonies, as on the same ships and articles arriving directly from the United States; otherwise the direct trade will be deserted in favor of the circuitous trade, and thereby the object of the arrangement, an equality in the employment of the shipping of the two countries, will be defeated. So far as the operation of the late navigation law is understood, it seems to have been advantageous, and especially in the increase of the American shipping engaged in the direct trade between the United States and Great Britain, and the corresponding decrease of that of Great Britain—but sufficient time has not yet been afforded satisfactorily to ascertain this point, or to determine other questions that are in a course of solution.

Perhaps it would be prudent to allow time for this important experiment, and to suffer the negotiation on this subject to remain where it is for the present. It ought not to be forgotten, that without cutting off the trade with New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, and Bermuda, this experiment cannot be fairly made. Whether it would be expedient at the present session to adopt this measure, is perhaps doubtful.

If the effect of our navigation law, reinforced according to the above suggestion, should prove to be such as it not improbably will be, it might, and probably would be our true footing to adhere to the law, and decline any convention with Great Britain, touching the colonial trade.

MONDAY, February 22.

SAMUEL W. DANA, from the State of Connecticut, attended this day.

TUESDAY, February 23.

The PRESIDENT communicated the credentials of WALLER TAYLOR, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Indiana, for the term of six years, commencing on the fourth day of March next; which were read, and laid on file.

WEDNESDAY, February 24.

Report on the Seminole War.

Mr. LACOCK, from the committee appointed in pursuance of a resolution of the Senate of the 18th December last, "That the Message of the President and documents, relative to the Seminole war, be referred to a select committee, who shall have authority, if necessary, to send for persons and papers; that said committee inquire relative to the advance of the United States troops into West Florida; whether the officers in command at Pensacola and St. Marks were amenable to, and under the control of, Spain; and, particularly, what circumstances existed, to authorize or justify the commanding general in taking possession of those posts," reported, &c.

THURSDAY, February 25.

The PRESIDENT communicated the credentials of JOHN GAILLARD, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of South Carolina, for the term of six years, commencing on the fourth day of March next; which were read, and laid on file.

SATURDAY, February 27.

Missouri State Bill.

The bill from the other House to authorize the people of Missouri to form a constitution, &c., was resumed; and, with the various motions relative to it, gave rise to a long and animated debate.

Mr. WILSON moved to postpone the further consideration of the bill to a day beyond the session, which motion was decided as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Burrill, Daggett, Dickerson, King, Lacock, Mellen, Morrill, Otis, Roberts, Sanford, Storer, Tichenor, Van Dyke, and Wilson—14.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barbour, Crittenden, Dana, Eaton, Edwards, Eppes, Fromentin, Gaillard, Goldsborough, Horsey, Johnson, Leake, Macon, Morrow, Noble, Palmer, Ruggles, Stokes, Tait, Talbot, Thomas, Williams of Mississippi, and Williams of Tennessee—23.

So the question was negatived.

On the question to agree to a proposition to strike out the restriction against the introduction or toleration of slavery in said new State, a division of the question was called for, and the question was taken on striking out the latter clause of said restriction, as follows: "And that all children of slaves, born within the said State, after the admission thereof into the Union, shall be free, but may be held to service until the age of twenty-five years." And decided as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barbour, Crittenden, Daggett, Dana, Eaton, Edwards, Eppes, Fromentin, Gaillard, Goldsborough, Horsey, Johnson, King, Lacock, Leake, Macon, Morrow, Otis, Palmer, Roberts, Sanford, Stokes, Storer, Tait, Talbot, Thomas, Tichenor, Van Dyke, Williams of Mississippi, and Williams of Tennessee—31.

NAYS.—Messrs. Burrill, Dickerson, Mellen, Morrill, Noble, Ruggles, and Wilson—7.

So it was agreed to strike out that clause.

The question was then taken to strike out the first clause of said restriction, in the words following: "And provided also, That the further introduction of slavery or involuntary servitude be prohibited, except for the punishment of crimes, whereof the party shall have been duly convicted;" and decided as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barbour, Crittenden, Eaton, Edwards, Eppes, Fromentin, Gaillard, Goldsborough, Horsey, Johnson, Lacock, Leake, Macon, Otis, Palmer, Stokes, Tait, Talbot, Thomas, Van Dyke, Williams of Mississippi, and Williams of Tennessee—22.

NAYS.—Messrs. Burrill, Daggett, Dana, Dickerson, King, Mellen, Morrill, Morrow, Noble, Roberts, Ruggles, Sanford, Storer, Taylor, Tichenor, Wilson—16.

So it was decided to strike out this clause also; when, before finally acting on the bill, the Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, March 1.

Territory of Arkansas.

The Senate resumed the bill, entitled "An act establishing a separate Territorial government in the southern part of the Territory of Missouri;" it having been previously read a third time.

On motion by Mr. BURRILL,

"That the said bill be recommitted to the committee to whom the same was first referred, with instructions so to amend the same, that the further introduction of slavery or involuntary servitude within the said Territory, except for the punishment of crimes, be prohibited."

It was determined in the negative—yeas 14, nays 19, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Burrill, Daggett, Dana, Dickerson, King, Lacock, Mellen, Noble, Roberts, Ruggles, Sanford, Storer, Tichenor, and Wilson.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barbour, Crittenden, Eaton, Edwards, Eppes, Fromentin, Gaillard, Goldsborough, Johnson, Leake, Macon, Morrow, Stokes, Tait, Talbot, Taylor, Thomas, Williams of Mississippi, and Williams of Tennessee.

On the question, "Shall this bill pass?" it was determined in the affirmative. So it was resolved that this bill pass.

TUESDAY, March 2.

Missouri State Bill—House non-concurs in Senate Amendment.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that they have concurred in all the amendments of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to authorize the people of the Missouri Territory to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States," except the eleventh, and to that they disagree.

Senate adheres to its Amendment.

The Senate proceeded to consider the eleventh amendment, disagreed to by the House of Representatives. [This amendment struck out the prohibitory clause concerning the toleration of slavery in said State.]

Whereupon, on motion of Mr. TAIT, the Senate resolved to adhere to their said amendment.

WEDNESDAY, March 3.

The credentials of WILLIAM A. PALMER, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of South Carolina, for the term of six years, commencing on the fourth day of March instant, were communicated and read, and laid on file.

Missouri State Bill—House adheres to its Bill.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House adhere to their disagreement to the eleventh amendment proposed and adhered to by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to authorize the people of the Missouri Territory to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States."*

Six o'clock in the Evening.

On motion by Mr. MACON, a committee was appointed on the part of the Senate, jointly with such committee as may be appointed on the part of the House of Representatives, to wait on the President of the United States, and notify him, that unless he may have other communications to the two Houses of Congress, they are ready to adjourn. Mr. MACON and Mr. DAGGETT were appointed the committee.

On motion by Mr. BURRILL,

Resolved, unanimously, That the thanks of the Senate be presented to the honorable JAMES BARBOUR, Senator from Virginia, for the dignified and impartial manner in which he has discharged the important duties of the President of the Senate, since he was called to the Chair.

Resolved, unanimously, That the thanks of the Senate be also presented to the honorable JOHN GAILLARD, Senator from South Carolina, for the dignified and impartial manner in which he discharged the important duties of President of the Senate during the time he presided therein.

Whereupon Mr. BARBOUR addressed the Senate as follows:

Gentlemen: The sensibility produced by this new evidence of your kindness and approbation, is beyond my power to express. I would rather refer to your own bosoms as furnishing a more correct standard by which to appreciate it. I have the consolation to reflect, that whatever of zeal or capacity I possess, has been devoted to the discharge of the duties of my station; your approbation is more than an ample reward. Permit me, as the moment of separating is approaching, from all for a season, from some perhaps forever, to tender you all an affectionate farewell, and to pray that upon your return to your respective homes, your reception may be such, in all your relations, as may make you happy.

Mr. GAILLARD then rose and made the following address:

Mr. President: Next to the satisfaction arising from the consciousness of faithfully performing our duty the favorable opinion of those with whom we are associated affords the highest gratification that can be received; and the present vote of approbation, together with the many acts of kindness I have experienced from this honorable body, have excited in my mind feelings of gratitude which neither time nor circumstances can ever efface.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House, having finished the business before them, are about to adjourn.

Mr. MACON reported, from the joint committee, that they had waited on the President of the United States, who informed them that he had no further communication to make to the two Houses of Congress.

The Secretary was then directed to inform the House of Representatives that the Senate, having finished the legislative business before them, are about to adjourn.

The PRESIDENT then adjourned the Senate sine die.

* The two Houses adhering—one to its bill, the other to its amendment—the bill was consequently lost.

FIFTEENTH CONGRESS.—SECOND SESSION.

From Virginia, JOHN PEGRAM, vice Mr. Goodwyn, deceased.

From Louisiana, THOMAS BUTLER, vice Mr. Robertson, resigned.

JOHN SCOTT, the delegate from the Territory of Missouri, and JOHN CROWEL, the delegate from the Territory of Alabama, also appeared and took their seats.

A quorum being present, messages were exchanged with the Senate to that effect.

Messrs. TAYLOR and BALDWIN were appointed on the part of this House, on the joint committee for waiting on the President.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a copy of the constitution of the State of Illinois, adopted in convention at Kaskaskia, on the 26th day of August, 1818; which was ordered to lie on the table.

TUESDAY, November 17.

Several other members, to wit: from Massachusetts, WALTER FOLGER, jr., and JOHN WILSON; from New York, BENJAMIN ELLICOTT and DAVID A. OGDEN; from Delaware, LOUIS MCLANE; from Virginia, THOMAS M. NELSON, BALLARD SMITH, and EDWARD COLSTON; from North Carolina, JAMES OWEN; from Georgia, THOMAS W. COBB; from Tennessee, SAMUEL HOGG; and from Ohio, PHILEMON BEECHER and LEVI BARBER, appeared, and took their seats.

Mr. TAYLOR, from the joint committee appointed to wait on the President of the United States, reported that they had discharged that duty, and that the President informed the committee he would this day make a communication to the two Houses of Congress.

WEDNESDAY, November 18.

Several other members, to wit: from New York, JOHN R. DRAKE, JAMES PORTER, and JOHN C. SPENCER; from Virginia, BURWELL BASSETT; and from Tennessee, WILLIAM G. BLOUNT, appeared, and took their seats.

THURSDAY, November 19.

Three other members, to wit: from Massachusetts, JEREMIAH NELSON; from Pennsylvania, WILLIAM MACLAY; and from Kentucky, RICHARD C. ANDERSON, jr., appeared, and took their seats.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Governor of the State of Pennsylvania, enclosing the credentials of SAMUEL MOORE, as a member of this House, in the room of Samuel D. Ingham, resigned; which was referred to the Committee of Elections.

State of Illinois—Question of Swearing in its Representative.

Mr. MCLEAN, Representative from the new State of Illinois, being in attendance—

The SPEAKER stated to the House a difficulty which he felt in deciding upon the propriety of administering the oath to him, in consequence of Congress not having concluded the act of admission of the State into the Union. Under this difficulty, he submitted the question to the decision of the House.

Mr. POINDEXTER, of Mississippi, said he thought it incumbent on the House, before admitting the Representative to a seat, to examine the constitution just laid before it, to see, first, whether the requisitions of the act of last session were complied with; and, secondly, whether the form of government established was republican, which the United States were bound to guarantee. He illustrated the irregularity of a different procedure, by putting the case that the member was admitted to a seat, allowed to vote on important questions, and the constitution subsequently rejected.

Mr. HARRISON, of Ohio, wished a different course to be pursued, and one for which he adduced precedent, in the case of the Representative from one of the States lately admitted. The House had taken for granted the fact of a compliance with the law, and of the republican form of government established, and had admitted the member without question to his seat. In the present case, Mr. H. was unwilling to depart from the precedent, for mere form's sake.

Mr. PITKIN, of Connecticut, said that this was a question which, he believed, had never before been presented to the House. He thought, for himself, that, before admitting a Representative to a seat, the question, whether the people who elected him were a State, ought to be decided. To the decision of this question, several things were necessary; for instance, the law of last session required that the Territory in question should have had a certain population, to justify its forming a constitution and State government. This fact ought to be officially established, &c., and the resolution of admission passed, before a Representative took his seat.

The question having been put, it was decided apparently by a large majority that the SPEAKER should not at this time administer the oath of office.

Ordered, That the constitution of the State of Illinois be referred to a select committee; and Messrs. ANDERSON, of Kentucky, POINDEXTER, and HENDRICKS, were appointed the said committee.

FRIDAY, November 20.

The SPEAKER presented a memorial and petition of Matthew Lyon, formerly a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Vermont, detailing the circumstances attending his prosecution for sedition, in the year 1798, and complaining of the unconstitutionality of the act under which he was prosecuted, of illegality in the proceedings of the court, and of the fine which he was compelled to pay, and the imprisonment he suffered; and also setting forth the iniquity of the motives which prompted the said prosecution; and praying that the amount of the said fine, with the interest thereon, may be granted to him, together with such sum as Congress may think a just indemnity for his being dragged from his home, his family, friends, and business, and thrown into a loathsome dungeon, where he suffered every species of hardship and indignity, which the most prosecuting spirit could devise, for four months.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, moved to refer the petition to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. EDWARDS, of North Carolina, thought, that, as this petition embraced a claim, it would be proper to let it take the course of all other claims, by referring it to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. WILLIAMS said, though it was a claim, it was a claim arising from the operation of a law of the country supposed by the petitioner to be unconstitutional. Who could so well determine a question with regard to the constitutionality or unconstitutionality of a law, as the Judiciary Committee? Such cases had been usually referred to that committee; and even at the last session that committee had been directed to inquire into a fraud, said to have been committed in one of the courts of the United States.

On motion of Mr. SPENCER, of New York, the petition was read through, and was then referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

State of Illinois.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kentucky, from the select committee, to whom was referred the constitution of the State of Illinois, reported a resolution, declaring the admission of the State of Illinois into the Union, on an equal footing with the original States.

The resolution was read a first and second time.—Mr. ANDERSON proposed that it should be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. SPENCER, of New York, inquired whether it appeared, from any documents transmitted to Congress, that the State had the number of inhabitants required by the law of the last session, as a preliminary to its formation of a constitution.

Mr. ANDERSON said that the committee had no information on that subject before them, beyond what was contained in the preamble to the constitution, which states, that the requisitions of the act of Congress had been complied with, and that the convention had therefore proceeded to the formation of a constitution. Mr. A said, the committee had considered that evidence sufficient; and he had, in addition, himself seen, in the newspapers, evidence sufficient to satisfy him of the fact, that the population did amount to forty thousand souls, the number required.

The resolve was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

MONDAY, November 23.

Several other members, to wit: from New York, DANIEL CRUGER, PETER H. WENDOVER, and CALEB TOMPKINS; from South Carolina, JAMES ERVIN, ELIAS EARLE, and ELDRED SIMKINS, appeared, and took their seats.

Mr. HUGH NELSON presented a memorial of William Lambert, accompanied with abstracts of astronomical calculations, to ascertain the longitude of the Capitol in this city, from the observatory of Greenwich in England, soliciting the adoption of measures authorizing additional observations to be made to test the accuracy of the result already obtained; which was referred to a select committee; and Messrs. HUGH NELSON, FOLGER, SEYBERT, CRAWFORD, and BATEMAN, were appointed the said committee.

District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from William Cranch, Chief Justice of the circuit court of the United States, for the District of Columbia, transmitting a code of jurisprudence for the said district, prepared (by him) under the authority of the act of the 29th of April, 1816, entitled "An act authorizing the Judges of the circuit court, and the Attorney for the District of Columbia, to prepare a code of jurisprudence for the said district," which was referred to a select committee; and Messrs. HERBERT, CULBRETH, GARNETT, WILLIAMS of Connecticut, and ADAMS, were appointed the said committee. The letter is as follows:

NOVEMBER 9, 1818.

SIR: The undersigned, one of the Judges of the circuit court for the District of Columbia, has the honor to present, for the consideration of Congress, a Code of Jurisprudence for that district, prepared under the authority of the act of the 29th of April, 1816, entitled "An act authorizing the Judges of the circuit court, and the Attorney for the District of Columbia, to prepare a Code of Jurisprudence for the said district."

It is to be regretted, that the engagements of the gentlemen intended by that act to have been associated with him in the business, have deprived the public of the benefit of their labors. This circumstance will in part account for the lateness of the period at which the report is made. It is, however, a work which could not have been hastily done; for, although the district is small, yet almost every case requiring the interposition of law, which can arise in the largest nation, may arise in this district, and ought to be provided for.

In preparing a substitute for the existing statute law it was necessary, if possible, to ascertain what that law was. This was not an easy task.

By the act of Congress, of the 27th of February, 1801, the laws of Virginia, as they then existed, were to remain in force in that part of the district which was ceded by Virginia, and the laws of Maryland in that part which was ceded by Maryland. The laws thus adopted, consisted of so much of the common law of England as was applicable to the situation of this country; of the bills of rights, constitution, and statutes of Virginia and Maryland, modified by the Constitution and laws of the United States, and, also, (in regard to that part of the district which was ceded by the State of Maryland,) of such of the English statutes as existed at the time of the first emigration to Maryland, "and which, by experience, had been found applicable to their local and other circumstances, and of such others as had been since made in England or Great Britain, and had been introduced, used, and practised by the courts of law or equity" of that State.

To ascertain, therefore, what was the existing statute law, it was necessary to know what statutes of England, enacted before the first emigration to Maryland, had by experience been found applicable to the local and other circumstances of the country, and what statutes since made in England or Great Britain, had been introduced, used, and practised by the courts of law or equity in that State: and also what statutes of England or Great Britain had been expressly re-enacted by the State of Virginia.

To obtain this knowledge with as much certainty as the nature of the case would permit, it was necessary to examine minutely the English and British statutes, and compare them with the statutes enacted by Virginia and Maryland.

From these three systems of statutes, to select such as were most important and best adapted to the circumstances of the district; to supply such defects as were discovered, and to combine the whole into one code—required more deliberation, and occupied more time, than was anticipated.

These circumstances must account for the apparent delay in making the present report, which is even now submitted with much diffidence.

With high consideration, the undersigned has the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

W. CRANCH.

Hon. HENRY CLAY,
Speaker House of Representatives.

Annual Treasury Report.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting his annual report upon the state of the finances; which was ordered to lie on the table. The report is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Nov. 21, 1818.

In obedience to the directions of the "Act supplementary to the Act to establish the Treasury Department," the Secretary of the Treasury respectfully submits the following report and estimates:

Revenue.

The net revenue arising from duties upon imports and tonnage, internal duties, direct tax, public lands, postage, and incidental receipts, during the year 1816, amounted to $36,743,574 07, viz:

Customs		$27,569,769 71
Internal duties		4,396,133 25
Direct tax		2,785,343 20
Public lands, exclusive of Mississippi stock		1,754,487 38
Postage and incidental receipts		237,840 53
		$36,743,574 07

And that which accrued from the same sources during the year 1817, amounted to $24,387,993 08, viz:

Customs (see statement A)	$17,547,540 89
Internal duties and direct tax (see statement B)	4,512,287 81
Public lands exclusive of Mississippi stock (see statement C)	2,015,977 00
Postage and incidental receipts	312,187 38
	$24,387,993 08

It is ascertained that the gross amount of duties on merchandise and tonnage, which have accrued during the three first quarters of the present year exceeds $21,000,000, and that the sales of the public lands, during the same period, greatly exceed, both in quantity and value, those of the corresponding quarter of last year.

The payments into the Treasury during the three first quarters of the year, are estimated to amount to $17,167,862 26, viz:

Customs		$13,401,409 65
Internal revenue and direct tax		993,574 36
Public lands, exclusive of Mississippi stock		1,875,731 20
Interest upon bank dividends		525,000 00
Postage and incidental receipts		49,438 19
Repayments into the Treasury		322,708 86
		$17,167,862 26
And the payments into the Treasury during the fourth quarter of the year, from the same sources, are estimated at		5,000,000 00
Making the total amount estimated to be received into the Treasury during the year 1818		22,167,862 26
Which added to the balance in the Treasury on the 1st day of January last, exclusive of $8,809,872 10 in Treasury notes amounting to		6,179,883 38
Makes the aggregate amount of		$28,347,745 64

The application of this sum, for the year 1818, is estimated as follows: To the 30th September the payments (exclusive of $9,148,237 40 of Treasury notes, which had been drawn from the Treasury and cancelled) have amounted to $16,760,237 05, viz:

Civil, diplomatic, and miscellaneous expenses	$3,289,806 28
Military service, including arrearage	5,620,263 08
Naval service, including the permanent appropriation for the gradual increase of the Navy	2,383,000 00
Public debt, exclusive of the $9,148,237 40 of Treasury notes, which have been drawn out of the Treasury and cancelled	5,467,267 69
During the 4th quarter it is estimated that the payments will amount to $9,475,000, viz:
Civil, diplomatic, miscellaneous expenses	520,000 00
Military service	1,175,000 00
Naval service	575,000 00
Public debt to 1st of January, 1819	7,205,000 00
Making the aggregate amount of		$26,235,337 05
And leaving, on the 1st day of January, 1819, a balance in the Treasury, estimated at		$2,112,408 59

Of the Estimates of the Public Revenue and Expenditures for the year 1819.

In the annual report of the state of the Treasury of the 5th of December, 1817, the permanent revenue was estimated at $24,525,000 per annum; and the annual expenditure, according to the then existing laws, was stated at $21,946,351 74. By the acts of the last session of Congress, the internal duties, estimated at $2,500,000 per annum, were repealed, whilst the expenditure was augmented to nearly $25,000,000; and that of the ensuing year is estimated at not less than $24,515,219 76.

The apparent deficit produced by these acts, and by the application of more than $2,500,000 to the payment of the interest and redemption of the principal of the public debt, beyond the annual appropriation of $10,000,000 for that object, has been supplied by the receipts into the Treasury on account of the arrearage of the direct tax and internal duties, and by the balance of more than $6,000,000, which was in the Treasury on the first day of January, 1818.

These temporary sources of supply being nearly exhausted, the expenditure of the year 1819 must principally depend upon the receipts into the Treasury from the permanent revenue during that year. As was anticipated in the last annual report, the reaction produced by the excessive importations of foreign merchandise, during the years 1815 and 1816, acquired its greatest force in the year 1817.

It is presumed that the revenue which shall accrue during the present year from imports and tonnage, may be considered as the average amount which will be annually received from that source of the revenue.

It is ascertained that the bonds taken for securing duties which were outstanding on the 30th day of September last, exceeded $23,000,000, and the receipts into the Treasury from that source of revenue during the year 1819, are estimated at - - - - - $21,000,000 00

Public lands - - - -	1,500,000 00
Direct tax and internal duties -	750,000 00
Bank dividends at six per cent. -	420,000 00
First payment of bonus due by Bank of the United States -	500,000 00
Postage and incidental receipts -	50,000 00
Amounting together to -	$24,220,000 00
Which, added to balance in the Treasury on the first day of January, 1819, estimated at -	2,112,408 59
Makes the aggregate amount of	$26,232,408 59

In presenting this estimate of receipts for the year 1819, it is necessary to premise that the sum to be received from the customs is less than what, from the amount of the outstanding bonds, would under ordinary circumstances be received. The amount of the sales of public lands during the last year, and the sum due at this time by the purchasers, would justify a much higher estimate of the receipts from that important branch of revenue, if the most serious difficulty in making payments was not known to exist. The excessive issues of the banks during the suspension of specie payments, and the great exportation of the precious metals to the East Indies during the present year, have produced a pressure upon them which has rendered it necessary to contract their discounts for the purpose of withdrawing from circulation a large proportion of their notes. This operation, so oppressive to their debtors, but indispensably necessary to the existence of specie payments must be continued until gold and silver shall form a just proportion of the circulating currency. In passing through this ordeal, punctuality in the discharge of debts, both to individuals and to the Government, will be considerably impaired, and well-founded apprehensions are entertained that, until it is passed, payments in some of the land districts will be greatly diminished.

The extent to which the payments into the Treasury, during the year 1819, will be affected by the general pressure upon the community, which has been described, and which is the inevitable consequence of the overtrading of the banks and the exportation of specie to the East Indies, aggravated by the temporary failure of the ordinary supply of the precious metals from the Spanish American mines, cannot, at this time, be correctly appreciated. Should it exceed what has been contemplated in this report, the appropriations must be diminished, the revenue enlarged by new impositions, or temporary loans authorized to meet the deficiency. As the expenditure of the year 1820 will be greatly reduced by the irredeemable quality of the public debt, after the redemption of the remaining moiety of the Louisiana stock, which may be effected on the 21st day of October, 1819, a resort to temporary loans, or to the issue of Treasury notes, to the amount of the deficiency, should any occur, is believed to be preferable to the imposition of new taxes, which would not be required after that year.

All which is respectfully submitted.

WM. H. CRAWFORD.

State of Illinois—Slavery.

The engrossed resolution declaring the admission of the State of Illinois into the Union, on an equal footing with the original States, was read a third time; and on the question, "Shall it pass?"

Mr. TALLMADGE, of New York, assigned the reasons why, in his opinion, the resolution ought not to be adopted. It appeared to him, in the first place, he said, there ought to be before Congress some document, showing that the Territory had the population required by the law of last session. The recitation of the fact in the preamble of the constitution he did not consider as the proper sort of evidence. It was not, however, upon this point that he meant to rest his opposition to the adoption of the resolution. The principle of slavery, if not adopted in the constitution, was at least not sufficiently prohibited. The ordinance for the government of the territory northwest of the Ohio, which was in the nature of a convention between the United States and the people of the States and Territories to be formed out of that territory, contained some provisions applicable to this subject. The sixth article of that ordinance provided that, in the cession of territory accepted by the United States from Virginia, and comprising the whole north-western territory, there should be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, otherwise than as a punishment for the commitment of crimes; with a proviso, that this provision should not be construed to prevent the reclamation of runaway slaves. If the constitution was found to comport with that provision, it ought to be received by Congress;

if not, it ought to be rejected. The sixth article of the constitution of the new State of Illinois,* in each of its three sections, Mr. T. contended, contravened this stipulation, either in the letter or the spirit. These sections he separately examined, as to their construction and bearing, and felt himself constrained to come to the conclusion that they embraced a complete recognition of existing slavery, if not provisions for its future introduction and toleration; particularly in the passage wherein they permit the hiring of slaves, the property of non-residents, for any number of years consecutively. If Congress would observe in good faith the terms of the convention, he said, they were bound, under this circumstance, to reject the constitution of Illinois, or at least this feature of it. The State of Virginia, he said, had ceded the territory out of which this State was formed, on certain conditions, to the United States; one of which was that to which he had just adverted, and it was a monument to the fame of Virginia. It had often been cast as a reproach on this nation, that we, who boast our freedom, and pride ourselves on our independence, yet hold our fellow-beings in service. Americans had been represented, indeed, with one hand exhibiting the declaration of independence, and with the other brandishing the lash of despotism. When this stigma was attempted to be fixed on our country, it was a consolation to him, he said, that we have it in our power to cast it back again on the country from which we are severed—hers was the original sin, which we found in existence on our emancipation, and which it had been impossible to eradicate—we could do no more than control and regulate the evil. So far from wishing to invade the rights of the slaveholding States, or to assail their prerogatives, he believed they were equally sensible with him of the evils of slavery, and did what they could to control and regulate them. But, Mr. T. said, if Congress should voluntarily recognize this feature in a constitution submitted for their decision, and in violation, too, of a compact forbidding it, they would take upon themselves the unjust imputation he had alluded to. Mr. T. referred to the constitution of the State of Indiana, a State already admitted from the same territory, to show how carefully and scrupulously it had guarded against slavery in any shape, and in the strongest terms reprobated it; and lest at some future day amendments to the constitution should admit its introduction, a clause of that constitution forbade any amendment of that sort to be made. These sentiments of the State of Indiana, Mr. T. said, he reciprocated. Our interest and our honor, said he, calls on us rigidly to insist on the observance of good faith under the article of the ordinance I have referred to, so far as that no involuntary service be permitted to be recognized in the constitution of any State to be formed out of that territory.

Mr. POINDEXTER, of Mississippi, said he fully concurred with the gentleman from New York, in his solicitude to expel from our country, when ever practicable, any thing like slavery. It is not with us, said he, a matter of choice whether we will have slaves among us or not: we found them here, and we are obliged to maintain and employ them. It would be a blessing could we get rid of them; but the wisest and best men among us have not been able to devise a plan for doing it. The only question at present is whether the State of Illinois has virtually complied with her contract, and followed the example of the two other States already erected from the same territory. To illustrate that fact, Mr. P. referred to the constitution of Ohio, the erection of which State, from the Northwestern Territory, the gentleman appeared to have overlooked; and showed that the article on the subject of slaves was almost literally copied from the constitution of Ohio into that of Illinois. The third section of the article in question, in the latter, was the only variation, and the necessity of that additional provision would be obvious to any gentleman who would examine and reflect upon the subject. By an antecedent law of the territorial government, all persons, slaves or under indenture, in the territory, were required to be registered, as the only way in which they could be discriminated from fugitives, &c. The constitution directs that their children also shall be registered, that they may be secure of enjoying their freedom, when by the constitution they become entitled. From their color, (being prima facie slaves in other States,) was it not more secure to the freedom of the people of color, that their births, parentage, &c., should be recorded in the new State, than otherwise? So far from constituting an objection to it, Mr. P. said, he considered this a valuable part of the constitution of Illinois. As to children, born of slaves, not being free until eighteen or

* ART. 6. Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude shall hereafter be introduced into this State, otherwise than for the punishment of crimes, whereof the party shall have been duly convicted; nor shall any male person, arrived at the age of twenty-one years, nor female person arrived at the age of eighteen years, be held to serve any person as a servant, under any indenture hereafter made, unless such person shall enter into such indenture while in a state of perfect freedom, and on condition of a bona fide consideration received, or to be received, for that service. Nor shall any indenture of any negro or mulatto, hereafter made and executed out of this State, or, if made in this State, where the term of service exceeds one year, be of the least validity, except those given in cases of apprenticeship.

SEC. 2. No person bound to labor in any other State shall be hired to labor in this State, except within the tract reserved for the salt works, near Shawneetown; nor even at that place for a longer period than one year at any one time; nor shall it be allowed there after the year one thousand eight hundred and twenty-five; any violation of this article shall effect the emancipation of such person from his obligation to service.

SEC. 3. Each and every person who has been bound to service by contract or indenture, in virtue of the laws of the Illinois Territory, heretofore existing, and in conformity to the provisions of the same, without fraud or collusion, shall be held to a specific performance of their contracts or indentures; and such negroes and mulattoes as have been registered in conformity with the aforesaid laws, shall serve out the time appointed by said laws: Provided, however, That the children hereafter born of such persons, negroes, or mulattoes, shall become free, the males at the age of twenty-one years, the females at the age of eighteen years. Each and every child born of indentured parents shall be entered with the clerk of the county in which they reside, by their owners, within six months after the birth of said child.—Constitution of Illinois.

twenty-one years of age, Mr. P. said that would be no great hardship, seeing it was as soon as white persons were free from their parents, or from their indentures, if apprenticed. With respect to constitutional provisions on this subject, Mr. P. said, after all, it would be found impracticable, after admitting the independence of a State, to prevent it from framing or shaping its constitution as it thought proper. As to a constitution like that of Indiana, prohibiting the introduction of an amendment to it, of whatever nature, if the people were to form a convention to-morrow, that provision would be of no force: the whole power would be with the people, whom, in their sovereign capacity, no provision of that nature can control. Nor could Congress prevent them. Various attempts had already been made in Ohio to alter that feature. In the nature of free governments, no law could be irrepealable; though on this head he observed, he hoped that neither Ohio, Indiana, nor Illinois would ever permit the introduction of slavery within their limits. He hoped, as far as we could, we should expel slavery from the country. At the same time, he thought that Illinois, so far as she had gone, had done better than the States which had preceded her in the same quarter, because she had provided for the security of the freedom of negroes, mulattoes, &c., and to prevent them from being kidnapped, by causing them to be registered.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kentucky, repeated what he had said on Friday last, respecting the population of Illinois, and his own conviction that it was of the required amount. If on this subject Congress had been very scrupulous, Mr. A. said, he would have directed a census of the population to be taken by persons appointed by the United States for that purpose; but they had always heretofore in like cases submitted to Territorial counts and Territorial results, and he did not see why they should not do the same in the present case. All that was necessary was that they should be reasonably satisfied of their accuracy. With respect to the other objection of the gentleman, he thought he could satisfy him that his position was manifestly incorrect. It would be seen, on reading the articles of cession by Virginia, that no condition, such as the gentleman supposed, was annexed to it, respecting slavery. The conditions she required were of a different character, and this provision respecting slavery had been prescribed by Congress, among other articles framed for the government of the Territory thus ceded. Virginia had no concern in it, except so far as she was represented on the floor of Congress, when the ordinance was passed. Still less were the people of the Northwestern Territory a party to the compact, as the gentleman supposed it, not being represented at all, nor consulted on the occasion. Congress then are not in this respect bound by any pledge, nor by any thing but a sense of expediency, co-operating with the like sense of the people of Illinois. The conditions reserved by Virginia on making the cession were that a certain number of States should be erected from the Territory, and all existing rights of the people preserved; and, Mr. A. said, there were slaves in the Territory at that day. So far from Virginia requiring the abolition of slavery, doubts had arisen whether, under the stipulations she made on ceding the Territory to the United States, Congress should pass the ordinance which they subsequently enacted. Serious doubts had arisen, after stipulating to make three States, whether Congress had a right to prescribe any condition respecting slavery, &c.; not, Mr. A. said, that he would destroy the ordinance, but he meant to state only how far its scope extended. There was nothing unconstitutional, in any view, in Congress accepting what the people of Illinois have done, if they thought proper; since the consent of the two contracting parties (supposing the ordinance to be a compact) would thus be given. With respect to the nature of the provisions referred to in the constitution, the gentleman who preceded him had clearly shown that they had been misunderstood by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. TALLMADGE replied.—In referring to the ordinance, as binding Congress not to permit slavery, in any of the States formed from the Northwestern Territory, he conceived Congress to be bound by a tie not to be broken: but, if in this he was wrong, and Congress are bound by nothing but their sense of expediency, that tie became ten thousand times more strong. Are we, said he, to be drawn into a discussion of slavery, its merits and demerits, on abstract principles? He would not enter into such a discussion; but must persist in stating it as his opinion, that the interest, honor, and faith of the nation, required it scrupulously to guard against slavery's passing into a territory where they have power to prevent its entrance. Mr. T. again enumerated the provisions in the constitution of Illinois, to which he objected, and made further remarks on them. He considered it such, that to accept it, would be to violate a pledge solemnly given, and, if not a stipulation, yet, so simultaneously given, as to amount to a compact with Virginia. With respect to the power of a State to change its constitution, he was not prepared to say that a State was, in that respect, under no restraint. Would gentlemen admit a State into the Union to-day under a republican form of government, and permit it to call a convention to-morrow, and change its form of government to a monarchy? That State would cease, by the very act, to be a component part of the Union, and the same result would follow, he presumed, if a State were to violate the condition on which it was admitted into this Union, by admitting the introduction of slavery.

Mr. LIVERMORE requested the yeas and nays on the decision of this question.

Mr. HARRISON said, that, as a Representative of Ohio, he protested against the doctrine of the gentleman from New York. He could assure the gentleman that the people of that State were fully aware of their privileges, and would never come to this House, or to the State of New York, for permission so to alter their constitution as to admit the introduction of slavery, the object of the gentleman's abhorrence, as, said Mr. H., it is of mine. They had entered into no compact which had shorn the people of their sovereign authority. Mr. H. proceeded to make some remarks respecting the operation of the ordinance, cessions, &c. Though there were slaves in that country when ceded, there had been none in that part of it from which the State of Ohio had been formed, so that no provision had been necessary respecting them in the constitution of that State. In Indiana, the question relating to this description of property had been reserved for the decision of the courts of justice, &c., and he sincerely wished that Illinois had either emancipated its slaves or followed the example of Indiana. In regard to the supposed compact, however, and its efficacy, Mr. H. said, he had always considered it a dead letter. He could not put his hand on the page, or on the letter, but he believed it would be found that, in one of the pages of the Federalist, the authority of which he presumed, at least, the gentleman from New York would respect, Alexander Hamilton had expressly declared the same opinion. He could not believe, he said, that Congress would refuse to accept the State of Illinois on the ground of that compact: for his part, he wished to see that State, and all that Territory, disenthralled from the effect of articles to which they never gave their assent, and to which they were not properly subject. This much he wished, however he was opposed to slavery, and should lament its introduction into any part of the Territory.

After a few further remarks, from Mr. TALLMADGE, Mr. ANDERSON, and Mr. STORRS, the question on the passage of the resolution was decided in the affirmative—yeas 117, nays 34, as follows:

Bank of the United States.

Mr. SPENCER, of New York, offered for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inspect the books and examine into the proceedings of the Bank of the United States, and to report whether the provisions of its charter have been violated or not; and particularly to report whether the instalments of the capital stock of the said bank have been paid in gold or silver coin, and in the funded debt of the United States, or whether they were, in any instance, and to what amount, paid by the proceeds of the notes of stockholders, discounted for that purpose; and also to report the names of those persons who now own, or who have owned, any part of the capital stock of the said bank, and the amount of discounts, if any, to such persons respectively, and when made; and also to report whether the said bank, or any of its offices of discount and deposit, have refused to pay the notes of the bank in specie on demand, and have refused to receive in payment of debts due to them, or either of them, the notes of the bank, and whether the bank or any of its offices of discount, or any of their officers or agents have sold drafts upon other offices, or upon the bank, at an advance, and have received a premium for such drafts; also, the amount of the notes issued payable at Philadelphia, and at each office of discount respectively, and the amount of capital assigned to each office, together with the amount of the public deposits made at the bank and at each office, and an account of the transfers thereof, and the total amount of bills and notes discounted at the bank and its several offices since its organization; that the said committee have leave to meet in the city of Philadelphia, and to remain there as long as may be necessary; that they shall have power to send for persons and papers, and to employ the requisite clerks, the expense of which shall be audited and allowed by the Committee of Accounts, and paid out of the contingent fund of this House.

Mr. SPENCER remarked, on introducing this motion, that it was with considerable reluctance he had submitted it to the House—a reluctance, however, proceeding solely from his inability to do justice to the subject, and not from any doubt of the necessity or of the propriety of the proceeding. He had waited till this day, in the hope that some member, whose experience was more extensive than his own, would have moved the inquiry; but, having been in this respect disappointed, he had felt it his imperious duty to do it. As to the authority of this House to make the investigation, he thought there could be little doubt. If there should be any doubt on the mind of any gentleman on this subject, he referred him to the 23d section of the act establishing the bank, which expressly authorized an examination of the books of the bank when required, by a committee of Congress. As to the necessity of the inquiry proposed, he presumed there were few of those near him who were not aware of the agitation which exists in the public mind on this subject, and who did not perceive that, from one end of the country to the other, loud complaints were made against the conduct of the officers of the bank. It was necessary for him to state, Mr. S. said, as he did explicitly state, that he meant to implicate the conduct of the bank in no respect; on that point he had formed no opinion, and would form none, until the facts reported by the committee should justify him in drawing his conclusions on the subject. He was neither hostile to the bank, nor particularly friendly; he owed nothing to it; he was the proprietor of none of its stock, nor, that he knew of, were any of his friends. But, that complaints existed against the bank, he well knew; and, whether well or ill-founded, it was equally due to the nation and to the bank that a fair inquiry should take place, and such a report be made as would show that the complaints were unjust, if such should prove to be the fact, or, if otherwise, should exhibit the specific instances of misconduct which the committee should be able to discover. The objects specified in the resolve, Mr. S. said, were all those respecting which, to his knowledge, complaints had been made; and they were subjects respecting which it was at least certain that the nation required information. The friends of the bank, he thought, ought to solicit the inquiry proposed; they should be anxious that a full investigation should take place, and that, too, by a committee having no resentments against the bank to gratify, nor any feelings of friendship or attachment to bias them against it—by a committee, depending on their own inspection for facts, and not on information of a general nature derived from the officers of the bank. A full and fair view of the whole subject, thus obtained, would be attended with the most happy consequences to the nation and to the bank. If it should be shown that immense discounts had not been made to particular persons, for the purpose of speculation merely; that, by this means, the stock of the bank had not been blown up into a bubble which had now burst; that the bank had distributed its accommodations with a view to the accommodation of the community rather than of individuals; that it had used its best exertions to accomplish, what was one of the objects of its establishment, the equalization of the currency, as far as practicable; if it had done all this, and fairly endeavored to meet the public expectations, although it may have failed in that object, it would become an act of justice to rally around the institution, to sustain and give it credit, because no one could doubt the utility of such an institution to the nation, if properly conducted. With these observations, Mr. S. submitted the resolution to the will of the House.

Mr. MCLANE, of Delaware, rose, he said, not to offer any opposition to the inquiry, but merely to request time to give to the subject of the resolution such a consideration as its importance deserved. It would be recollected by the House, that a resolution had passed the Senate during the last session, calling on the Secretary of the Treasury to lay before Congress a particular account of the state and transactions of the bank. This report might be expected shortly to be laid before Congress; and in that report would, perhaps, be embraced all the information required by the resolve. Although rumors had existed, Mr. McL. said, with regard to certain transactions in the bank, he thought it would be well not to institute an inquiry hastily on the foundation of mere rumor. He wished the resolution to lie on the table for a day, or for a longer time, that the House might have time to reflect on it. He, therefore, moved that it lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. SPENCER said he had no sort of objection to this course; but he hoped that, after gentlemen should have reflected on it, they would be disposed to take it up and act on it at an early day.

Claim of Beaumarchais.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. SMITH of Maryland in the chair, on the bill for the relief of the heirs and representatives of Caron de Beaumarchais.

[The magnitude of this claim makes it an important one, and the long interval of time which has elapsed since the debt was contracted, has at once trippled the amount of the debt, and involved in some obscurity the question of the justice of the claim. In the report of the committee to whom the subject was referred at the last session, and on which this bill is founded, the members of the committee were unanimous. This report, which is an elaborate and able one, was read through to-day by the Clerk. A report of a committee of a former Congress, adverse to the claim, and equally elaborate, was also read through.]

After the reading of these documents—

Mr. BASSETT made a few remarks on the merits of this claim, impressively urging on the House the justice of giving to the claim a liberal and serious consideration. He stated the important services rendered to the United States by M. Beaumarchais, and the reduced fortunes of his heirs. After reading the warm expression of thanks to that gentleman by the Continental Congress, and stating that his aid had essentially contributed to some of the most important and successful events of the Revolutionary war, Mr. B. expressed his hope that the door would not be closed in the face of his representatives, suing for a debt justly due by the United States, and the want of which had impoverished them.

Mr. PITKIN said that this claim was of that nature, and of that amount, too, which required a cool consideration of its nature; and that the House should closely examine into its merits for themselves. With regard to this claim, some of the documents unfavorable to it had been destroyed at the time of the invasion of 1814; others were not generally accessible, or not generally understood. As gentlemen could not have had time to look over the papers at the present session, and it was, withal, growing late, he moved that the committee should rise, that, on meeting again, gentlemen might be better prepared than at present to go into a consideration of the question.

Whereupon the committee rose, and obtained leave to sit again.

FRIDAY, November 27.

Another member, to wit, from Virginia, WILLIAM LEE BALL, appeared, and took his seat.

Claim of Beaumarchais.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of the heirs of Caron de Beaumarchais.

Mr. PITKIN, of Connecticut, opened the debate, in opposition to the bill, in a speech which occupied in the delivery the whole of the day's sitting. In the outset, he remarked on the importance of the subject in hand; the interest it had excited, and the feeling it had produced in the old Congress, as well as under the present Government, whenever it had presented itself for consideration. During the existence of the war of the Revolution, some of the documents relating to it had miscarried, and some had been stolen in their transmission; others had been since destroyed by fire, or overlooked in the mass of public papers. Hence the claim had been involved in much mystery, requiring close investigation to unravel it. Mr. P. then proceeded to the examination of the subject, as it had been viewed by the Commissioners of the United States at Paris, by the French Government, and by the claimants. In the course of his argument, he read extracts from letters of Arthur Lee, Benjamin Franklin, and Silas Deane; from the American and French diplomatic volumes; from Gordon's history, and from various other sources. From all these documents, and connecting all the facts disclosed by them together, Mr. P. thought the conclusion irresistible, that the supplies furnished by Caron de Beaumarchais had been a gratuitous aid by the Government of France, and not a private transaction of Beaumarchais. The French Government, which had always disclaimed all expectation of repayment of the aid thus afforded, under the critical circumstances in which it was then placed, Mr. P. contended, had availed itself of the cover of a mercantile transaction, and of the agency of Beaumarchais as the ostensible shipper of supplies; that it had done so, the public disavowal of any agency in this matter was no proof to the contrary, being a part of the policy of concealment which dictated the employment of mercantile agency in the first instance. This claim, therefore, Mr. P. considered as wholly unsustained, and founded on an attempt on the part of Beaumarchais to aggrandize himself and family, by taking advantage of the secret agency in which his name had been employed, and that of the Government and its officers wholly concealed, to claim remuneration from the United States for the supplies sent, as if the matter had been a speculation of his own.

After Mr. P. had concluded his remarks, the committee rose, and obtained leave to sit again.

MONDAY, November 30.

Two other members, to wit: JAMES B. MASON, from Rhode Island, and JOEL ABBOTT, from Georgia, appeared, and took their seats.

Bank of the United States.

The House having agreed now to proceed to the consideration of the resolution moved by Mr. SPENCER, of New York, a few days ago,

Mr. MCLANE, of Delaware, said, he had no objection to the object of the proposed inquiry, though he had some objection to the form given to it. He thought it contemplated a wider scope of inquiry than was within the power of Congress. He referred to the act incorporating the bank, and quoted so much of it as reserved to Congress the power to appoint a committee to examine its books, &c., for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not the bank has violated its charter. He drew a distinction between this power and that of appointing a committee to inspect the books and proceedings of the bank, for the purpose of reporting to this House and publishing to all the world all its transactions, of whatever nature. The specification of the objects of inquiry was so little necessary to the main object of the resolution, that it would lose nothing of its effect by striking them all out. The inquiry into the amount of discounts to a particular class of individuals, for example, he considered as exceptionable. The right of lending money is vested in the bank, at its discretion, to whomsoever it shall choose. If it have even exercised that power indiscreetly, it is immaterial to this House, with reference to a violation of its charter, (the object of inquiry,) to whom discounts have been made. If the House went so far as was proposed in this respect, it should go further. It should authorize a report to be made of the names of all those who have applied for discounts at the bank, and been refused; and also an inquiry into the character and solvency of all those persons, in order to make that branch of the inquiry effectual. The necessary powers in this respect, Mr. McL. said, the committee of this House would have, under the charter, without a specification of the objects of inquiry; if the committee had not, under the charter, the powers proposed to be given to it, the specification would not confer them. Since, then, the specification was unnecessary, and the resolution, divested of it, would answer every object the gentleman had in view, Mr. McL. moved to amend the resolution, by striking out all that part of it after the words "violated or not," near the beginning, to the word "organization," near the end of it, inclusive. This would leave the inquiry as broad and comprehensive as the nature of the subject would permit, and would divest the resolve of its objectionable features.

Mr. SPENCER opposed the amendment moved by Mr. McLANE. As to the powers of the House, the language of the resolution was that of the charter, respecting the power of inquiry reserved to Congress. The gentleman seemed to suppose that a committee of Congress, appointed for the purpose, might report whether the charter was violated or not, but were not at liberty to report the facts on which that opinion was founded. But, Mr. S. said, when a power is given, the means of carrying that power into execution are also given. If the power were given to inquire whether the charter of the bank had been violated or not, it irresistibly followed, that the power was also given to report the facts which had led to that conclusion. But the gentleman objected, that such a report would involve the exposure of private accounts. Mr. S. said he thought he had not examined the resolution with his usual attention; if he would read it again, he would find that no private account whatever was proposed to be examined, except the accounts of the stockholders, so far as to the amount of discounts which they may have received. No inquiry was proposed as to the balance of private individuals' accounts; none as to their deposits; none as to the amount of the debts which they may now owe to the bank, but the aggregate amount of discounts to the individual stockholders since the commencement of the operations of the bank. The resolution does not imply that the stockholders were not justly entitled to the accommodation they have received, nor does it question their solvency; but the particular inquiry objected to is essential, said Mr. S., to enable us to make up our minds whether the bank has acted correctly or not. The object of the resolution, Mr. S. went on to say, did not appear to be precisely understood, perhaps owing to his own neglect not more carefully to explain it. Its object was twofold; to inquire, first, whether there had been a violation of the charter or not; and, secondly, whether improper discounts had not been made to stockholders, &c. The mode of violation of the charter being pointed out in that instrument, needed no more precise definition than that contained in the first clause of the resolve. Then followed, however, in the resolution, other objects of inquiry, regarding the particular instances of alleged misconduct to which the attention of the public has been directed. To accomplish this object another power had been given, to send for persons and papers. It did not follow, because the committee was to report on these particular instances, that the committee was to derive its information from the books of the bank alone. There were other means at their disposal; they might examine papers not belonging to the bank, and persons having personal knowledge of its transactions. An objection had been raised, as he had understood, and to which (though not yet urged in this House) he would advert, that this specification of particular points of inquiry appeared to contain a censure upon the bank, or on the conduct of its officers. It was not so intended, Mr. S. said, nor did he think such an inference could be fairly drawn from the words of the resolve. It embraced some points of inquiry involving no misconduct in their result—that, for example, respecting the refusal of the bank to pay specie for the notes of its branches, &c. There were few who would say that that measure was an evidence of misconduct on the part of the bank, much less that it was a violation of its charter; because such a measure may have been necessary and unavoidable in the present state of the money concerns of the country. The resolution was not intended to convey charges against the bank, but to embrace all the topics respecting which the public mind had been agitated, and to obtain a report thereon from a respectable committee of this House. As to the facts which rendered such an inquiry necessary, it had been suggested that mere general rumor was not a sufficient foundation for this House to act upon. Mr. S. said, he had meant to be understood as having introduced this resolution, not under the influence of general rumor merely, but, as he now stated, he had individual information which left him no doubt of the truth of most of the allegations which he had heard on this subject. With respect to the fact of the payment of the second instalment by discounts to the stockholders, the letter of Mr. Lloyd to a committee of this House, and now on its files, established that fact; and from the circular letters of the cashiers of the bank and its branches, published for information in the public prints, he had evidence of the refusal to pay the notes of the bank or its branches, except where issued. There seemed, therefore, to be sufficient information to authorize an inquiry—sufficient, at least, to induce a belief that there was something to excite the agitation which all knew to exist in the public mind. It had, indeed, appeared to him to be due from him to the House, to state what charges he had heard against the bank, and what were the objects to which he was led to direct the inquiries of the committee. It had appeared to him proper, also, to let the bank and the community know to what objects the inquiry was pointed. He could see no harm from the specific designation of the objects of the inquiry; but, on the contrary, he said, good might be anticipated, for the reasons already stated. With these views he could not assent to the modification proposed, and should feel it to be his duty to vote against it.

Mr. LOWNDES, of South Carolina, commenced his remarks in favor of the proposed amendment, by saying that he should not vote for it from any apprehension of defect of power in the House to prosecute the inquiry in the terms proposed. He had no doubt of the power of the House, if the public interest required it, to direct a committee to make such a report. He decidedly objected, however, to the specifications proposed to be stricken out, on the ground that, if retained, the inference would follow, that certain allegations were therein embraced, the truth of which being confirmed by inquiry, the censure of Congress if not the penalty due to a violation of the charter, would follow of course. If a committee should be directed to inquire whether the bank has violated its charter, and, particularly, whether it has paid its instalments by discounts, &c., the impression would be made on the mind of every man that the committee had nothing to do but to ascertain these facts, to prove the charter of the bank to have been violated. It did not comport with justice, nor, Mr. L. thought, with the dignity of the House; in a case, too, where the gentleman himself knew the principles involved to be susceptible of much argument and discussion for and against them, to force the public mind, as it were, to the conclusion that, certain facts being proved, the charter of the bank will be proved to have been violated. Therefore, he was in favor of excluding the specifications: with regard to the objects of them, he had no objection whatever to an inquiry on those and all others that might be suggested. The nation, said he, has a deep interest in the conduct and management of the bank; our duty to the people whom we represent, the national interest as owners of a large portion of the stock, its interest in the revenues being wholly payable in the notes of that bank, will justify us in a constant and vigilant attention to its proceedings. If there had been a doubt whether the conduct of the bank had been proper or not, Mr. L. said, the House was fully justified in investigating into the facts, and inquiring whether abuses had been committed or not. Such an investigation he considered at present not only interesting to the public, but necessary to the bank. Many imputations had been thrown on the bank, the result of disappointed expectations, where the expectations themselves had been unreasonable; and it was the interest of the bank that a full inquiry should take place. Recurring to the observation of the effect the specifications in the resolution would have on the public mind, Mr. L. said, while he would therefore exclude them, at the same time voting for any inquiry in its broadest shape, he would remind gentlemen of some circumstances connected with the contents of the resolve. The mover of it had himself referred to a report made by a committee of this House appointed to inquire into the subject of the payment of the second instalment on the stock of the bank by discounts—a report made at a time when, if that course had been wrong, it was in the power of Congress to have prevented it. The fact of a general regulation having been adopted for discounting notes for payment of the second instalment, was acknowledged to the committee, who yet reported to this House a recommendation that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

Mr. L. said he would not now enter into an investigation of the conduct of the bank on that occasion; his impression at the time had been, that the arrangement was beneficial to the community, by facilitating and expediting the organization of the bank, &c.; but that it was an imprudent one, on the part of the directors of that institution, whose object it should be to adhere to the very line of their duty, as pointed out by the charter. The point, however, to which he desired to call the attention of the House, was, that when the corrective and remedy were in their hands, if the act was wrong, a committee having been instructed to inquire into it, and having reported the fact, the House had not thought proper to interfere at all in the business. Under these circumstances, said he, it would be harsh indeed, at this late hour, availing ourselves of the new lights which experience has afforded us, to censure the bank for having done that to which, at the time, we tacitly consented. A distinction, of course, must be drawn between the second and third instalments, in regard to the mode of payment; the payment of the latter by notes, discounted for that purpose, every body anticipated. The bank was then in full operation, discounting all good paper offered to it, and could not be expected to pass a law of exclusion in regard to its own stockholders, who had as fair a claim at least as others to accommodation; indeed, there never perhaps had gone a bank into operation in which the same thing had not occurred; it was therefore expected of the Bank of the United States in regard to the third instalment on its stock, and could not be considered as forming a ground of complaint against it. Another specific object of the inquiry was, whether the bank or its branches had sold drafts and received a premium thereon. The gentleman from New York had stated, with great candor, as he understood him, that he did not consider it an imputation on the bank that it had refused to pay specie for its notes at any other branch than that from which they issued; and that he therefore did not mean to contend that the bank ought to have made its paper and that of its branches payable indifferently at the bank or at any and all of its branches. Connected very closely with this subject, Mr. L. said, was the practice of selling drafts on distant banks for a premium. He knew, he said, that much of the disapprobation of the conduct of the bank proceeded from the disappointment of an expectation that it would emit and sustain a currency which should be of equal value throughout the Union; and, it might be of some importance, as many of the members of the present Congress were not members of the last, to advert to circumstances which proved that the expectation referred to was never entertained in this House at the time the bank was incorporated. The Congress which preceded that by which the bank was established, Mr. L. said, had had under its consideration a bill for establishing a bank, one clause of which did provide that the bank and all its branches should be obliged to pay the notes of each other; by which means, if practicable, the paper of all would have been everywhere of an equal value. That clause, however, was not inserted in the bill which actually passed. If there were no other, this would be sufficient proof, from the records of the House, that it was not expected that a currency that should be everywhere of equal value would be established. But, further: in the act of incorporating the bank, there is a provision that the bank shall charge nothing to the Government for difference of exchange. Was this not, Mr. L. asked, positive proof that it was expected that the bank would charge in some cases the difference of exchange? Was it not proof that it was the expectation of the framers of the law that the present state of things would result? He would not enter at all into the general question whether it would or would not be possible for the Bank of the United States to equalize, without great loss, the exchange between different sections of the country, if by their charter they were bound to do so. If it were practicable, it would be even now their interest to do it; but, Mr. L. said, he believed it would be wholly impracticable. The question was not, however, whether it was possible for the United States to effect it, whether it would be beneficial to the country or to the institution, but whether the bank was bound to effect the object. The exclusion of the clause having this object, after it had been included in a like bill before Congress, at the preceding session, and, in addition, the express exception of the Government from all charge for difference of exchange, showed that it was not expected of the bank. If, however, he were to go into the discussion of the practicability of establishing a circulating medium of equal value in every part of the country, it would appear not only that in the reason of the thing it was not practicable, but experience also would show that in a large empire it is visionary to look for it. Even in England, as gentlemen well knew, when the bank paid in specie, the value of a bank note in different parts of the country was not the same. There was a settled rate of exchange between Edinburgh and London, and between all the important towns in Great Britain; and the Bank of England, with every advantage, improved by a hundred years of experience, had never been able to accomplish that object. The inquiry, however, was not whether the object was practicable or possible, but whether the bank was bound to effect it; and he had shown that it was not. Objections of a similar nature might be urged to most of the specifications in the resolve; but it was sufficient to say that, if necessary, the committee, under the general terms of inquiry, would feel themselves at liberty to inquire and report on any of the points in question; that no additional power could be conferred on the committee by descending to particulars; and that to retain the specification might produce an impression that the House had determined certain facts, if proved to be conclusive against the bank, whilst the House had, in fact, expressed no opinion upon them. There was another objection, of a different kind, to the terms of the resolve as it now stood: that it specified certain objects, to which it in a manner thus limited the proposed inquiry, whilst, in his opinion, there were many facts not referred to, equally if not more important to the bank, and to the public interests, than those which were. Without justifying or censuring the conduct of the bank, without expressing, in a parenthesis, or by inuendo, an opinion unfavorable to it, Mr. L. said he thought it would be proper to institute a committee of inquiry, and leave them, on their own responsibility, to settle the principles on which they should proceed in it, and to report accordingly. He was in favor of leaving the committee wholly unfettered, except by their own opinion of what was required by the public good; and therefore hoped the amendment would be agreed to.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inspect the books and examine into the proceedings of the Bank of the United States, to report thereon, and to report whether the provisions of its charter have been violated or not; that the said committee have leave to meet in the city of Philadelphia, and remain there as long as may be necessary; that they shall have power to send for persons and papers, and to employ the requisite clerks; the expense of which shall be audited and allowed by the Committee of Accounts, and paid out of the contingent fund of this House.

And it was passed in the affirmative.

Messrs. SPENCER, LOWNDES, MCLANE, BRYAN, and TYLER, were appointed the said committee.

TUESDAY, December 1.

Mr. MIDDLETON presented the petition of the Marquis de Vienne, stating, that he served as a Colonel in the service of the United States, in the Revolutionary war; that he was then rich and refused to receive any compensation, but that, having been reduced to poverty by the revolutions in France, he is now compelled to seek a remuneration for his said services, from Congress, and praying to be paid such sum as may be thought a just equivalent therefor; which petition was referred to a select committee; and Mr. MIDDLETON, Mr. HARRISON, and Mr. COLSTON, were appointed the said committee.

Migration of Slaves.

Mr. LINN, of New Jersey, offered the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the committee appointed on so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to the unlawful introduction of slaves into the United States, be instructed to inquire into the expediency of passing a law prohibiting the migration or transportation of slaves or servants of color from any State to any other part of the United States, in cases where, by the laws of such State, such transportation is prohibited; and that they have leave to report by bill or otherwise."

Mr. LINN said, in introducing his resolution, that it related to a subject of much interest in his part of the country, and, as the resolution only proposed an inquiry, he hoped it would not be objected to.

Mr. POINDEXTER, of Mississippi, objected to it. Any man, he said, had a right to remove his property from one State to another, and slaves as well as any other property, if not prohibited from doing so by the State laws. With those laws, whatever they were, the United States, he said, had no right to interfere. The idea was a perfectly novel one, that there should be a double set of penal statutes on the same subject—one set by the States, and one by the United States—and that the military force of the United States should be employed to carry into effect the penal statute of any State. How were the United States to interfere on this subject? What judicial tribunal would they resort to, to effect the object contemplated? Any penal statute they could pass on the subject, Mr. P. said, would be entirely nugatory, as it could not be carried into effect; and he was therefore opposed even to an inquiry into the matter.

Mr. COLSTON, of Virginia, in addition to what had fallen from Mr. POINDEXTER in opposition to the resolution, suggested that it was perfectly within the power of the State sovereignties to execute any law they might enact on this subject, more effectually than they could do by the aid of the authority of the United States.

The question on the passage of the resolve was then taken, and decided in the negative.

General John Stark.

The bill for granting a pension of sixty dollars per month to Major General John Stark, was read a third time.

On the question, "Shall the bill pass?"

Mr. W. P. MACLAY asked for information of the committee who reported the bill, as no written report had accompanied it, on what grounds it stood; whether the pension was granted because of indigence on the part of General Stark, or for what other reason?

Mr. HARRISON, of Ohio, said his friend from Georgia, (Mr. COBB,) could not have been present when this subject was before the House at the last session, or he would not have asked the information which he now desired. He had supposed his friend from Georgia was better acquainted with the history of his country, than not to know the merits and distinguished Revolutionary services of this hoary veteran. At the darkest period of the Revolution, General Stark had rendered the most important services to his country; and those services were not occasional, but were prolonged to the close of the contest. It was now said that this worthy was in indigent circumstances, and debilitated by old age; that, if not soon bestowed, he would not live to enjoy the aid about to be afforded to him. Was it possible, Mr. H. asked, that an American Congress could behold so distinguished a patriot, as he is, sinking into the grave in the want of every necessary of life, or that they would coldly place him among the mass of pensioners under the general act of last session? For his part, he would give out the last dollar in the Treasury for the relief of General Stark. With him, he said, it was not a matter of choice to vote for the bill; it was an imperious duty.

Mr. LIVERMORE said, that as a member of this House, and as a citizen of New Hampshire, he was grateful to the gentleman from Ohio for the manner in which he had expressed himself on this occasion. He would only add that, as to the circumstances of General Stark, they were, to his personal knowledge, very reduced. He was, as to personal exertion for his support, at the age of ninety years, wholly helpless. He might or might not be owner of a small farm; but, if so, it was an unproductive one. He was, and had been for some time, dependent for support on his children, themselves in very moderate circumstances. This was the true situation of General Stark.

Mr. COBB said, if it was true, as suggested by the gentleman from Ohio, that he was not well versed in the Revolutionary history, should he want information on that head, he should know where to apply; for the gentleman himself was a living chronicle of the occurrences of that day. He did not, he said, doubt the merits of General Stark; but he had yet no evidence that the pension ought to be granted. The House had been told he was very old and infirm. But, if the House were to grant pensions to the old and infirm, where would they draw the line at which they would stop? Are we to be told, said he, that it is to Revolutionary officers only that pensions are to be granted? Some twenty or forty years hence, may not the same argument, by the aid of this precedent, be applied to General Jackson, General Brown, General Scott, or any other general who distinguished himself during the late war? He was free to say, for himself, that he thought the pension list had already been swelled to an amount which absolutely jeopardized the Treasury, or soon would at the rate at which it still increased.

Mr. LIVERMORE said, General Stark had worn himself out in the service of his country, in his youth, and had since supported himself as well as he could. He was in service before the Revolution, and during that trial he did the nation great service and himself great honor. At an early period of the Revolution, when every patriot was called a traitor, Stark was in the foremost rank. He was in the field at Bennington, and animated the courage of others by his conduct and example. All the inhabitants of New Hampshire, and of the Green Mountains, flocked where Stark was; where he fought, they fought and bled; had he died, they would have died with him.

Mr. BUTLER, of New Hampshire, gave some further information respecting General Stark. He was, he said, the only surviving general officer of the Revolution, now declining in old age, extremely poor, and long supported by his sons, who were not very well able to do it. This, Mr. B. said, might be the last opportunity Congress could have of contributing to the relief of his wants. As a precedent had been demanded, Mr. B. quoted the pension granted at the last session to General St. Clair as directly in point. General Stark, he added, had served during the whole French war, and no man had afterwards done more than him to assert and establish the independence of his country.

The question on the passage of the bill was decided in the affirmative, without division.

WEDNESDAY, December 2.

Another member, to wit, from Pennsylvania, JOSEPH HEISTER, appeared, and took his seat.

A new member, to wit, from North Carolina, WILLIAM DAVIDSON, elected to supply the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Daniel M. Forney, also appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

THURSDAY, December 3.

Another member, to wit, from Pennsylvania, LEVI PAWLING, appeared, and took his seat.

FRIDAY, December 4.

Another member, to wit, from Massachusetts, TIMOTHY FULLER, appeared, and took his seat.

Mr. JOHN MCLEAN appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat as the Representative of the State of Illinois in this House.

Claim of Beaumarchais.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill reported by the select committee for the relief of the heirs of Caron de Beaumarchais.

Mr. TALLMADGE resumed the debate on this subject, and spoke about an hour in opposition to the claim and the bill. He was followed by Mr. BASSETT, in a speech of about the same length, in support of the claim, and in defence of the report of the committee thereon.

Mr. BALDWIN added some remarks on the same side, and in reply to gentlemen who had opposed the claim; after which, the committee rose, and reported the bill without amendment to the House; when the question was taken whether the bill should be engrossed and read a third time and decided in the negative.

And so the said bill was rejected. The House adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, December 7.

To other members, to wit: from Maryland, SAMUEL RINGGOLD, and from Ohio, PETER HITCHCOCK, appeared, and took their seats.

Surviving Revolutionary Officers.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, from the committee appointed on the petition of William Jackson, solicitor for the surviving officers of the Revolutionary Army, and to which were referred sundry petitions of said officers, and of inhabitants of the United States on their behalf, made a detailed report upon said petitions; which was read, and committed to a Committee of the Whole. It is as follows:

That, on the 21st of October, 1780, by resolution of Congress, it was provided that the officers who should continue in service to the end of the war, should be entitled to half-pay during life, to commence from the time of reduction. This stipulation emanated from a previous resolution of Congress, which promised seven years' half-pay to the same class of officers, excepting those who might hold any office of profit under the United States, or any of the States.

By another resolution of Congress, in January, 1781, the stipulation was so extended as to embrace the hospital department and medical staff. In the beginning of the year 1783, a memorial was presented to Congress, from a committee of the officers of the army under the immediate command of General WASHINGTON, proposing relinquishment of the half-pay for life, on condition that an equivalent should be provided, either by the payment of a gross sum or by a full compensation for a limited time. This proposition, which originated with officers of the army, grew out of a conviction that the half-pay for life was regarded by their fellow-citizens as savoring too much of the spirit of a privileged order, which rendered the measure unpopular with many of the community; and the proposition, on the part of the officers, to relinquish the payment for life, was, and ever will be, viewed as an act of the most distinguished patriotism, in perfect accordance with that entire devotion to the country, which is so strikingly manifested in all their sufferings, sacrifices, and services.

Congress, well apprised of the prevailing objection to the allowance for life, which had been adopted only from necessity, readily embraced the occasion of removing a measure objectionable in its principles, by a commutation of five years' full pay in lieu of the half pay for life, in a resolution of March 22d, 1783, which provided that such officers as were then in service, and should continue therein to the end of the war, should be entitled to receive the amount of five years' full pay in money, or securities on interest, at six per cent. per annum, as Congress should find most convenient, instead of the half-pay promised for life by the resolution of October 21st, 1780; the said securities to be such as should be given to other creditors of the United States, provided it should be at the option of the lines of the respective States, and not of officers individually of those lines, to refuse or accept the same. The commutation was acceded to by the officers generally, in the manner pointed out; and, at the reduction of the army, they received commutation certificates for the amount prescribed. The memorialists state a variety of facts, and present many considerations, to prove that, by the commutation, great injustice has been done to the officers originally entitled to half-pay for life, and their object is to induce the Government to resume the original contract of half-pay for life upon certain terms therein expressed; and the memorial concludes with a specific prayer, that an act may be passed directing the accounting officers of the Treasury to adjust the claim of each surviving officer of the Revolutionary Army of the United States, who, by the resolves of Congress, was entitled to half-pay for life, calculating the amount of the principal of the arrearages from the time of his reduction, and deducting therefrom five years' full pay; and the balance of arrearages being thus ascertained, to issue a certificate, bearing an interest of six per centum per annum, to the officer for the amount of said balance; and the officer to be thenceforth entitled to receive half-pay, in half-yearly payments, for and during the term of his natural life. The committee have endeavored to investigate the subject with all the candor and attention which its merits require; and in any point of view, difficulties of no ordinary magnitude presented themselves.

When contemplating the eminent services and generous sacrifices of that illustrious band, the committee could not withhold a favorable report to the full extent of the prayer of the petitioners, could they be governed alone by feeling. The resources of the nation would never repay the debt of gratitude which is due to the patriots and sages of the Revolution, whose counsels and achievements so essentially contributed to the establishment of that freedom and independence, from which so many blessings flow. Was the prayer of the petitioners asked as a gratuity only, new difficulties would arise; other classes of citizens, equally meritorious, and much more numerous, whose sacrifices were not less extensive, would have equal claims, and merit equal attention. The whole Revolutionary struggle was marked with public sacrifices and public devotion; every class of citizens endured with cheerfulness the privations and losses to which those trying times subjected them, and in the happiness and independence of the country which followed every member of the community found its best reward; and however desirable it may be that every sacrifice, in time of great public calamity, may receive a pecuniary requital, the American Revolution demonstrates its impracticability, and necessity requires that the munificence of Government should have some limitation. Well aware of this view of the subject, the claim of the memorialists is predicated upon contract and legal obligation. In the light of justice, therefore, the committee have also considered this subject; and it is with feelings of extreme regret they find themselves compelled, in duty, to differ in opinion with the memorialists in the prayer of the petition.

The resolution of Congress, under which the claim for the half-pay was commuted, was proposed by the officers, and the commutation voluntarily accepted by them in the manner specified. The memorialists also urge their claim upon the supposition that the commutation was not an equivalent for the original stipulation, that more than five years' full pay was then equitably due. The committee, on this point, are of opinion, that a just estimate was made by the parties when the commutation was agreed upon, under all the circumstances of the case, and ought not to be revised at this day. But, if it were necessary to look for relief, by reviewing the comparative amount, it will be found that the interest of five years' full pay, at six per cent. per annum, is equal to three-fifths of the whole amount of half-pay for life: for example, take the advance to a captain, of five years' full pay, at forty dollars per month, $2,400, the annual interest on which would make the sum of $144, at six per centum, and the whole amount of half-pay would make the sum of $240 per annum.

The advance of five years' full pay will also be found equal to the present worth of half-pay for more than fifteen years. The committee cannot, therefore, discover such a great inadequacy in the amount stipulated. The resolution of March, 1783, provided that the five years' full pay should be in money, or securities on interest at six per cent. per annum, as Congress should find most convenient; the said securities being such as should be given to the other creditors of the United States.

Congress found it most convenient to pay in securities on interest, and for this purpose gave certificates conformable to the stipulation; the only evidence of debt in their power, and the same as were given to other creditors of the United States; the faith of the nation was pledged for the payment of these certificates, and the pledge was subsequently redeemed by the payment of the nominal amount, with interest, in gold or silver, or equivalents, in the hands of the officer or his assignee. If the officers could not command the money in hand for these certificates, neither could they have done so at that day for their half-pay, had there been no commutation: gold and silver were not in the reach of Government at that period. This is suggested only to show that the mode of payment alone was changed, and that the commutation was granted as a fair equivalent.

Upon the view taken by the memorialists, the committee could not see any justice in confining the prayer of the petitioners to those only who still survive. To provide for those, upon the principle of justice and legal obligation, and suffer the dead to be forgotten, would be but a partial remuneration; the heirs of the deceased would have equal claims upon the Government as the officer who survives. Again, the memorialists ask a resumption of the original contract, to which the same objections may be urged as in the year 1783. If then deemed objectionable, because not in accordance with the genius of our institutions, nor congenial with the sentiments of the American people, it may be equally so at this day. Upon the most extensive view which the committee have taken of this subject, they have found difficulties still thickening, and, to answer the prayer of the petition to its extent, would, in the opinion of the committee, go to establish a principle fraught with much evil. Conscious, at the same time, of the merits and worth of these distinguished heroes, whose devotion and deeds have given such glory and such happiness to our country: conscious of their patriotism and valor, which have imposed lasting obligations upon the grateful remembrance of the nation, the committee could not reconcile to their feelings or duty, an entire rejection of the memorial: and they have looked for a combination of the principles of equity and of gratitude, on which might be rewarded, in some little degree, the labor and sufferings of the memorialists, without involving future difficulties, in the establishment of a dangerous precedent: this principle has been found in the depreciation of the commutation certificate, and the losses sustained by the untimely sale of these certificates. It is a well-attested fact, that most of those certificates were sold at an amount of not more than from one-fifth to one-tenth of their nominal value. Gold and silver not being in the power of the Government, the pressing and immediate want of the holders rendered it necessary for them to dispose of their certificates at any price; and, upon this view of the subject, the committee recommend the following resolution:

Resolved, That each officer of the Revolutionary army who was entitled to half-pay for life under the several resolves of Congress upon that subject, and afterwards, in commutation thereof, received the amount of five years' full pay, in certificates or securities of the United States, shall now be paid, by the United States, the nominal amount of such certificates or securies, without interest, deducting therefrom one-eighth part of the said amount.

Foreign Merchant Seamen.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to authorize the apprehension of foreign seamen deserting from merchant vessels in the ports of the United States. The bill having been read through—

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, briefly explained the object of the bill. He stated the nature of contracts made by seamen with captains for voyages; which, being violated by the desertion of seamen in the port of destination, or at any time before the termination of the voyage, sometimes broke up the whole voyage, and ruined those concerned in it. He further stated that in all other countries there were regulations for enforcing the observance of these contracts, of which we, in common with others, enjoyed the benefit. These regulations the present bill proposed to reciprocate, by establishing similar regulations on our part.

Mr. NEWTON, as chairman of the committee who reported the bill, further explained its object. To obtain information on the subject, he said, a letter was at the last session addressed to the Secretary of State, to inquire whether the captains of American vessels had in foreign ports the same privileges granted them, to enable them to recover their seamen, which were proposed to be allowed by this bill to foreigners in our ports. To this letter an answer had been received, which Mr. N. read to the House, and which had satisfied the committee, as he presumed it would the House, of the propriety of passing the bill.*

On motion of Mr. WHITMAN, an amendment was made to the details of the bill, the effect of which was to extend the power of carrying the law into execution, to all civil magistrates.

The question being then about to be put on the committee's rising and reporting the bill—

Mr. CLAY (Speaker) said he was not prepared to say that this bill ought to be reported to the House. If the principle of it was correct, the details were exceptionable. The principle was, that if a seaman, arriving in the ports of the United States, quits the service of the master of the vessel with whom he has contracted, without permission, he should be surrendered without trial to the captain. The pretext for establishing this principle was, that other States extend to us the privilege now proposed to be granted to them. Mr. C. said he was by no means satisfied of the propriety of this exception of seamen from the rules applying to all other citizens of foreign countries. He was not satisfied that a seaman, having contracted to perform a voyage, should, under no possible circumstances, be excused from the performance of that contract. Yet, according to this bill, without inquiry into the facts, without examination into the treatment the seaman may have

* The letter is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Jan. 3, 1818.

SIR: In answer to the inquiries in your letter of the 25th ultimo, with reference to the subject of the resolution enclosed in it, I have the honor to state, that in all the maritime States of Europe, with which I have been personally conversant, there are magistrates invested with authority to arrest seamen, deserters from foreign merchant vessels in their ports, and to restore them to the masters of the vessels to which they belong, conformably to their contracts in the shipping papers. The process in such cases is, as by their nature it must be, to prove efficacious, immediate, and summary; and the masters of American vessels have the benefit of it, in common with others. In the city of London, the authority is vested in the Lord Mayor; and, at other places in Great Britain, in the ordinary police magistrates. I do not recollect having ever known an instance in which masters of American vessels were denied the benefit of such processes, unless in cases when, by the laws of the country, the deserting seaman was, on other accounts, liable to be detained. The practice is, so far as I have known, the same in every part of the European continent.

I am, with great respect, sir, your very humble and obedient servant, JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

received on the voyage, the seaman was to be bound hand and foot, and delivered over to the captain whose service he had perhaps been compelled by tyranny or abuse to quit. I care not, said Mr. C., what is done in other countries on the subject; their regulations in this respect form in my mind no justification of the provisions of this bill. The details of the bill, he said, were moreover objectionable. The delicate class of cases arising out of our naturalization laws would be seriously affected by its provisions. Suppose a person who, naturalized according to our laws, would prima facie be considered by ninety-nine out of a hundred as a foreigner, to be demanded by a foreign captain as a deserter—he would, on his affirmation, be given up, and thus an American citizen would be subjected to this odious provision. Gentlemen might say, they did not mean to carry the principle so far; but, Mr. C. said, such an interpretation might be given by the magistrate before whom the seaman was brought. He never could consent, that, in every case of a seaman leaving his ship, or of any other description of persons, because a contract has been alleged to be violated, without inquiry into the ground of complaint, however just it might be, the alleged offender should be surrendered. If the bill was adverted to, it would be found that two facts only were necessary to authorize the surrender: first, that the party should have made a contract; and, secondly, that he should have quitted the service of the master within the limits of the United States. Were gentlemen prepared to say, that in no possible case a seaman might be justified in quitting the merchant service? If there was a possibility of such justification, Mr. C. said, they ought not to give their assent to this bill. He knew, he said, that commerce and navigation, to a certain extent, make slaves; but that slavery should not be made unnecessarily severe. If in every instance we are to follow foreign examples in our statutes and usage, to what lengths may we not go? Impressment of seamen for national ships, said he, is a foreign practice: we may be called upon, on the principles of imitation, to sanction that practice. But, said Mr. C., if our Navy could be maintained only by impressment, dear as I consider that Navy to the interest and to the glory of the country, I would see it annihilated before I would sanction such a practice. Gentlemen, therefore, he said, would not get his assent to the bill by telling him what was done in foreign countries. Over our country a particular genius of liberty presided: we must take care not to banish it by following, step by step, in the wake of other nations, and justifying ourselves for what we do only by exhibiting a precedent in what they have done before us. Mr. C. had other objections to the bill. If there were cases in which it was found necessary to reciprocate provisions with foreign powers for the security of navigation, and such cases there might be, let them be settled by treaty, by reciprocal stipulation. If they extend in their ports but bare civility to us, let us do the same to them. On what foundation was the House invited to pass a bill involving so many delicate considerations, and objectionable provisions? Why, on the ground of a letter—and, without any disrespect to the author of it, a very loose letter, from the Secretary of State. Mr. C. here read some passages of the letter. The honorable Secretary, he said, had not told the House how far his personal acquaintance with foreign countries extended, nor what was the nature of the provisions in that country, analogous to those of this bill; whether in every possible instance a surrender is to take place; whether in all cases the seaman is inextricably yielded up to the captain claiming him. Mr. C. said he wished, before he could act on this subject, to see the laws of foreign countries, and not on such a vague indefinite account of them to bottom such severe provisions. We have just learnt, too, said he, that, with regard to that power with which we have had the greatest difficulty respecting seamen, an arrangement had been made, such as to remove all causes of complaint against her. I should like to see that arrangement, and examine its provisions, before acting on this subject. He hoped, he said, the honorable chairman of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures would not hurry this bill to a decision. Let us first know, said he, the provisions of the foreign States with which the honorable Secretary has been personally conversant. Let us, above all, recollect, whatever foreign nations do, that here alone liberty flourishes, and personal rights are fully enjoyed; and that whatever we do should have reference to this peculiarly happy condition of our country, and be conformable to it.

Mr. NEWTON said he had not the least objection that time should be given to the Speaker, and to all the House, to obtain any information they might desire on this subject. But, he said, he did not view the provisions of the bill in the light which the gentleman had viewed them. The bill was a transcript of the act which passed as long ago as the year 1790, for securing to masters the services of American seamen engaging with them. Thus, it appeared, that it was no new principle the bill proposed to introduce into legislation, but as old as since January 20, 1790. Mr. N. said he knew that the practice of impressment existed in some foreign countries. No one had a greater abhorrence of it than he; and the Speaker would perceive the bill proposed to confer no power to take up deserters from the British or any other navy, and restore them to their ships. It embraced the case of seamen deserting merchant vessels only, in violation and disregard of a voluntary contract. The captain, however, must also fulfil his part of the contract, and the magistrate before whom the seamen is brought may, if he choose, require proof of the fact, and decide upon the case according to his own discretion. Contenting himself at the present time with having made the suggestions, and desiring the subject should be well understood, and the information upon it be as full as possible, he had no objection that the bill should lie on the table.

Mr. WHITMAN defended the bill. The same provisions which it contains, he said, had been in operation in regard to our own seamen for twenty-eight years past, and are yet in force. In every seaport of the United States persons have been apprehended who have been alleged to have violated their contracts, committed to prison, and there detained until the vessel to which they belong was bound to sea, and no inconvenience had ever been felt from the execution of the law. With regard to their being delivered to the captain claiming them, without a hearing, the Speaker was mistaken in that particular. The act required examination before decision, and applied the same rules to this description of contract which prevailed in regard to all civil contracts. The gentleman's nice scruples on the subject would apply to any case in which individuals had by contract a right to the personal service of any other individuals.

Mr. W. said he should suppose the gentleman would be as tender of the liberties of our native seamen as of foreign seamen resorting to our ports; and it appeared that similar provisions had existed for near thirty years in regard to American seamen, without exciting any apprehension in regard to our liberties, and without endangering the rights of a single individual. And are we now, said he, to be frightened by bugbears, if the Speaker will excuse the remark, which could alarm only the most timid imagination? With respect to the reported treaty, Mr. W. said that the treaty could have no bearing on this question. He never knew a treaty to contain provisions for compelling seamen in the merchant service to return on board their vessels after deserting them. Heretofore, it had been supposed that the act of 1790, which was rather obscurely worded, did apply to foreign captains and foreign seamen as well as to those of the United States; and the magistrates throughout the country had so executed it. But, of late, the question had been examined, and the act had received a different construction. It had, therefore, become necessary to supply an obvious defect in the law; in doing which, Mr. W. said, he could not see the danger to the natural rights of man, or the liberties of the citizen or foreigners, which the Speaker appeared to apprehend. With respect to naturalized foreigners, there could be no difficulty: the seamen would have only to produce to the magistrate the evidence of his naturalization, and the magistrate could not do otherwise than instantly liberate him. Apprehensions of abuse of power were, he said, no argument against necessary grants of it; and the argument from possible abuse would apply equally well to any other powers possessed by our magistrates as to this. When it was considered that, in all foreign ports, we enjoyed the right proposed by the bill to be allowed to foreigners in our ports, it was a sort of comity due to others to adopt this measure. Was it, he asked, to be considered a reprehensible principle, because foreign Governments had adopted it, when we ourselves have for many years acted on it? Mr. W. could not see any reason why the subject should be deferred. The bill, he said, did not affect British sailors only, but the sailors of every nation. Therefore nothing which is in the expected treaty, or is not in it, could obviate the necessity of a general provision which, if not necessary as to British seamen, would be necessary as to all other foreign seamen visiting our seaports. There never, however, had been any negotiation between nations, that he knew of, in regard to provisions such as those of this bill; and how there could be any thing in the reported British Treaty about the subject, he could not conceive.

WEDNESDAY, December 9.

Another member, to wit, from Massachusetts, ELIJAH H. MILLS, appeared, and took his seat.

Pensions to Widows and Orphans.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill allowing half-pay pensions of five years to the widows and orphans of those soldiers enlisted for twelve months, for eighteen months, and of the militia who died within four months after their return home, of sickness contracted while in service.

On the question of ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading, a debate of considerable length took place, in which Messrs. BARBOUR, HARRISON, T. M. NELSON, of Virginia, JOHNSON, of Kentucky, and COMSTOCK, very earnestly advocated the bill, supporting it chiefly on the ground that it was required not only by humanity, but by equal justice, as the objects to be relieved by the bill were as much entitled to relief as the widows and orphans of those who died after their return home, of wounds received in service; that the expense was inconsiderable compared with the object, particularly as much larger sums were lavished on objects of comparative insignificance.

The bill was as earnestly opposed by Messrs. SMITH, of Maryland, TAYLOR, TERRELL, SIMKINS, and LIVERMORE, on different grounds; but principally for the reasons that the Government had already gone far enough—much farther than any other Government—in relieving the individual distresses consequent on the war; that, admitting the provision to be proper at all, it would be opening the door too wide to extend it to cases of death within four months after the return of the soldier to his home; that the expense would be enormous; that feelings of humanity ought to have some limit in public expenditures, and that such feelings, if always obeyed, would find the whole Treasury insufficient; that it was time to draw some line of limitation, &c.

Mr. HARRISON said that he should be among the last men who would attempt to introduce into this country that system of sinecures and pensions which had produced so much misery in the other hemisphere of the world, dividing almost the whole population of Europe into two very unequal divisions—the one extremely rich, the other miserably poor. There could, however, he said, be no danger of this as long as our free constitution remains. As long as the money of the people is appropriated by the real Representatives of the people, it will be given only for an equivalent public service, or for some suffering in that service, claiming the public beneficence. An examination of one of the pension lists of a modern European Government would present a very different aspect from that on your table. Not moderate allowances for real services, but enormous grants for nominal duties, or for services to a Government whose interests are in direct hostility to the interests of the nation. It is not even the constant and unnecessary wars in which these Governments are engaged that have rendered their subjects miserable, but the wild profusion and extravagance of their corrupt Courts. It is this which, in the language of our great countryman, "obliges the European laborer to go supperless to bed, and moisten his bread with the sweat of his brow."

There are two kinds of suffering, said Mr. H., in the public service, which are recognized by our laws as giving a claim to the public bounty. The one, in the case of wounds or disability incurred in the Army or Navy of the United States. The other, an indirect suffering, as in the case of widows or children, who had lost their husbands or parents in that way. The claims of the first are not questioned. It is admitted by all, that the man who has lost a leg or an arm in serving the nation, as it lessens his ability to maintain himself, should be provided for during the continuance of his disability. But what appears to me, said Mr. H., to be a singular inconsistency; to the woman who has lost her husband who supported her, the child its parent, on whose exertions alone it depended for maintenance and education, our laws allow a limited assistance, leaving the sufferers often in a worse situation than it found them.

I consider this difference, said Mr. H., at war with the dictates of justice, of sound policy, and the first republican principles. Permit me, Mr. Speaker, said Mr. H., to ask what was the motive for the enactment of the law of 1816 in relation to pensions? Was it to establish the great national principle of indemnity to the sufferers as far as indemnity could be given? Or was it intended as a mere temporary relief, as we would throw a dollar to the beggar in the street? If the first was the motive, the law was entirely inadequate to its object. If the second was the motive, it was, in his opinion, unworthy of the nation.

Equality, in the contributions for the public service, is one of the first principles of our Government.

The public burdens are to fall equally upon all in proportion to their means. No individual and no family are to furnish more than their just share, either of money or of personal service, without an equivalent.

And yet, here are 1,800 families who have contributed more than their proportion; some of them their all for the public service. You cannot, indeed, restore the husband to the widow, the parent to the child—but you can supply their places to a considerable degree, and I think that it is your duty to do it.

The principle for which I contend, said Mr. H., may be more easily calculated by applying it to a small community. Let us suppose, then, that one hundred families were settled upon an island in the Pacific Ocean, at such a distance from every civilized State as to make it necessary to form one of themselves—their situation would make it purely republican. All possessing equal right, and all bound to defend their little community against every aggression. The savages of a neighboring island attempt to dispossess them; a battle ensues, in which our little community is victorious, with the loss of five of their number killed and five wounded. The situation in which they would find themselves, is one for which they had not provided. The wounded men would say to the others, as we have been rendered unequal to the maintenance of our families by wounds received for the benefit of all, it is just that we should receive assistance from you to cultivate our farms. The claim would be readily admitted. As would, in the first instance, the claims of the widows and orphans of those who had fallen—but at the end of five years, before the children of the widows had reached that age when they could labor for themselves and their mothers, they are told that they can receive no further aid, while the wounded men are provided for for life. If this principle is admitted in our Government, our militia laws are most unjust and oppressive. They require the same personal service to be rendered by all, the rich and the poor. But the rich married man is allowed to furnish a substitute—the poor married man, unable to hire one, is obliged when called upon to serve in person. As the poor, then, fight all your battles, which is, perhaps, unavoidable, it is just and right the consequences of their service should fall as lightly as possible on their families. In the late war, it was to their valor and patriotism that you were indebted for the preservation of Baltimore, Norfolk, and New Orleans, and your Northern and Western frontiers. It is possible that when the great emporiums of your commerce were attacked, some wealthy men might have been found in the ranks with their poor fellow-citizens. At Baltimore, for instance, there might have been a merchant, possessed of a fortune of half a million of dollars, placed by the side of a mechanic whose family depended for support on the daily labor of his hands. The former might say to the latter, "Let us remember that we fight for our country, our families, and our property; let us die rather than suffer our city to be taken." The latter might have answered, "As an American citizen, I shall always be willing to defend my country with my life, and I was just thinking how cheerfully I would meet the enemy if my situation were like yours. If you fall, you leave your family in affluence; if the lot should be mine, I leave a beloved wife and children to the charity of an unfeeling world. Our laws are unequal and unjust; they require the same personal service of us both, when one day's labor is of more importance to my family than twenty of yours would be to your family; that I would disregard if our laws had provided that in the event of my fall, the wealth which I have sacrificed myself to defend should be taxed to support my orphan children."

Pass but this law, sir, said Mr. H., and you take from an American citizen, called on to serve his country in the field, every motive which would prevent him from doing his duty. An American army would be a band of heroes. The tenderest feelings of our nature are not inconsistent with the most heroic bravery. There are moments when the powerful influence of domestic attachment will find its way to the bosom of the warrior, but, unmingled with any distressing reflections as to the fortune of his family, it will only prove an incentive to the performance of his duty.

Permit me, sir, said Mr. H., to give another example to show the injustice and inequality of the existing laws in relation to pensions. It is a case as nearly similar as possible to that which was stated a few days ago by my friend from Virginia, (Mr. BARBOUR,) and if he will give me leave, I will again introduce to the House one of the widows whose case he so eloquently supported. I will take the one who has received the five years' pension, and contrast the situation of herself and family with that of a neighboring lady, whose husband had lost a leg in the late war. Both husbands had performed the same services, in the same corps, and with the same rank; one lost his life, and the other his leg. To the latter you give a pension for life—to the former a pension for five years. Is there any equality or justice in this? Is it not setting a higher value upon the leg of one man than the life of another? It may be said that in the one case it is given to the individual who suffered, in the other, to his family.

Sir, said Mr. H., is not the wife and the children identified with the husband and parent? The misfortune of the one is the misfortune of the other, and there should be no difference in the relief you offer them.

The principle for which I contend (said Mr. H.) is not a new one; it is sanctioned by the practice of one, at least, of the great republics of antiquity, and by the opinions of some of the wisest and best men that ever lived. In the elegant work of the Abbe Barthelemy, entitled the travels of Anacharsis, (an authentic history with a fictitious title, as every one knows,) the author brings his supposed traveller to Athens at the period of one of the great national festivals. The ceremonies were concluded by the advance of a herald, followed by a number of young men completely armed; these, said he, (addressing the assembled Athenians and pointing to the youths,) these are the sons of those patriots who have fallen in the service of their country; they have been educated at the public expense until they have reached the age of manhood, and are now to be dismissed to their families clothed and armed at the expense of the State. Such was the law of Athens, promulgated by Solon, and continued without interruption for upwards of one hundred and fifty years, until she was first corrupted by the gold of Philip, and her liberties finally overturned in the fatal battle of Cheronea. It is mentioned by Pericles in his oration over the Athenians who fell in the first campaign of the Peloponnesian war. Referring to this law, he concludes his speech in these remarkable words: "For when virtue is best rewarded then will patriotism most prevail." Nor is this great statesman, said Mr H., the only evidence I can adduce to show the good effects produced by this law to the Athenians. [Here Mr. H. read an extract from Stanley's life of Solon, showing the approbation given to this law by Aristides, Plato, and the ancient historian, Laertius, and then continued.] I consider these authorities, said he, as decisive of the good effects produced by this law in the republic of Athens—a Government more nearly assimilated to our own, as it regards the principles upon which it was founded, than any other, ancient or modern. After the experience of a century, the ablest statesmen and most virtuous men declared it to be one of the most powerful causes which produced that ardent patriotism and heroic valor which distinguished the period that has been emphatically denominated their age of glory.

The eulogium of Aristides upon the Athenians proves, to my satisfaction at least, that the passage of the bill before the House will not produce those ruinous consequences to the Treasury which some gentlemen seem to apprehend. Himself, the incorruptible statesman who presided over the finances of his nation; the honest man who suffered exile rather than flatter the follies of his countrymen, affords the best evidence that it produced no pecuniary embarrassment to a State whose whole territory can scarcely be discovered upon a general map of Europe. Amidst all the calamities which war often brings upon a nation, the Athenians adhered to this law as the sheet-anchor of their hopes. During the time it was in force their city was three times taken and twice razed to the ground. At the time that Pericles was speaking, the whole of their continental territory was in possession of their enemies, and ravaged with fire and sword. A pestilence also prevailed within the city with a malignity to which there is no parallel on record—an event which gave to a member of this House (Mr. HOPKINSON) an opportunity for an historical allusion, in one of the most splendid specimens of forensic eloquence which this country has ever witnessed.

Sir, said Mr. H., I consider that a great part of the money which may be taken from the Treasury by the passage of this bill, will be as usefully employed for the benefit of the nation as it could well be. The pious and patriotic mothers to whom it will be given will employ it in the education of their sons, and they will never cease to remind them of the obligations they owe to their country. "Emulate the patriotism of your father," will be the reiterated lesson from childhood to manhood. To have such lessons taught to every youth in the country, I, said Mr. H., should be willing to give the yearly balances which may remain in the Treasury for fifty years to come. There is something in the female character admirably calculated to gain an ascendency over the minds of those violent but generous youths who are formed by nature to act a splendid part upon the theatre of the world, and who, when a proper direction is given to their passions, become the friends and benefactors of mankind. They listen with more attention to the mild admonitions of the mother than the rougher mandates of an imperious father. It is very remarkable that the great votaries of liberty, both ancient and modern, have received the impulse from this source. The Gracchi, Brutus and Cassius of Rome, Agis and Cleomenes of Sparta, our own Washington, and perhaps Kosciusko, are a few out of the many instances that could be adduced.

The question on engrossing the bill and ordering it to a third reading, was at length decided in the affirmative—yeas 87, nays 68.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

The House then, on motion, adjourned until to-morrow.

THURSDAY, December 10.

Cadets at West Point.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill, reported at the last session, "for the admission of cadets into the Military Academy;" [directing that in all applications for the admission of cadets into the Military Academy at West Point, a preference shall be given to the sons of officers and soldiers who were killed in battle, or who died in the military service of the United States in the late war; and that a further preference shall be given to those least able to educate themselves, and best qualified for the military profession.]

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, moved to amend the bill by striking out the last clause, directing "a further preference to be given to those least able to educate themselves, and best qualified for the military profession," remarking that he saw no reason for the preference, and until he heard something convincing in favor of the discrimination, he should remain of opinion that it ought to be stricken from the bill.

Mr. STROTHER addressed the committee at considerable length in opposition to the object of the bill, urging chiefly that it was sanctioning a preference of a particular profession, and thus creating a privileged order in the community; that it was virtually declaring an unnecessary jealousy of the discretion now vested in the War Department, implying an opinion that it was not exercised properly; and would, moreover, preclude it from selecting the most fit and most worthy; and was perverting the true object of the institution, which was established for the general benefit, &c.

Messrs. HARRISON, and JOHNSON of Kentucky, replied to the objections of Messrs. SMITH and STROTHER, stating that the bill had been reported in pursuance of a resolution adopted on the motion of a late distinguished member of this House, (Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana;) that the provisions of the bill appeared to be required by the original purpose of the institution; that, instead of creating an aristocracy, it would tend to counteract any such thing.

The question on Mr. SMITH's motion was decided in the negative.

Mr. TAYLOR observed that, notwithstanding what had been said in defence of this bill, its effect was certainly to create a privileged order in the country; that, although the selection proposed might be expedient and laudable to a certain extent, there was no doubt that the department now vested with the selection would keep in view, as far as was proper, the principle proposed; but it would in his opinion be highly improper for Congress by a formal act to sanction such a distinction. In lieu, therefore, of the provisions at present proposed by the bill, he moved the following, as a substitute: "That cadets shall hereafter be admitted into the Military Academy at West Point, from the respective States and Territories, and from the District of Columbia, in proportion to the militia returns thereof."

Mr. HARRISON reiterated his objections to the amendment, and observed, in addition to what he had submitted already, that the design of this bill was really to get rid of a practical aristocracy, instead of creating one; for it was a fact, he believed, that no son of a soldier (by the term he meant not also to include officers) had ever yet been educated at the Military Academy. Mr. H. then stated that if Mr. TAYLOR's amendment should prevail, he would move to add the following: "And that in all cases the preference be given to those whose parents are least able to educate them;" and intimated that he should then move an additional section requiring cadets to remain at the Academy until the age of twenty-five years.

Mr. CLAY then rose, and moved that the committee rise, report progress, and then let the House get rid of the whole subject.

This motion prevailed, and, the bill being reported to the House, the committee was refused leave to sit again; and the bill was laid upon the table.

MONDAY, December 14.

Another member, to wit, from Delaware, WILLARD HALL, appeared, and took his seat.

WEDNESDAY, December 16.

Arkansas Territorial Government.

Mr. ROBERTSON, of Kentucky, offered for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a separate territorial government in that part of the new Territory of Missouri, lying south of thirty-six degrees and thirty minutes north latitude, which is called the Arkansas country, and which is not included in the proposed boundary of the projected State of Missouri, by the bill now before the House, for the purpose of establishing a State government in part of the Territory of Missouri, and that the said committee have leave to report by bill, or otherwise.

Mr. R. explained briefly the object of his motion. There being every reason to expect that the people of the Territory of Missouri would be authorized, at the present session, to form a constitution of State government, and with certain limited boundaries, the whole Territory being too extensive to be included within one State; that part of the Territory not included within the limits of the State, would of course have occasion for a separate Territorial government, which, as in the case of the admission of Mississippi into the Union, had been done in regard to the Territory of Alabama. But, if his expectation was disappointed, and an act should not pass at the present session to authorize the people of Missouri to form a State government, it was yet necessary that a separate Territorial government should be established. This Territory, which was likely to become in time one of the most populous Territories in the Union, was, from its remoteness from the present seat of Government, almost without either law or government.

Mr. SCOTT, of Missouri, said he did not rise to oppose the resolution; on the contrary, had he a vote to give, it would be for its adoption. He was not sensible that any remarks he was capable of making would have any influence on the vote of the House, but he rose, lest his silence might be construed into an opposition, which he did not intend, and to repel any inference that might be drawn that he had neglected his duty to a part of his constituents, in not being the mover of the proposition. He had intended to introduce a resolution of a similar character, so soon as he should receive from the Legislature of the Territory a memorial praying for the erection of a State in the northern section of the Territory, together with a certified copy of the census of the whole Territory, which he was in the daily expectation of receiving. This data had not yet arrived, and he felt a reluctance, in the press of business before the House, to present, voluntarily, a proposition, even for the consideration of the House, without having good authority, or some leading reason to justify him. He knew, however, that the situation of that portion of the Territory, removed four or five hundred miles from the seat of Territorial government, called loudly for the interposition of the General Government. They were not unfrequently without a competency of civil and military officers to administer justice, or keep order in the country; and although he was not in possession of the census of the Territory, or any petition from the people of that part of it, yet he was convinced that the quantity of the population, and its respectability, justified the request; and believing, as he did, that it was the wish of the people, and knowing it was their interest, he hoped the House would not consider the resolution premature, but that it would be adopted.

The motion was then agreed to, without opposition, and Messrs. ROBERTSON, BEECHER, and JONES, were appointed the said committee.

Passenger Ships.

The bill to regulate passenger ships and vessels came next in order.

Mr. NEWTON explained the necessity of this bill and the nature of its provisions. The great object of it was, he said, to give to those who go and come in passenger vessels, a security of sufficient food and convenience. In consequence of the anxiety to emigrate from Europe to this country, the captains, sure of a freight, were careless of taking the necessary quantity of provisions, or of restricting the number of passengers to the convenience which their ships afforded. To show how necessary such a bill as this had become, one or two facts would suffice. In the year 1817, five thousand persons had sailed for this country from Antwerp, &c., of whom one thousand died on the passage. In one instance a captain had sailed from a port on that coast with one thousand two hundred and sixty-seven passengers. On his voyage he put into the Texel, previous to doing which four hundred had died. After being on the passage to our shores, before the vessel arrived at Philadelphia, three hundred more had died. The remainder, when the vessel reached Newcastle, were in a very emaciated state from the want of water and food, from which many of them afterwards died. Many other cases might be stated, but these would suffice to show the absolute necessity of provisions such as those of this bill. The bill restricted the number of passengers to two for every five tons' burden of the vessel. In Great Britain, formerly, but one had been allowed to every five tons; but now, one to every three tons. The committee had been of opinion that the scale of one to every two tons and a half would afford every necessary accommodation. With regard to the other sections of the bill, they were generally similar to those of the act respecting seamen, by which a captain is obliged to take on board a certain quantity of water and bread for each seaman employed.

No objection being made to the bill, it was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

THURSDAY, December 17.

Another member, to wit, from South Carolina, STEPHEN D. MILLER, appeared, and took his seat.

FRIDAY, December 18.

The SPEAKER presented a memorial of the Legislative Council and House of Representatives of the Territory of Missouri, in the name and on behalf of the people of the said Territory, praying that they may be permitted to form a constitution and State government, with the boundaries described in said petition; and admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.—Referred.

MONDAY, December 21.

Another member, to wit, from Massachusetts, SOLOMON STRONG, appeared, and took his seat.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill making appropriations for the support of the Navy of the United States for the year 1819.

The bill includes the following items:

Pay of officers and seamen -	$1,270,333 50
Provisions - - - -	594,037 50
Medicines and all expenses of sick	36,000 00
Repairs of vessels - - -	350,000 00
Contingent expenses - - -	300,000 00
Repairs of navy yards, docks, &c.	100,000 00
Completing medals and swords -	7,500 00
Pay and subsistence of marine corps - - - - -	122,898 00
Clothing the same - - -	2,038 10
Military stores for do. - -	1,087 50
Contingent expenses - - -	18,600 00

The bill was then reported to the House, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

WEDNESDAY, December 23.

J. J. Dufour, and others.

Mr. POINDEXTER reported, from the Committee of Public Lands, a bill to extend, for the term of twelve months, the time allowed to J. J. Dufour and his associates, of Vevay, Indiana, for completing the payment for the lands purchased by them from the United States.

On this bill arose a debate, which wholly occupied the House until the usual hour of adjournment, in the course of which the bill was so amended as to make the extension for six, instead of twelve months.

The debate was more animated than at the first glance one would have expected such a question to produce. The petitioners ask this indulgence, because such money as they have the receiver of public moneys will not take from them. The bill, therefore, was supported on various grounds, on the reasonableness of the request, and on the merit of the petitioners, on whom a high eulogium was pronounced. The bill was opposed on the general ground of the inexpediency of making a discrimination between these claimants and other petitioners. Messrs. POINDEXTER, HARRISON, TAYLOR, HENDRICKS, TRIMBLE, MERCER, and BEECHER, supported the bill, and Messrs. WILLIAMS of North Carolina, SIMKINS, MILLS, STORRS, McCOY, SERGEANT, and DESHA, opposed it.

The question on ordering the bill to a third reading having been taken by yeas and nays, was decided in the affirmative—yeas 73, nays 67.

THURSDAY, December 24.

Another member, to wit, from Tennessee, GEORGE W. L. MARR, appeared, and took his seat.

MONDAY, December 28.

Mr. IRVING presented a petition of "The New York Society for promoting the Manumission of Slaves, and protecting such of them as have been or may be liberated;" praying that some effective provisions may be made to abolish the African slave trade, in any arrangement which may be hereafter definitively entered into between this country and Spain, or the South American provinces.

Mr. SERGEANT presented a memorial from the American Convention for promoting the Abolition of Slavery, and improving the condition of the African race, praying that the acts respecting the illicit introduction of slaves into the United States may be so amended, as that any person so introduced shall be declared free; and that the situation of slavery within the District of Columbia may be considered, and a plan devised, for its gradual and certain termination within said District.—Referred to the committee on the part of the President's Message which relates to the illicit introduction of slaves within the United States.

Vevay—Cultivation of the Vine.

Mr. PINDALL, after stating that information had come to his knowledge since the decision of the House, on Thursday last, against the bill for the relief of J. J. Dufour and others, which he thought had a material bearing on the expediency of extending relief, in some shape, to the petitioners, and after entering into some reasons which, from reflection and further investigation, had occurred to him, in support of the motion he rose to make, moved to reconsider the vote which rejected the bill, and to bring it before the House to receive the modification which he thought would entitle it to the sanction of the House.

Mr. LINCOLN, of Mass., spoke as follows:

Mr. Speaker: I place my vote on the broad basis of national policy—the policy of encouraging emigration, and the culture of the vine. When I am told that the inhabitants of the little village of Vevay are the countrymen of the illustrious Tell, that they are planters of the vine, and industrious and virtuous people, delighting in the exercise of the rights of hospitality, I find my sympathy strongly excited; yet I do not suffer that sympathy to delude my understanding. But, should these people write to their friends across the Atlantic, and inform them that they are here, enjoying the patronage and fostering care of our Government, would not those friends, although looking around them, and seeing themselves surrounded by ramparts of mountains, yet, perceiving the avalanches of European power continually tumbling upon their heads, be disposed to abandon a country where their liberties are so insecure, and come to one where they should be assured of an asylum? On the other hand, should they be informed that these persons came to their hard-hearted creditor—that creditor an opulent, powerful nation, and told him that they had been unfortunate, but not guilty; negligent, but not delinquent; yet that he drove them from his door with scorn and contempt, bade them begone, and prepare to pay him the last farthing of their bond at the moment when it should become due, what, then, would be their feelings? They could not be other than those of the deepest aversion and horror. We cannot do too much, sir, to encourage the emigration of a class of population like that of the Cantons of Switzerland, a population remarkably assimilated to that of our own country, in manners, customs, feelings, and principles.

There is yet another argument more weighty than that just urged—I mean that resulting from the policy of encouraging the cultivation of the vine, encouraging it, paradoxical as it may seem, for the purpose of preventing intemperance; for, true it is, that there are no people more temperate than those of France and Switzerland. The reason is, that they make use of the products of their own vineyards, as the substitute for those deleterious ardent spirits which are here consumed to so lamentable an excess. Give then to these people a little indulgence, and you shall see not only the banks of the Ohio festooned by the grape vine, but it shall climb to our mountain tops, and its fruit bask in the sunshine upon all our hills.

The question was then taken on reconsidering the vote on the bill, and decided in the affirmative; when, on motion of Mr. PINDALL, the bill was referred to a select committee.

TUESDAY, December 29.

Mr. H. NELSON, from the Judiciary Committee, to whom had been referred the letter of the Sergeant-at-Arms, respecting the suit commenced against him by John Anderson, reported a resolution authorizing and requesting the Speaker to employ such counsel as he may think proper to defend the suit brought by John Anderson against the said Thomas Dunn, and that the expenses be defrayed out of the contingent fund of the House; which resolution was concurred in.

THURSDAY, December 31.

Death of Mr. Mumford.

Mr. SMITH, of North Carolina, announced the death of GEORGE MUMFORD, a member of this House, from the State of North Carolina; whereupon,

Resolved unanimously, That a committee be appointed to take order for superintending the funeral of GEORGE MUMFORD, deceased, late a Representative from the State of North Carolina.

Messrs. SMITH, of North Carolina, WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, OWEN, STEWART, of North Carolina, SETTLE, EDWARDS, and SLOCUMB, were appointed the said committee.

Resolved unanimously, That the members of this House will testify their respect to the memory of GEORGE MUMFORD, late one of their body, by wearing crape on their left arm, for one month.

Resolved unanimously, That the members of this House will attend the funeral of the late GEORGE MUMFORD, to-morrow morning at 10 o'clock.

Ordered, That a message be sent to the Senate, to notify them of the death of GEORGE MUMFORD, late a member of this House, and that his funeral will take place to-morrow, at 10 o'clock.

The House then adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, January 4, 1819.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 7th instant, requesting me to lay before it the proceedings which have been had under the act, entitled "An act for the gradual increase of the Navy of the United States," specifying the number of ships that have been put on the stocks, and of what class, and the quantity and kind of materials which have been procured, in compliance with the provisions of said act, and also the sums of money which have been paid out of the funds created by the said act, and for what objects; and likewise the contracts which have been entered into, in execution of the said act, on which moneys may not yet have been advanced; I transmit a report from the acting Secretary of the Navy, together with a communication from the Board of Navy Commissioners, which, with the documents accompanying it, comprehends all the information required by the House of Representatives.

JAMES MONROE.

DECEMBER 31, 1818.

The Message, with its enclosures, was ordered to be printed.

Exports.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following letter from the Secretary of the Treasury:

WM. H. CRAWFORD.

The SPEAKER of the House of Reps.

The letter, with its enclosures, was ordered to be printed.

The Slave Trade.

Mr. MERCER introduced the resolution which follows by a few remarks, importing that the law of the United States prohibiting the citizens of the United States from engaging in the slave trade, was evaded in a manner which demanded the interposition of Congress. He referred to the law which authorizes the President of the United States to employ our armed vessels in executing its provisions, and also authorizes those vessels to seize and bring into the ports of the United States all ships and vessels engaged in the violation of it. In a publication which Mr. M. said he had seen, and to which he referred, the names were given of at least twenty vessels fitted out in the ports of the United States for the obvious purpose of carrying on the slave trade. Appeals had been taken from the decisions which had been made by the inferior tribunals in some of these cases, and the names of American houses and American citizens engaged in this detestable traffic, were to be found on the records of the British court. To obtain information having a direct bearing on this subject, Mr. M. submitted this resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to report to this House a copy of such instructions, if any, as may have been issued by this Department, in pursuance of the act of Congress of 1817, prohibiting the importation of slaves, to the commanders of the armed vessels of the United States, for the purpose of intercepting, on the coast of Africa, or elsewhere, such vessels as have been engaged in the slave trade.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MERCER then said, he had another resolution to offer, in relation to another branch of the same subject. We have all been informed, he said, in the course of the last few months, that individuals brought into the United States, in violation of the law before referred to, had, in execution of the provisions of the law, been condemned to hereditary slavery; and, on examining the acts of Congress, he found that the authority under which this iniquity (he would so call it) had been practised, was derived from one of those acts. To obtain such information as might assist the House in arriving at a proper remedy for this fault, he moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to this House the number and names of the slave ships, if any, which have been seized and condemned within the United States for violation of the laws thereof against the importation of slaves, and if any negroes, mulattoes, or persons of color, have been found on board such vessels, their number, and the disposition which have been made of them by the several State Governments under whose jurisdiction they have fallen.

Mr. STROTHER moved to amend the resolution so as to direct a report to be made also of the number and names of the slave ships, if any, and of the ports from which they had sailed, if they could be ascertained. Mr. S. said he wished that the ignominy of this trade, if any, should attach where it belonged, and not be imputed, on the authority of general rumor, to the whole country. He wished at least that the country of which he was a Representative should be absolved from any charge of participation in it.

Mr. FLOYD wished also, that the names of the places where the vessels are owned should be added to that of the place whence they sailed.

Mr. COBB desired to amend this resolve further, so as to require information by whom, as well as where, the vessels were owned.

These amendments were not objected to by Mr. MERCER, and were, as well as the original motion, all agreed to.

TUESDAY, January 12.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act to enable the people of the Alabama Territory to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union, on an equal footing with the original States;" in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

The Seminole War and General Jackson.

Mr. T. M. NELSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, made a report concluding with the following resolution:

Resolved, That the House of Representatives of the United States disapproves the proceedings in the trial and execution of Alexander Arbuthnot and Robert C. Ambrister.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, also of the Military Committee, submitted a paper drawn up in the shape of a report by that committee, which, by a majority of one vote, that committee had refused to accept, and the said paper was read, concluding with the expression of the opinion that General Jackson, his officers and men, are entitled to the thanks of the country in terminating the Seminole war.

The report having been read—

Mr. COBB, of Georgia, rose to make a motion, the object of which was to give to the report of the Military Committee, as well as to the substitute presented by a member of that committee, a direction which should insure to it a discussion, as full as was desired, at the present session. For this purpose, he moved to refer them to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. These papers, he said, involved principles of great consequence, on which in some measure depended, as he believed, the character of the nation; they also necessarily involved important questions as to the laws of nations, and as to the constitution of our own country, and ought to have a deliberate consideration.

Mr. FLOYD, of Virginia, was as desirous as the gentleman from Georgia of a deliberate discussion of the subject of these reports; but, if they were referred to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, a motion to go into which was always in order, the House might be taken by surprise, or brought into the discussion entirely without notice, at the motion of any gentleman who wished it. He therefore wished the papers should be referred, as in ordinary cases, to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. STROTHER, of Virginia, agreed with the gentlemen who had preceded him, that the report should be so disposed of as to insure a full examination of its merits. The subject, he said, was one of considerable interest and excitement, though he was not under the impression that it was one of great magnitude, nor that it carried in its bosom the fate of the nation, as the gentleman from Georgia seemed to suppose, which depended on far other considerations. The best course to pursue in regard to these papers, Mr. S. thought, would be to lay them on the table. Though not of momentous consequence, he said, yet the decision on them was calculated to implicate the character, and perhaps the happiness, of the illustrious individual whose proceedings it was proposed to censure. He would, in regard to any proposition involving the happiness or reputation of any individual, conspicuous or obscure, act with great deliberation. He was therefore opposed to referring this matter to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, thus putting it in the power of any individual to call it up when he pleased, and to precipitate the House into a discussion unadvisedly and unprepared. He was for not hastily acting on a proposition to censure a man who had given celebrity to the arms of his country, and thrown a brighter lustre on the national character.

Mr. POINDEXTER, of Mississippi, said he hoped that the House would never agree to a report, in affirming which the House would be required to forget the wrongs inflicted on us by foreign nations, to overlook the inhuman deeds committed on the frontier of Georgia, and to turn its attention to the laudable object of destroying the reputation of one of its most distinguished citizens. It was not in the point of view in which the gentleman from Georgia had regarded the question; it was not from any regard to the savages of Florida, and their allies, British refugees and Spanish agents, or from a wish to crush that man by the strong arm of power—that man who had so much merited the thanks of his country, that he wished a full and early discussion of the subject. He did not wish it, he said, to be referred to a Committee of the Whole, or to lie on the table and be forgotten. He was not willing that any such report as that from the Military Committee, calculated to ruin the reputation of a man who had rendered so signal services to his country, should be considered as representing the opinion of this House. He was not willing, therefore, that it should remain for a moment on the table, but should undergo a full discussion as early as practicable; which would be insured by referring it to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. MERCER, of Virginia, while he congratulated the House on the dignified report which the Military Committee had presented to them, was disposed, in the proceedings on this subject, to act with all necessary deliberation. The only objection he had heard to the proposition to refer the subject to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, was, that it might be called up at any time; this objection, he said, might be entirely obviated by naming a day when it should be called up; and, if a day were not named, the House would always have it in its power, if it chose, to refuse to go into committee, if moved for at too early a day. He should deplore, Mr. M. said, perhaps more than any member of the House, that this should be referred to an ordinary Committee of the Whole, and that the whole session should pass off without an expression, on the part of the House, of its opinion on this subject. With respect to the character of General Jackson, though he would not unnecessarily arraign it, Mr. M. said, he looked, in the view which he took of the importance of this question, to higher objects—to the character of this House and of this nation.

Mr. SMYTH, of Virginia, hoped that the motion of the gentleman from Georgia would prevail. He presumed that the gentlemen adverse to General Jackson were none of them desirous of precipitating the discussion, or taking any advantage, by surprise, of those who approved of his conduct. He supposed that by Monday next every gentleman who desired to take a part in the discussion would be prepared, and that that day would be agreed on. He said he should, when the discussion came on, attempt to show that all the proceedings of General Jackson were justifiable by the law of nations.

Mr. DESHA, of Kentucky, wished the papers to lie on the table, that the members of the House might have an opportunity of examining them; but, if referred to any committee of the House, he wished the substitute as well as the report to be referred—and that, in their publication, they might go together, that the world should see and understand the views of both sides of the House.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, suggested the propriety of a concurrence, on all sides of the House, in the commitment of the report and the amendment to a committee, as proposed. If for no other reason than that the Speaker might wish to participate in the debate, he should approve of that course. The subject had excited considerable sensation, and he hoped every opportunity would be given to members, on all sides of the House, to express their opinions. To debate it now was to take up the time of the House to no useful purpose whatever.

After some further remarks from Messrs. FLOYD, COBB, and STROTHER, in support of their respective opinions, and some conversation on a point of order, the question on referring the report of the Military Committee to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was carried without a division.

On motion of Mr. DESHA, the paper offered by Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, as a substitute, was then referred to the same committee; and Mr. TALLMADGE gave notice that, if no one else did, he should, on Monday next, move to go into a Committee of the Whole on this subject.

SATURDAY, January 16.

Bank of the United States.

Mr. SPENCER, from the committee appointed on the 30th of November last, to inspect the books and examine into the proceedings of the Bank of the United States, to report thereon, and to report whether the provisions of its charter have been violated or not, made a detailed report thereon; which was read and committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The report concludes as follows:

The committee, then, are of the opinion that the provisions of the charter of the Bank of the United States have been violated in the following instances:

I. In purchasing two millions of public debt, in order to substitute them for two other millions of similar debt, which it had contracted to sell, or had sold in Europe, and which the Secretary of the Treasury claimed the right of redeeming. The facts on this subject, and the views of the transaction entertained by the committee, have been already given.

II. In not requiring the fulfilment of the engagement made by the stockholders on subscribing, to pay the second and third instalments on the stock, in coin and funded debt. The facts on this point are fully before the House, and they establish, beyond all doubt, 1st, that the directors of the bank agreed to receive, and did receive, what they deemed an equivalent for coin, in checks upon, and the notes of the bank and other banks to pay specie. This substitution of any equivalent whatever, for the specific things required by the charter, was in itself a departure from its provisions; but, 2d, the notes and checks thus received were not, in all cases, equivalent to coin, because there was not specie to meet them in the bank; 3d, that notes of individuals were discounted and taken in lieu of the coin part of the second instalment, by virtue of a resolution for that purpose, passed before that instalment became due; 4th, that the notes of individuals were taken in many instances, and to large amounts, in lieu of the whole of the second and third instalments, which notes are yet unpaid.

III. In paying dividends to stockholders who had not completed their instalments, the provisions of the charter in that respect were violated.

IV. By the judges of the first and second election allowing many persons to give more than thirty votes each, under pretence of their being attorneys for persons in whose names shares then stood, when those judges, the directors, and officers of the bank, perfectly well knew that those shares really belonged to the persons offering to vote upon them as attorneys. The facts in relation to this violation are in possession of the House, and establish it beyond the reach of doubt.

The committee are of opinion that no other instance of a violation of the charter has been established. In closing this report of a most laborious investigation, the committee observe, that whatever difference of opinion can exist among them as to the results and inferences to be drawn from the facts stated, they unanimously concur in giving, to the preceding statements of facts and abstracts of documents, their sanction. They have not recommended the adoption of any measures to correct the many evils and mischiefs they have depicted, excepting that of the bill before mentioned, because, by the provisions of the charter, the Secretary of the Treasury has full power to apply a prompt and adequate remedy, whenever the situation of the bank shall require it. And if, after the stockholders have become acquainted with the mismanagement of the institution, they shall adopt no means to prevent its continuance, or the directors themselves shall persist in a course of conduct requiring correction, the committee cannot entertain a doubt that the salutary power lodged in the Treasury Department will be exerted, as occasion may require, and with reference to the best interests of the United States.

Government of Florida.

Mr. EDWARDS rose to offer a resolution calling for information in relation to the posts, without the limits of the United States, now in the possession of the United States. The object of his motion was in itself so plain as to need no elucidation. It would be recollected that the law of 1811 authorized the taking possession, on certain contingencies, of that part of Florida east of the Perdido, and to establish a government therein. One object of the resolution was to ascertain how far, if at all, that law had been carried into effect, &c. The resolution was in the following words:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause any information, not already communicated, to be laid before this House, whether Amelia Island, St. Marks, and Pensacola, yet remain in the possession of the United States, and, if so, by what laws the inhabitants thereof are governed; whether articles imported therein from foreign countries are subject to any and what duties, and by what laws; and whether the said duties are collected, and how; whether vessels arriving in the United States from Pensacola and Amelia Island, and in Pensacola and Amelia Island from the United States, respectively, are considered and treated as vessels arriving from foreign countries.

Mr. HOLMES said that the resolution embraced some objects which the Committee of Foreign Relations had had under consideration, that concerning Amelia Island, for example; respecting which they had directed him to make of the Secretary of State all the inquiries embraced in the resolution, and more. That information might be expected to be soon received, and laid before the House. He therefore wished the gentleman to waive his motion for the present.

Mr. EDWARDS said he had no objection, if the committee had asked for the information, (though he still thought it would have been better had the information been specially called for by the House,) to waive his motion for the present, with the reservation of the right to renew it, if the expected information was not laid before the House.

Mr. HOPKINSON suggested that the information which had been required by the Committee of Foreign Relations was limited to Amelia Island, and therefore did not embrace the principal part of the information required by the resolution.

Mr. EDWARDS said, if that were the case, he should certainly not waive his motion. If we are correctly informed by the newspapers, there had been something like a government established at St. Marks and at Pensacola, by the military authority, as well as at the Amelia Island; and he wished to ascertain how far the arrangements of the military authority had been sanctioned by the Executive. Vessels had cleared out and entered at Pensacola; he wished to know whether it had been regarded in this respect as a foreign or domestic port. If civil officers, collectors, &c., had been appointed, he wished to obtain information by what tenure they held their offices, and also the nature of their accountability. If ultimate measures should be found necessary, information would be wanted, without which the House was groping in the dark. He had no other object than to ascertain, officially, the facts on these subjects.

Mr. STROTHER said he never should oppose a resolution calling for information to instruct this House in the discharge of its duty, or that was necessary to enable them to ascertain the manner in which the Executive department had discharged the duties assigned it by the constitution and laws of the country. The stability and integrity of the Government depended upon the right to call for and obtain information; but he objected to this resolution, introduced by his friend from North Carolina, because the information called for had been furnished this House, in that voluminous document laid upon our table upon the subject of the Seminole war. Mr. S. said, if his honorable friend would examine the correspondence between General Jackson and the Secretary of War, he would ascertain that a government has been established at Pensacola, and functionaries appointed to administer the government; a temporary government, confined to the necessary and legitimate purpose of protection to the persons and property of the people inhabiting that region; a proceeding springing from necessity, and to terminate with it. Upon this ground he was opposed to the resolution.

The Seminole War.

The order of the day, on the report of the Committee on Military Affairs respecting the Seminole war, being announced—

The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to whom that report was committed, Mr. PITKIN in the Chair.

There was some conversation previously about postponing the subject for a day or two; but the House, by a majority of ten or fifteen votes, resolved to take it up.

The report of the Military Committee was read through, concluding with the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the House of Representatives of the United States disapproves the proceedings in the trial and execution of Alexander Arbuthnot and Robert C. Ambrister."

Mr. COBB, of Georgia, commenced the debate, by observing, that although he concurred in opinion with the Military Committee, as expressed in their report under consideration, yet he thought they had not gone far enough. There were other matters, arising out of the late Seminole war, which he thought of infinitely greater importance, and, in comparison with which, indeed the trials of Arbuthnot and Ambrister were objects of but secondary consideration. As highly, therefore, as he disapproved the proceedings in the trial of these men, yet as, by the report, the matters to which he had allusion were not presented for consideration, he held in his hand certain resolutions which it was his intention to propose, by way of amendment to the report of the Military Committee. [Mr. COBB here read the amendment, which he subsequently moved.] From these resolutions, the Committee of the Whole would observe that it was his intention to open the whole field of debate, and to present for discussion, not only the trials of these men, but the capture of the Spanish posts of St. Marks, Pensacola, and Barancas, in which, he believed, there had been a most flagrant breach of the Constitution of the United States. But as, notwithstanding the amendment he was about to propose, the resolution of the Military Committee would stand first in order, he would proceed to make a few remarks as to the subject-matter of that resolution. He thought he could promise that the committee should not be long detained by the observations which he might have the honor to make either upon this resolution or those which he would lay upon the table, as, at that early period of the discussion, it was not necessary to present to the committee any thing more than what he considered the leading points, reserving to himself the right of speaking, as to particulars, at some future period, if he should find it necessary.

In attending to the trials by court-martial of those two Englishmen, the first objects for consideration which presented themselves, were the charges exhibited against them. Reasoning upon the supposition that they were true, he was perfectly at a loss to know what law, martial, municipal, or national, was violated. Against what law had they offended? He was not certain that he perfectly understood what was martial law in this country. Were he to view it in the light that it had been explained and enforced by some, he must be compelled to consider it as of paramount authority indeed; so high in its nature as that it could be made to suspend the constitution itself. He had not yet obtained his consent to give it this omnipotent effect, and he hoped he never should. He had thought, and yet believed, until he could have some proofs to the contrary, that it was contained in that body of laws established by the Congress of the United States for the government of the army, commonly called the "Rules and Articles of War." If he was correct in this opinion, (and he presumed no gentleman would controvert it,) he had searched in vain (and he had used no little industry to discover) for that clause against which Arbuthnot and Ambrister had offended, in the commission of the acts charged against them, and for which they were convicted. It was true, there was a clause subjecting to death those who should be convicted of being "spies." But, although these men, or one of them, was charged with this, yet he was acquitted of that charge, and for that reason it would be unnecessary to take further notice of it. The offence for which they were convicted and suffered death, was that of "exciting and stirring up the Creek Indians to war against the United States and her citizens, they being subjects of Great Britain, with whom the United States are at peace;" "of aiding, abetting, and comforting the enemy, and supplying them with the means of war;" "and leading and commanding the Lower Creeks in carrying on war against the United States." Admit the truth of the facts contained in these charges, are they declared penal in any part of the rules and articles of war? Or are they therein declared to be proper subject matters for trial before a court-martial? If they were not, it followed, as a consequence, that the commanding General had transcended his powers in ordering the court, and that the court itself had stretched its powers to an unwarrantable length, in acting upon matters not cognizable before them. It would be arguing to little purpose to prove, that the crimes contained in these charges were not embraced in the rules and articles of war. It would be sufficient, at present, simply to deny that they were, until those who differed from him in opinion attempted to prove the affirmative of the question.

Mr. C. thought it would be an attempt equally fruitless to prove that the matters charged against these individuals constituted an offence against national law, for which they were answerable before a court-martial. He did not profess to be deeply read in the law of nations. He had, however, searched, in the hope that he could find some justification for this most novel proceeding, all the writers on that subject, upon whose works he had been able to lay his hands. He had commenced and prosecuted this search under the most anxious wish for success. It had been an object of great solicitude with him to rescue both the court and the General who ordered it, from the imputation of injustice. He had been compelled to desist, chagrined and disappointed. If any other gentleman had been fortunate, he should rejoice to learn it. He certainly could have no wish to remain in error.

The next point occupied by Mr. COBB was as to the evidence under which both, or one of these men, were convicted. He should not say much upon it, for he did not intend to analyze it. He had understood, and no doubt correctly, that the rules of evidence, in courts-martial, differed very little, in principle, from those established in the courts of common law. It was so declared, he believed, by the only American authority (Macomb on Martial Law) that he knew any thing of, on that subject. He presumed it would not be denied. But, sir, said he, if we test the evidence produced in those trials by these rules, we shall blush at the shameful perversion of justice therein displayed. The evidence of papers, not produced or accounted for, the belief of persons whose testimony of facts ought to have been doubted, hearsay, and that of Indians, negroes or others, who, had they been present, could not have been sworn, were all indiscriminately admitted and acted upon. Miserable, indeed, will be the precedents established by this court-martial for others which may hereafter be formed! More need not be said on this subject.

Mr. C. next called the attention of the committee to the sentence under which Ambrister was executed. He had strong doubts whether, upon giving a fair construction to the Rules and Articles of War, the proceedings of the court martial ought not to have been laid before the President of the United States before the sentence was carried into effect. But he waived the examination of this question. It seems that the court first sentenced Ambrister to be shot; but one of the members having asked a reconsideration of the sentence, before the proceedings were submitted to the commanding General it was allowed, and another punishment awarded as ignominious in its nature as imagination could well conceive, but which yet spared life. Now, will it be contended that this reconsideration and change of sentence did not, to all intents and purposes, render null and void the first sentence? Can it be said, with any truth, that there was any other sentence than the one last passed in the case? But, unfortunately, the first sentence was not erased from the proceedings of the court. It is there found by the General, when they were submitted to him, and, by a high stretch of power, he avails himself of it—"approves the finding and first sentence—disapproves of the reconsideration and last sentence," and directs the man to be executed! To me, sir, said Mr. C., this proceeding has upon its face a cruelty that excites my greatest disapprobation. The last thing to which Mr. C. would call the attention of the committee was the principle by which the commanding General professes to have been governed in ordering the execution of Ambrister, and which, in its extent, as contended by the report of the committee under consideration, applied with equal force to the case of Arbuthnot. It is in these words: "It is an established principle of the law of nations, that any individual of a nation making war against the citizens of another nation, they being at peace, forfeits his allegiance, and becomes an outlaw and a pirate." The Military Committee, in their report, have very properly denied the establishment of any such principle in the law of nations. Sir, said Mr. C., I boldly challenge any man of common sense to prove the existence of such a principle to the extent it is here laid down. Reason, propriety, justice, and humanity, all cry aloud against such a principle! So far as my researches have gone, it is absolutely denied by the writers on national law; and I sincerely hope will be absolutely denied by every member of this committee. If this principle was true, then La Fayette, De Kalb, Pulaski, and a large host of foreigners, who joined the standard of our fathers in the Revolution, and, by their blood, and at the expense of their lives, aided in the establishment of the independence of this nation, were "outlaws and pirates;" and, had they been captured, were subject to have been tried and sentenced to an ignominious death by a court-martial. For, when they entered our service, they were "individuals of a nation at peace" with England, and they, after they joined our arms, "made war upon England and her citizens, and thereby forfeited their allegiance." Sir, is this committee prepared to brand these men with the titles of "outlaws and pirates," by their sanction to this principle? I will not yet believe it.

But, it may be said, that these Englishmen, having "joined a savage nation, who observe no rules, and give no quarter," we have a right to treat them precisely as we might treat the savages whom they have joined, and that we would have a right to put the savages to death, upon a principle of retaliation. Let this position for a moment be admitted, and yet it will be evident that the principle under which we should proceed would be a very different one—to wit, that of retaliation. For even savages cannot regularly be put to death, until they refuse "to observe rules or give quarter." In order that the principle established by General Jackson may be applied, it must undergo a material amendment. Instead of the words in which it is couched, it should read thus—"It is an established principle of the law of nations, that any individual of a nation, joining savages and barbarians who observe no rules and give no quarter, and making war against the citizens of another nation, they being at peace, becomes himself a savage and barbarian, and may be treated as such." Under such a principle, there would have been more justice (humanity being out of the question) in putting Ambrister and Arbuthnot to death.

Mr. C. then proceeded to inquire, whether the commanding General of the American army possessed the power to exercise the right of retaliation? If in its exercise there is any responsibility, he contended it was placed upon the nation. They were accountable to all other nations for the manner in which they conducted their wars. To the nation, therefore, it belonged, to establish the rules of war, by which it would be governed; and the authority by which they were to be established, was that in whose hands was vested the right of declaring war. In their establishment, the character of the nation for justice, for humanity, &c., was deeply involved. Who, he asked, were the legitimate guardians of the character of this nation, but Congress—the war-declaring power? Mr. C. thought he was not singular in this opinion. He believed that the late President of the United States, the virtuous James Madison, was of the same opinion. For when, during the late war, it was thought necessary to apply the retaliatory principle, did he believe himself clothed with power to do it, although Commander-in-chief? No—he believed it was in Congress alone. To Congress he applied for the power, and, by a special act, they conferred it on him. Mr. C. thought this case should be considered as conclusive authority.

TUESDAY, January 19.

The Seminole War.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. PITKIN in the Chair, on this subject.

Mr. HOLMES, of Massachusetts, said the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. COBB) having appealed to the common sense of the committee, he felt himself obliged, having some claim to that very common and vulgar commodity, to attempt to answer the gentleman's call.

This is not, said Mr. H., the only inducement. The very handsome, able, and gentlemanly manner in which that gentleman has supported his resolutions, entitles him to the particular consideration of every member who differs from him, and demands our utmost efforts to combat his arguments and resist the force of his eloquence.

It is not, sir, because General Jackson has acquired so much glory in defence of his country's rights that I defend him—it is not for the splendor of his achievements or the brilliancy of his character. I would not compromit the rights and liberties of my country to screen any man, however respectable. If General Jackson has been ambitious, I would restrain him; if cruel, I would correct him; if he is proud, I would humble him; if he is tyrannical, I would disarm him. And yet, I confess, it would require pretty strong proof to produce conviction that he has intentionally done wrong. At his age of life, crowned with the honors and loaded with the gratitude of his country, what adequate motive could induce him to tarnish his glory by acts of cruelty and revenge?

Nor am I disposed to become the advocate of Executive usurpation. If the President of the United States has encroached upon the rights of the people, or usurped a power not granted by the constitution, it is our duty, as the guardians of those rights, to correct the mischief and preserve the Republic. And yet, it would be difficult to imagine an adequate motive to induce the President to trample upon the constitutional liberties of the people. His life has been constantly devoted to the liberties, prosperity, and honor of his country. He receives his reward in the gratitude and confidence of the people. The chief of the only free people on earth, I could scarcely imagine that he has an inducement to do wrong, much less to prostrate the fabric of freedom which his own hands have contributed to erect.

I assure the gentleman from Georgia that, in endeavoring to anticipate the arguments of the friends of General Jackson and the President, he has not anticipated me. I admit, in the outset, that the President has no right to commence a war, even against Indians. And I further admit, that, if a treaty between this and another nation be violated by the other party, and the violation is not itself an act of war, but such as would justify hostilities on our part, the President has no right to commence these hostilities without the consent of Congress. If, with these admissions, the President and General Jackson cannot be defended, they cannot, in my opinion, be defended at all.

It is, then, incumbent on me to show that the Indians commenced the war. I shall not detain the committee long on this point at present, as I shall be obliged to examine it more particularly in discussing another part of the subject. It cannot, however, sir, have escaped the recollection of the members of this House, that the aggressions of those Seminoles were loudly complained of by the people of Georgia. Scarcely a newspaper from the South but was filled with dismal accounts of Indian massacres; scarcely a breeze but wafted to our ears the dangers, distresses, and murders of the people on the frontiers of Georgia. Were these all groundless rumors and false alarms? Were the Georgians, in fact, the aggressors? The gentleman from Georgia can answer the question.

On the 9th of August, 1814, a treaty was signed at Fort Jackson between the United States and most of the chiefs and warriors of the Creek Nation. By this treaty certain lands were ceded to the United States, and the inhabitants of the frontiers understood that the war was ended. But it was soon found that several of the hostile Creeks, and the Seminoles, had, within the limits of Florida, associated for the purpose of commencing hostilities against the United States. By the instigation and aid of a certain Colonel Nicholls, a fort was erected on the Appalachicola, and within the province of East Florida, to facilitate their hostile designs. At this place were assembled a motley banditti of negroes, Indians, and fugitives from all nations, and trained and instructed in the arts of robbery and murder. The people of the United States soon felt the effects of their vengeance. Several families, including women and children, were barbarously murdered. In 1816 a boat's crew were cruelly butchered, one of whom was tarred, set on fire, and burnt to death. On the 30th of November last, Lieutenant Scott and his party, consisting of about fifty men, women, and children, were murdered in a manner too shocking to describe. In this exigency, what was to be done?

The Constitution of the United States makes the President the Commander-in-chief of the army and of the militia, when called into the service of the United States. It vests in Congress the power to provide for calling out the militia to suppress insurrections and repel invasions. The act of Congress of the 28th of February, 1795, provides that, whenever the United States shall be invaded, or in imminent danger of invasion, the President may call out any portion of the militia to repel the meditated attack, and, to this end, may direct his orders to any officer of the militia, without a requisition upon the Governors of the States. The framers of the constitution, by authorizing the President to repel invasion, did not intend that he should wait until it should have taken place. Should invasion impend, it was essential that the President should have the power to prevent it. The preposterous doctrine that the invasion must take place before the militia can be called for, is, I trust, long since exploded. This act is an exposition of this clause in the constitution, acquiesced in ever since the year 1795. The President, then, may employ the militia without a special authority from Congress, when there is invasion, or danger of it; and he can use the army as well as the militia. He is their Commander-in-chief, and though the act to which I have just referred does not specially authorize him to employ the standing army for these purposes, yet it is manifest that our regular troops would never have beeen placed on our frontiers in time of peace, if they could not be employed by the President, to repel invasion, without an act of Congress. If the army of the United States, during invasion, were to remain inactive until Congress could be convened to authorize them to act, they would be worse than useless. Though I am not in the habit of placing much reliance on the admissions of my opponents, I trust it will not be insisted that the President has not the power to employ the army for the same purposes as the militia.

The war having been commenced by the Seminoles and their associates, and the President of the United States having the power, by the Constitution and laws of the United States, to meet and repel the enemy, the inquiry is important, on what ground he may meet them. I differ from many gentlemen in regard to the political rights of the Indians. Whatsoever may be their rights in peace, either by natural or conventional law, in war I deem them as sovereign. Their residence within the limits of the United States, limits to which they have never assented, neither brings them within our protection nor entitles us to their allegiance. The laws of the United States have no operation upon them, and if they levy war they are not punishable as traitors. A tribe of Indians, whose territory is exclusively within our limits, may wage war and make peace with us; pursue, capture, and destroy us; send and receive flags; grant and receive capitulations, and are entitled to a reciprocation of every act of civilized warfare, and subject to the same rules of severity and retaliation as other nations. To invade their territory and cross their line is, as to them, passing out of the limits of the United States. And, if General Jackson had no right, in this war, to cross the Florida line, neither had he a right to cross the Indian line within our limits. If there is any force in the argument so often urged on other occasions, that every war of invasion is an offensive war, and one, consequently, which the President could not wage without the authority of Congress; then, it follows, that Congress must declare war before the President can march the militia across the Indian line, even within the limits of the United States. But such a construction of the constitution is totally inadmissible. When war is commenced by savages, it becomes the duty of the President to repel and punish them. To follow them to the line affords us no security. The invasion cannot be effectually repelled but by pursuing them into their own territory, and retaliating on them there. Such has been the uniform construction of the power of the President, ever since the adoption of the constitution. In no instance that I recollect has Congress declared war against an Indian tribe. The defeat of St. Clair, and subsequent victory of Wayne, were on Indian territory. The battle at Tippecanoe (fought by my friend from Ohio, with so much honor to himself and satisfaction to his country) was within the limits of the Indian nation. In neither of these instances was a declaration of war deemed necessary by Congress.

If, then, it be true that this war was commenced by these savages, we have brought General Jackson and his army up to the Florida line, and, I trust, without any material violation of the Constitution or laws of the United States. Let us now stop and examine the ground on the other side before we attempt to pass it.

The territory of Florida, which the General and his troops are about to enter, from St. Marks to Pensacola in length, and from the United States to the Gulf in breadth, comprehends, probably, not less than 10,000 square miles. Spain claims a jurisdiction over this tract, as comprehended within the two provinces; and it includes, I am told, about 3,000 Spaniards in all—2,500 of whom are in and about Pensacola, and the residue scattered on the Choctaw River, and a few trading families on the Appalachicola. The number of Indians there cannot be well ascertained, but far exceeds the white population. The possessions of the Spaniards are exceedingly limited, and their jurisdiction is merely nominal. The Indians have, in fact, the possession and the control.

But suppose we admit that the Spaniards and Indians have a concurrent jurisdiction. This is the most that can be pretended. And upon this hypothesis, what are the rights of the United States? The territory of these Indians is on both sides of the Florida line. Their possessions and residence are transient and ambulatory, without regard to this line. The nation, if such they may be called, is at war with us, and in this war they can occupy their territory in Florida in spite of Spain. Singular, indeed, would it be, if we should be engaged in war with an enemy who had a perfect right to be where we had no right to meet him. Spain claims a jurisdiction to a territory occupied by our enemy; she has no power nor inclination to expel him, and yet it is gravely said this enemy cannot be pursued to this territory without an act of hostility against Spain. Unfortunate, indeed, would be the condition of the United States, if a horde of unprincipled banditti, holding a residence on our borders, could prosecute a cruel and exterminating war upon our citizens, and then take refuge across an ideal line, where the laws of nations forbid us to approach them. Sir, let gentlemen tell me of another instance where your enemy has a right to perfect security against your approach. It would be a war of a peculiar character, where one side only gives the blows.

Why, then, should not General Jackson and his army cross? Will any gentleman point to me the clause in the Constitution or laws of the United States that forbids him? Nay, more, can any one offer a reason why he should not pass into Florida, which would not equally forbid his crossing the Indian line within the limits of the United States? It would be preposterous and absurd to contend that you could not pursue your enemy to any refuge to which he is entitled. The Seminoles, then, being enemies, and having a right in Florida beyond the control of Spain, the inference is irresistible that you have a right to pursue and fight them there in your own defence.

General Jackson having crossed into Florida, for the purpose of meeting and fighting the Seminoles, what are his duties towards those who profess an allegiance to Spain? The case is peculiar, and, perhaps, stands on its own foundation. It is difficult to illustrate it by analogy. While we are on enemy's, we are, in some sense, on neutral ground. The ocean being the highway of nations, all having concurrent jurisdiction, it is possible a case may there be found affording an illustration. You discover your enemy's fleet at a distance. On approaching it you perceive neutrals intermixed. Some are of a doubtful character, wearing the neutral flag, but exhibiting other symptoms of a belligerent character. Some seem engaged in affording facilities to the enemy to defend themselves or to escape. In such a case you are bound to exercise your discretion, and to capture all those of a suspicious character. Should you mistake, it is not your fault, but the misfortune or folly of the neutral in being found in company with your enemy, in a situation to excite suspicion. A discretion, therefore, must rest with a commander to discriminate. In the ordinary case of invading the country of a civilized nation, the commanding general is obliged to distinguish between the public and private property, and between combatants and non-combatants. There are situations in which it is extremely difficult to determine, and it not unusually happens that this power of discrimination necessarily devolves on the subordinate officer, and even soldiers, whereby many of the innocent and unoffending are made to suffer.

When General Jackson marched his army into a country where he must necessarily find neutrals as well as enemies, the right of discrimination devolved on him. If a Spaniard was found in the ranks of the enemy, aiding and assisting in hostilities, he was bound to consider him as an enemy. If the guns of a fort were turned against him, or the fort used by the Indians as a post of annoyance, he had a right to consider the soldiers there as associated and identified with the enemy, and to wrest from their hands the means of hostility. Even should he mistake, he is not subject to censure, but it is the misfortune of the neutral in being associated with our enemy, and placed in a situation where suspicion might attach. But, sir, I by no means admit that General Jackson needs such an apology in this case. I will prove that the Spaniards in Florida were identified with the Indians, and the posts taken by Jackson were under Indian control. I will prove that the Spanish officers and inhabitants in Florida have conducted most treacherously, pretending to a neutrality which they have constantly violated. I will show to the committee, by proofs incontestable, that the local authorities were the exciters, promoters, and prosecutors of the war, and furnished the means of carrying it on.

I lay Spain out of the question. Poor, miserable, degraded Spain, too weak and palsied to act or think! She has but the shadow of authority there, and, so far from being able to control the Indians, or even her own subjects, the country, as to her, is a perfect derelict. I will ask this committee to go back with me to the year 1813, and from that period to the capture of Pensacola, to witness the Spanish officers exciting the Indians to vengeance, furnishing them with the arms and munitions of war, tamely acquiescing in the most flagrant violations of their pretended neutrality, and suffering the territory to be prostituted to every banditti who might be disposed to annoy or distress the people of the United States.

Sir, before I proceed to an account of these transactions, allow me to subjoin a few remarks in reply to what has been said relative to the conduct of the Executive in engaging in this war. The gentleman from Georgia apprehends that the President has violated the constitution. During the last session of Congress, it was known that this war could not be terminated without marching the troops into Florida. The President of the United States, in his Message of 25th March, and four weeks before the session closed, informed this House that he had issued orders to General Gaines to cross into Florida, to pursue and chastise the enemy, but to respect the Spanish authority where it was maintained. We acquiesced; we appropriated the money to pay the militia, and without a whisper of disapprobation.

Connected with this part of the subject, I regret to be obliged to notice an intimation from the gentleman from Georgia, that General Jackson might possibly have orders from the President different from those communicated to this House. Sir, though the gentleman did not state that he believed this, yet, when a member of this House will intimate that it is even possible that the President of the United States has practised such duplicity, and will endeavor to show evidence of the grounds of such intimation, it becomes our imperious duty to inquire. If the President has given to General Jackson one set of orders, and imposed upon us a different set, he has practised a hypocrisy utterly unpardonable, and he ought to be exposed to the indignation of the American people. What, then, I repeat, can be the ground of this suggestion? The gentleman quotes the letter of the Secretary of War to Governor Bibb, of the 13th May, stating that General Jackson had full powers to prosecute the war at his discretion, and, as we have seen no such full power to General Jackson, he leaves us to infer that the document is withheld. A brief statement of the facts will, I trust, explain this mystery, even to the satisfaction of the gentleman from Georgia. The Secretary's letter of 16th December last authorizes Gaines to cross into Florida, under the restriction as to Spanish fortresses. His letter to Jackson, of the 26th of the same month, directs him, to whom the command was now transferred, to concentrate his forces and adopt the necessary measures to bring the war to a speedy conclusion. Governor Bibb, not knowing of the orders to Gaines, on the 15th April, 1818, writes to the Secretary that he has no authority to pass the Florida line, and wishing for orders. The Secretary, on the 13th May, replied, that the orders to Gaines to cross were sufficient for him, and then adds, that General Jackson had full powers to conduct the war. Taking all these letters together, can there be a doubt of their meaning? The authority to cross was that given to Gaines and transferred to Jackson on his assuming the command; and the full power, mentioned in the letter to Bibb, was that vested in Jackson by the letter of the 26th December, and meant and intended nothing more than that Jackson was Commander-in-chief in that quarter, and that his powers were sufficiently extensive to accomplish the object of his appointment. Can gentlemen find in all this sufficient ground to suspect the President of fraudulently suppressing a document? Were the gentleman a judge or juror, could he find in this sufficient to convict, or even to cast a well-grounded suspicion upon the meanest wretch who crawls in the filth of society? And yet this is offered as ground of inquiry against your President! Sir, is it liberal, is it candid, is it charitable, is it magnanimous?

Sir, who are we? Are we the people, or, like the President, the servants of the people? And, should we suggest such suspicions on such evidence, may not these same people call us to an account for a malicious prosecution without probable cause against their President and friend? I do not profess to predict what would be their decision, but I confess I should be unwilling to submit to them such a question on such evidence.

Mr. T. M. NELSON, of Virginia, said it had been his intention, when the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union first took up the report which was now the subject of deliberation, to have stated briefly the view taken by the majority of the Military Committee who concurred in the report; but, not having been so fortunate as to get the floor, he had been obliged to delay doing so until now. I should not, said he, have obtruded any remarks upon you now, sir, had the report the aid of the chairman, who has so faithfully presided over the Military Committee ever since he has occupied that station; but, I regret to say, we differed in opinion on this occasion.

I believe I am correct in stating that that part of the subject to which the report is confined, is the only one on which a majority of the committee could be united; and, as the other branch of it might fairly be considered to be in the hands of another committee of this House, a reason was found for passing it over in silence. I moreover acknowledge that, although I did, previous to the decision of the committee, disapprove the proceedings against Pensacola and Barancas, as unauthorized and unnecessary, I felt a doubt whether the capture of St. Marks might not be justified, upon the plea of necessity; but that is dispelled by a more minute examination of the documents. A reference to the letter from the commanding officer at St. Marks, to General Jackson, bearing date April 7, 1818, to be found page 67 of the documents on the Seminole war, and which had escaped my recollection, shows that there was no necessity for the capture of that post, to preserve it from falling into the hands of the Indians; the apprehension of which seems to be the original cause of General Jackson's design to take it. And, sir, if for the peace of the United States, it was important that St. Marks should not fall into the hands of the enemy, the proposition made to General Jackson, in the letter I have alluded to, to leave a force in its vicinity, with which the Spanish troops would co-operate, to effect that object, appears to me amply sufficient for every purpose of security and defence. General Jackson thought differently; he thought "St. Marks was necessary, as a depot, to insure success, and he occupied it with an American force."

The gentleman (Mr. HOLMES) who preceded me in this debate, has gone into a long train of reasoning to show that Spain has given us just cause of war, and thence infers that General Jackson had a right to take possession of the Spanish garrisons in West Florida. Sir, I am not the apologist of Spain; I wish to be distinctly understood to say, that to Spain we are under no obligations for General Jackson's conduct while in her territory. When the gentleman, who is chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, shall offer a proposition to go to war with Spain, it will be time enough to inquire whether we have just cause of war against her; but there would be many other points of discussion, besides the mere justification or cause of war. Would it be politic, would it be magnanimous, to make war upon a degraded, enfeebled enemy? These are questions which I am not called upon at this time to decide. Sir, the question now before us is, whether a war has existed between the United States and Spain, and by whose authority. That a war has been prosecuted by General Jackson, against the Spanish authority in West Florida, can be established by his own representation. I refer you to the capitulation entered into by General Jackson and the Governor of Pensacola, "which, with the exception of one article, amounts to a complete cession of the country to the United States," to use the General's own language. How, sir, was this effected? By the American Army, commanded by General Jackson. Was it in compliance with the wish and desire of the Spanish commander? No, sir; it was in direct opposition to his warning, that he would repel force by force; which General Jackson says "was so open an indication of hostile feeling" on the part of the Governor, that he no longer hesitated on the means to be adopted. "I marched for and entered Pensacola, with only the show of resistance." In his letter of the 2d of June, to the Secretary of War, he details all the minutia of investing the fortress of Barancas; of making a lodgment under the fire of the garrison; of mounting nine-pounder and howitzer batteries; and such other incidents as are attendant on most battles between civilized nations. Mr. Chairman, if this be not war, I have always misunderstood the term, although three years a soldier during what was then called war.

General Jackson, speaking of the captured garrison, says, "the terms were more favorable than a conquered enemy would have merited." He goes on, in the same letter, to state the kind of government he had established, appointing revenue and other officers, putting the revenue laws of the United States in force! By what authority has all this been done, Mr. Chairman? Has it been the effect of any act of Congress, where the power alone is vested by the constitution? It is not necessary to refer to that instrument to show, that to Congress alone belongs the war-making power; every gentleman who hears me knows it to be so; nor will I consent to partition it. The inevitable result of every gentleman's unbiassed inquiry will be, that a war has been waged against a foreign power by the United States without the sanction of Congress, where alone the right and the power constitutionally exists. And, in this act of war, I witness, to regret and deplore, the most unqualified infraction of the constitution that has ever occurred since its adoption. Shall we, sir, who represent the sovereignty of the nation, tamely fold our arms and acquiesce in the violation of that sacred instrument, which by our oaths and our interests we are bound to support and maintain? I trust not. Let us apply the only remedy in our power, censure the proceedings, and enact other laws which cannot be misconstrued. I fear even this remedy will prove inefficient; the constitution, to my mind, is so plain and explicit on this point, that he who runs may read.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Virginia, said it was with sensations very different from those which are pleasurable, that he entered on the investigation of the subject which claimed the attention and deliberation of the committee. To be compelled, said he, to investigate the conduct of the high and distinguished officers of the Government, when warned and admonished by every fact which meets my eye, that I shall be compelled to disapprove that conduct, can never be to me a pleasurable duty. As an American citizen, as the Representative of a portion of the people of the United States, it would be the pride and pleasure of my heart to be enabled always to prove the officers of my Government right, and to prove the enemies of my country and the enemies of liberty wrong. Before I proceed, sir, I must notice a remark made by the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. HOLMES.) I am sorry that I do not see the honorable gentleman in his seat. [Mr. HOLMES rose.] He remarked that a malicious prosecution had been commenced against the President of the United States. I do not precisely understand the gentleman. By whom has this malicious prosecution been commenced? [Here Mr. HOLMES rose and explained. He said the remark was intended as a reply to an observation made on yesterday by an honorable gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. COBB,) who seemed to insinuate that some instruction given to General Jackson had been suppressed.] Mr. Chairman, I hold it to be a fundamental principle, that every officer of this Government, from the highest to the lowest, is responsible to the people for the manner in which he has discharged the duties of his office. It is on this principle that the Government depends for its perpetuity—for its capacity to secure to the people of the United States peace, prosperity, liberty, and happiness. Is there any gentleman who hears me that will question the truth of this political maxim? Is there any officer, however distinguished by station, or the splendor of his public services, who is unwilling to submit the investigation of his public acts to a candid, deliberate, and decorous investigation by the Representatives of the people? If there be any such officer, I pronounce him a stranger, an alien to the affections of the people, and that it is time to get rid of him. The moment that any officer of this Government denies that he is responsible for the faithful and correct discharge of his public duties, from that moment he becomes dangerous. Sir, I am arguing this question on abstract principles. I have no reference to individuals; I have no feelings to gratify. I presume that a high-minded honorable man, so far from evading an investigation of his public conduct, the moment he discovered the slightest shade of suspicion hovering over the pure, faithful, and legal discharge of his public duties, would court investigation; that he would present himself at the bar of the public, and demand an investigation of his conduct.

Had General Jackson the right to capture Pensacola and the Barancas? Sir, I wish to treat this question with the most perfect candor and fairness. To save the trouble of frequent references to books, I have transcribed from Vattel's Law of Nations the strongest principles in favor of the course pursued by the Commander-in-chief. I have no question that there are copies of Vattel's Law of Nations in the House. If any gentleman doubts the correctness of the quotations, I hope he will compare the text with the original. It is laid down by Vattel, page 410, that "extreme necessity may even authorize the temporary seizure of a place (in a neutral country) and the putting a garrison therein for defending itself against an enemy, or preventing him in his designs of seizing this place when the sovereign is not able to defend it. But when the danger is over, it must be immediately surrendered." Did this necessity exist? Was the existing state of affairs such as would have authorized a commander, possessed of plenary power, to have captured Pensacola and the Barancas? In order to ascertain the facts necessary to a correct decision of this important question, I beg permission to refer the honorable committee to the correspondence of General Jackson with the Governor of Pensacola and the Secretary of War. In the letter of General Jackson, of the 2d June, 1818, to the Secretary of War, will be found the following statement: "The terms are more than a conquered enemy would have merited, but, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, my object obtained, there was no motive for wounding the feelings of those whose military pride or honor had prompted to the resistance made. The 'articles, with but one condition, amount to a complete cession to the United States of that portion of the Floridas hitherto under the Government of Don Jose Massot.' Though the Seminole Indians have been scattered, and, literally so, driven and reduced, and no longer to be viewed as a formidable enemy, yet, as there are many small marauding parties, supposed to be concealed in the swamps of Perdido, Choctawhatchy, and Chapouly, who might make occasional and sudden inroads on our frontier settlers, massacreing women and children, I have deemed it advisable to call into service for six months, if not sooner discharged, two companies of volunteer rangers, under Captains McGirt and Boyles, with instructions to scour the country between the Mobile and Appalachicola Rivers, exterminating every hostile party who dare resist, and will not surrender, and remove with their families, above the 31st degree of latitude." In this letter of the 25th of May, 1818, from General Jackson to Don Jose Massot, commanding the Barancas, will be found the following important statement of facts: "I have only to repeat that the Barancas must be occupied by an American garrison; and, again, to tender you the terms offered, if amicably surrendered. Resistance would be a wanton sacrifice of blood, for which you and your garrison will have to atone. You cannot expect to defend yourself successfully, and the first shot from your fort must draw down upon you the vengeance of an irritated soldiery. I am well advised of your strength, and cannot but remark on the inconsistency of presuming yourself capable of resisting an army which has conquered the Indian tribes, too strong, agreeably to your own acknowledgment, to be controlled by you."

Mr. Chairman, after this statement of facts by the commanding General, permit me to inquire whether any member of this committee can believe that this extreme necessity existed, which would authorize a General, in a neutral country, temporarily to seize a place and put a garrison therein, for defending himself against the enemy, or preventing him in his designs of seizing this place. What, sir! after the Indian tribes had been conquered, with whom was the General waging war? Not with Spain. Not with the Indian tribes, because these tribes he had subdued and conquered. Where, then, was the necessity, the urgent and extreme necessity, which would have justified an absolute sovereign, on whose fiat depended war and peace, in thus forcibly possessing himself of these places and posts in a neutral country?

I proceed to examine into the propriety of the course pursued on the trial and execution of Arbuthnot and Ambrister. It is laid down by Vattel, p. 416: "An enemy not to be killed after ceasing to resist." In the same page: "A particular case excepted. Yet, as a prince or his general has a right of sacrificing the life of his enemies to his safety, and that of his men, if he is engaged with an inhuman enemy, who frequently commits enormities, he appears to have a right of refusing life to some of the prisoners he may take, and of treating them as his were treated; but Scipio's generosity is rather to be imitated." Did Arbuthnot and Ambrister come within the particular exception? I beg attention to the careful and particular manner in which this distinguished writer lays down this important principle. The prince, for his own safety, appears to have the right to take the life of his prisoner. The general, for his own safety, and that of his men, appears to have the right to take the life of his prisoner. This humane author seems disposed to guard this dangerous principle as effectually as possible. It presents two distinct propositions. The general, when in the field, at a distance from his government, when his safety and that of his men require it, appears (in the words of the author) to have the right to take the life of his prisoner. To justify the general in exercising this high and important power of denying to an unfortunate captive life, the safety of the general and his men must really require the sacrifice. I can scarcely believe that it will be pretended that the safety of the general or his men required the execution of these prisoners. Did, then, the safety of the prince (that is, in this country, the people) require the execution of these men? Was it necessary to offer them up on the altar of public safety—to hold them up as a terrible example to future instigators and abettors of Indian wars? If so, their fate should have been referred to the people; that is, to their representatives—to the Congress of the United States. The commanding general had no right, no authority, to decide the question whether the safety of the people required the sacrifice of these captives. We are told—and very seriously told—that this execution of prisoners may be justified on the principles of retaliation. What, retaliate the cruelties and shocking barbarities of savages! Not precisely that sort of retaliation. You execute individuals, not under the authority of the law of nations, during the continuance of war, having given notice to the enemy of the particular acts of inhumanity which you mean to retaliate; not for the purpose of punishing, through these individuals, the nation with which they are identified and fighting, but to punish them, as individuals, for their crimes—the crimes of aiding and abetting and instigating Indian tribes to war upon us; not as an example to operate on nations, but on individuals. And we are seriously and gravely informed, by honorable gentlemen, that an American general has authority to execute individuals for individual offences, as a warning to other individuals, without the form of trial, and even contrary to the sentence of the court, detailed by the general himself, for the purpose of trying the offenders. It is a doctrine unsupported by precedent and law, and is shocking to the principles of humanity. It may be said, as it was remarked the other day by a gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. NELSON,) that this is a sympathy for miscreants—a sympathy resulting from morbid sensibility—a sympathy for British subjects. It is not so, Mr. Chairman. I have no sympathy for British subjects. When I look at yon ruin, (pointing to the Capitol;) when I recollect the massacre at the River Raisin, Frenchtown, and many other places in the United States, during the late war, I recognize in the late British forces, an enemy not less cruel and savage than the Seminole Indians—the outlawed Red Sticks. Acts of wanton and shocking cruelty occur to me, at which my soul sickens, and which I should have rejoiced to see retaliated on the most distinguished officer in the British army. What has been the opinion, as deliberately expressed by this Government, on the subject of retaliation? Did the highest officer in this Government, during the late war—the Commander-in-chief of your Army—the President of the United States—consider himself vested with authority to retaliate the acts of cruelty perpetrated by the enemy, or those threatened? The answer will be furnished by referring to the act of Congress, passed during that war, for the express purpose of authorizing the President to retaliate. What has been, since the period of our independence, the uniform and unvarying policy pursued by this Government towards the Indian tribes? Has it been a policy tempered by mercy, brightened by generosity, and ameliorated by Christianity? Have we been constantly engaged in the humane work of civilizing them—of sending emissaries among them to preach the Gospel—to distribute the copies of the Bible collected by different societies? Is this policy to be suddenly changed, under the auspices of General Jackson? Shall we, at the close of a war of extermination, go through the ceremony of appointing committees to meet members from the Society of Friends, to devise the means of civilizing this unfortunate, misguided, and deluded race of beings? Such committees have been appointed during the present session. I have seen members of the Society of Friends giving their willing attendance. But Arbuthnot and Ambrister were Christian savages; they were worse than the Indians; they were the exciters and instigators of the war; they deserved death. In a moral point of view, I admit that the instigator to acts of wickedness, and of dark, malignant, and criminal character, is worse than the actor. The question recurs, Had the General, on his own authority, without trial, and against the sentence of the court, the right to take the life of his prisoner—a prisoner completely in his power—from whose hands the weapons of death—the tomahawk and the scalping knife—had been stricken? Were these men, according to any known principle of the law of nations, subject to any other or different treatment, than the subjects or citizens of the nation with which they had identified themselves, and by whose sides they were fighting? Most certainly not.

WEDNESDAY, January 20.

The Seminole War.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. PITKIN in the Chair,) on the report of the Military Committee, disapproving the trial and execution of Arbuthnot and Ambrister, with the amendments proposed thereto.

Mr. CLAY (Speaker) rose. In rising to address you, sir, said he, on the very interesting subject which now engages the attention of Congress, I must be allowed to say, that all inferences, drawn from the course which it will be my painful duty to take in this discussion, of unfriendliness to either the Chief Magistrate of the country, or to the illustrious military chieftain, whose operations are under investigation, will be wholly unfounded. Towards that distinguished captain, who has shed so much glory on our country, whose renown constitutes so great a portion of its moral property, I never had, I never can have, any other feelings than those of the most profound respect, and of the utmost kindness. With him my acquaintance is very limited, but, so far as it has extended, it has been of the most amicable kind. I know, said Mr. C., the motives which have been, and which will again be, attributed to me, in regard to the other exalted personage alluded to. They have been, and will be, unfounded. I have no interest, other than that of seeing the concerns of my country well and happily administered. It is infinitely more gratifying to behold the prosperity of my country advancing, by the wisdom of the measures adopted to promote it, than it would be to expose the errors which may be committed, if there be any, in the conduct of its affairs. Mr.

C. said, little as had been his experience in public life, it had been sufficient to teach him, that the most humble station is surrounded by difficulties and embarrassments. Rather than throw obstructions in the way of the President, he would precede him, and pick out those, if he could, which might jostle him in his progress —he would sympathize with him in his embarrassments, and commiserate with him in his misfortunes. It was true, that it had been his mortification to differ with that gentleman on several occasions. He might be again reluctantly compelled to differ with him; but he would, with the utmost sincerity, assure the committee, that he had formed no resolution, come under no engagements, and that he never would form any resolution, or contract any engagement, for systematic opposition to his Administration, or to that of any other Chief Magistrate.

Mr. C. begged leave further to premise, that the subject under consideration presented two distinct aspects, susceptible, in his judgment, of the most clear and precise discrimination. The one he would call its foreign, the other its domestic, aspect. In regard to the first, he would say, that he approved entirely of the conduct of his Government, and that Spain had no cause of complaint. Having violated an important stipulation of the Treaty of 1795, that power had justly subjected herself to all the consequences which ensued upon the entry into her dominions, and it belonged not to her to complain of those measures which resulted from her breach of contract; still less had she a right to examine into the considerations connected with the domestic aspect of the subject.

What were the propositions before the committee? The first in order was that reported by the Military Committee, which asserts the disapprobation of this House of the proceedings in the trial and execution of Arbuthnot and Ambrister. The second, being the first contained in the proposed amendment, was the consequence of that disapprobation, and contemplates the passage of a law to prohibit the execution hereafter of any captive, taken by the army, without the approbation of the President. The third proposition was, that the House disapproves of the forcible seizure of the Spanish posts, as contrary to orders, and in violation of the constitution. The fourth proposition, as the result of the last, is, that a law should pass to prohibit the march of the army of the United States, or any corps of it, into any foreign territory, without the previous authorization of Congress, except it be in fresh pursuit of a defeated enemy. The first and third were general propositions, declaring the sense of the House in regard to the evils pointed out; and the second and fourth proposed the legislative remedies against the recurrence of those evils.

It would be at once perceived, Mr. C. said, by this simple statement of the propositions, that no other censure was proposed against General Jackson himself, than what was merely consequential. His name even did not appear in any one of the resolutions. The Legislature of the country, in reviewing the state of the Union, and considering the events which have transpired since its last meeting, finds that particular occurrences, of the greatest moment, in many respects, had taken place near our southern border. He would add, that the House had not sought, by any officious interference with the duties of the Executive, to gain jurisdiction over this matter. The President, in his message at the opening of the session, communicated the very information on which it is proposed to act. He would ask, for what purpose? That we should fold our arms, and yield a tacit acquiescence, even if we supposed that information disclosed alarming events, not merely as it regards the peace of the country, but in respect to its constitution and character? Impossible. In communicating these papers, and voluntarily calling the attention of Congress to the subject, the President must himself have intended that we should apply any remedy that we might be able to devise. Having the subject thus regularly and fairly before us, and proposing merely to collect the sense of the House upon certain important transactions which it discloses, with the view to the passage of such laws as may be demanded by the public interest, he repeated, that there was no censure anywhere, except such as was strictly consequential upon our legislative action. The supposition of every new law, having for its object to prevent the recurrence of evil, is, that something has happened which ought not to have taken place, and no other than this indirect sort of censure would flow from the resolutions before the committee.

Having thus given his view of the nature and character of the propositions under consideration, Mr. C. said he was far from intimating, that it was not his purpose to go into a full, a free, and a thorough investigation of the facts and of the principles of law, public, municipal, and constitutional, involved in them. And, whilst he trusted he should speak with the decorum due to the distinguished officers of the Government whose proceedings were to be examined, he should exercise the independence which belonged to him as a representative of the people, in freely and fully submitting his sentiments.

In noticing the painful incidents of this war, it was impossible not to inquire into its origin. He feared that would be found to be the famous treaty of Fort Jackson, concluded in August, 1814; and he asked the indulgence of the Chairman that the Clerk might read certain parts of that treaty. [The Clerk of the House having accordingly read as requested, Mr. C. proceeded.] He had never perused this instrument until within a few days past, and he had read it with the deepest mortification and regret. A more dictatorial spirit he had never seen displayed in any instrument. He would challenge an examination of all the records of diplomacy, not excepting even those in the most haughty period of imperious Rome, when she was carrying her arms into the barbarian nations that surrounded her; and he did not believe a solitary instance could be found of such an inexorable spirit of domination pervading a compact purporting to be a treaty of peace. It consisted of the most severe and humiliating demands—of the surrender of large territory—of the privilege of making roads through even what was retained—of the right of establishing trading-houses—of the obligation of delivering into our hands their prophets. And all this, of a wretched people, reduced to the last extremity of distress, whose miserable existence we had to preserve by a voluntary stipulation to furnish them with bread! When even did conquering and desolating Rome fail to respect the altars and the gods of those whom she subjugated! Let me not be told that these prophets were impostors, who deceived the Indians. They were their prophets—the Indians believed and venerated them, and it is not for us to dictate a religious belief to them. It does not belong to the holy character of the religion which we profess, to carry its precepts, by force of the bayonet, into the bosoms of other people. Mild and gentle persuasion was the great instrument employed by the meek founder of our religion. We leave to the humane and benevolent efforts of the reverend professors of Christianity to convert from barbarism those unhappy nations yet immersed in its gloom. But, sir, spare them their prophets! Spare their delusions! Spare their prejudices and superstitions! Spare them even their religion, such as it is, from open and cruel violence. When, sir, was that treaty concluded? On the very day, after the protocol was signed, of the first conference between the American and British Commissioners, treating of peace, at Ghent. In the course of that negotiation, pretensions so enormous were set up, by the other party, that, when they were promulgated in this country, there was one general burst of indignation throughout the continent. Faction itself was silenced, and the firm and unanimous determination of all parties was, to fight until the last man fell in the ditch, rather than submit to such ignominious terms.

What a contrast is exhibited between the contemporaneous scenes of Ghent, and Fort Jackson! What a powerful argument would the British Commissioners have been furnished with, if they could have got hold of that treaty! The United States demand!—the United States demand!—is repeated five or six times. And what did the preamble itself disclose? That two-thirds of the Creek nation had been hostile, and one-third only friendly to us. Now, he had heard (he could not vouch for the truth of the statement) that not one hostile chief signed the treaty. He had also heard that perhaps one or two of them had. If the treaty really were made by a minority of the nation, it was not obligatory upon the whole nation. It was void, considered in the light of a national compact. And, if void, the Indians were entitled to the benefit of the provision of the ninth article of the Treaty of Ghent, by which we bound ourselves to make peace with any tribes with whom we might be at war on the ratification of the treaty, and restore to them their lands as they held them in 1811. Mr. C. said he did not know how the honorable Senate, that body for which he had so high a respect, could have given their sanction to the Treaty of Fort Jackson, so utterly irreconcilable as it is with those noble principles of generosity and magnanimity which he hoped to see this country always exhibit, and particularly towards the miserable remnant of the aborigines. It would have comported better with those principles to have imitated the benevolent policy of the founder of Pennsylvania, to have given to the Creeks, conquered as they were, even if they had made an unjust war upon us, the trifling consideration, to them an adequate compensation, which he paid for their lands. That treaty, Mr. C. said, he feared, had been the main cause of the recent war. And if it had been, it only added another melancholy proof to those with which history already abounds, that hard and unconscionable terms, extorted by the power of the sword and the right of conquest, served but to whet and stimulate revenge, and to give to old hostilities, smothered, not extinguished, by the pretended peace, greater expansion and more ferocity. A truce thus patched up with an unfortunate people, without the means of existence—without bread—is no real peace. The instant there is the slightest prospect of relief from such harsh and severe conditions, the conquered party will fly to arms, and spend the last drop of blood rather than live in such degraded bondage. Even if you again reduce him to submission, the expenses incurred by this second war, to say nothing of the human lives that are sacrificed, will be greater than what it would have cost you to have granted him liberal conditions in the first instance. This treaty, he repeated it, was, he apprehended, the cause of the war. It led to those excesses on our southern borders which began it. Who first commenced them it was, perhaps, difficult to ascertain. There was, however, a paper on this subject, communicated at the last session by the President, that told, in language so pathetic and feeling, an artless tale—a paper that carried such internal evidence, at least, of the belief of the authors of it, that they were writing the truth, that he would ask the favor of the committee to allow him to read it. I should be very unwilling, Mr. C. said, to assert, in regard to this war, that the fault was on our side—but he feared it was. He had heard that that very respectable man, now no more, who once filled the executive chair of Georgia, and who, having been agent of Indian affairs in that quarter, had the best opportunity of judging of the origin of this war, deliberately pronounced it as his opinion that the Indians were not in fault. Mr. C. said that he was far from attributing to General Jackson any other than the very slight degree of blame which attached to him as the negotiator of the Treaty of Fort Jackson, and which would be shared by those who subsequently ratified and sanctioned that treaty. But if there were even a doubt as to the origin of the war, whether we were censurable or the Indians, that doubt would serve to increase our regret at any distressing incidents which may have occurred, and to mitigate, in some degree, the crimes which we impute to the other side. He knew, he said, that, when General Jackson was summoned to the field, it was too late to hesitate—the fatal blow had been struck in the destruction of Fowl Town, and the dreadful massacre of Lieutenant Scott and his detachment; and the only duty which remained to him was to terminate this unhappy contest.

The first circumstance which, in the course of his performing that duty, fixed our attention, had, Mr. C. said, filled him with regret. It was the execution of the Indian chiefs. How, he asked, did they come into our possession? Was it in the course of fair and open and honorable war? No; but by means of deception—by hoisting foreign colors on the staff from which the stars and stripes should alone have floated. Thus ensnared, the Indians were taken on shore, and without ceremony, and without delay, were hung. Hang an Indian! We, sir, who are civilized, and can comprehend and feel the effect of moral causes and considerations, attach ignominy to that mode of death. And the gallant, and refined, and high-minded man, seeks by all possible means to avoid it. But what cares an Indian whether you hang or shoot him? The moment he is captured he is considered by his tribe as disgraced, if not lost. They, too, are indifferent about the manner in which he is despatched. But, Mr. C. said, he regarded the occurrence with grief, for other and higher considerations. It was the first instance that he knew of, in the annals of our country, in which retaliation, by executing Indian captives, had ever been deliberately practised. There may have been exceptions, but, if there were, they met with contemporaneous condemnation, and have been reprehended by the just pen of impartial history. The gentleman from Massachusetts may tell me, if he pleases, what he pleases about the tomahawk and scalping-knife; about Indian enormities, and foreign miscreants and incendiaries. I, too, hate them; from my very soul I abominate them. But I love my country and its constitution; I love liberty and safety, and fear military despotism more even than I hate these monsters. The gentleman, in the course of his remarks, alluded to the State from which I have the honor to come. Little, sir, does he know of the high and magnanimous sentiments of the people of that State if he supposes they will approve of the transaction to which he referred. Brave and generous, humanity and clemency towards a fallen foe constitute one of their noblest characteristics. Amidst all the struggles for that fair land between the natives and the present inhabitants, Mr. C. said he defied the gentleman to point out one instance in which a Kentuckian had stained his hand by—nothing but his high sense of the distinguished services and exalted merits of General Jackson prevented him from using a different term—the execution of an unarmed and prostrate captive. Yes, said Mr. C., there was one solitary exception, in which a man, enraged at beholding an Indian prisoner, who had been celebrated for his enormities, and who had destroyed some of his kindred, plunged his sword into his bosom. The wicked deed was considered as an abominable outrage when it occurred, and the name of the man had been handed down to the execration of posterity. I deny your right thus to retaliate on the aboriginal proprietors of the country; and unless I am utterly deceived, it may be shown that it does not exist. But, before I attempt this, said Mr. C., allow me to make the gentleman from Massachusetts a little better acquainted with those people, to whose feelings and sympathies he had appealed through their representative. During the late war with Great Britain, Colonel Campbell, under the command of my honorable friend from Ohio, (Gen. Harrison,) was placed at the head of a detachment consisting chiefly, he believed, of Kentucky volunteers, in order to destroy the Mississinaway towns. They proceeded and performed the duty, and took some prisoners. And here is evidence of the manner in which they treated them. [Here Mr. C. read the general orders issued on the return of the detachment.*] I hope, sir, the honorable gentleman will be now able better to appreciate the character and conduct of my gallant countrymen than he appears hitherto to have done.

But, sir, I have said that you have no right to practise, under color of retaliation, enormities on the Indians. I will advance, in support of this position, as applicable to the origin of all law, the principle, that, whatever has been the custom, from the commencement of a subject, whatever has been the uniform usage, coeval and coexistent with the subject to which it relates, becomes its fixed law. Such was the foundation of all common law; and such, he believed, was the principal foundation of all public or international law. If, then, it could be shown that from the first settlement of the colonies, on this part of the American continent, to the present time, we have constantly abstained from retaliating upon the Indians the excesses practised by them towards us, we were morally bound by this invariable usage, and could not lawfully change it without the most cogent reasons. So far as his knowledge extended, he said that, from the first settlement at Plymouth or at Jamestown, it had not been our practice to destroy Indian captives, combatants or noncombatants. He knew of but one deviation from the code which regulated the warfare between civilized communities, and that was the destruction of Indian towns, which was supposed to be authorized upon the ground that we could not bring the war to a termination but by destroying the means which nourished it. With this single exception, the other principles of the laws of civilized nations are extended to them, and are thus made law in regard to them. When did this humane custom, by which, in consideration of their ignorance and our enlightened condition the rigors of war were mitigated, begin? At a time when we were weak, and they were comparatively strong; when they were the lords of the soil, and we were seeking, from the vices, from the corruptions, from the religious intolerance, and from the oppressions of Europe, to gain an asylum among them. And when is it proposed to change this custom, to substitute for it the bloody maxims of barbarous ages, and to interpolate the Indian public law with revolting cruelties? At a time when the situation of the two parties is totally changed—when we are powerful and they are weak: at a time when to use a figure drawn from their own sublime eloquence, the poor children of the forest have been driven by the great wave which has flowed in from the Atlantic Ocean to almost the base of the Rocky Mountains, and overwhelming them in its terrible progress, has left no other remains of hundreds of tribes, now extinct, than those which indicate the remote existence of their former companion, the Mammoth of the New World! Yes, sir, it is at this auspicious period of our country, when we hold a proud and lofty station, among the first nations of the world, that we are called upon to sanction a departure from the established laws and usages which have regulated our Indian hostilities. And does the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts expect, in this august body, this enlightened assembly of Christians and Americans, by glowing appeals to our passions, to make us forget our principles, our religion, our clemency, and our humanity?

* The following is the extract which Mr. C. read.

"But the character of this gallant detachment, exhibiting, as it did, perseverance, fortitude, and bravery, would, however, be incomplete, if, in the midst of victory, they had forgotten the feelings of humanity. It is with the sincerest pleasure that the General has heard that the most punctual obedience was paid to his orders, in not only saving all the women and children, but in sparing all the warriors who ceased to resist; and that, even when vigorously attacked by the enemy, the claims of mercy prevailed over every sense of their danger, and this heroic band respected the lives of their prisoners. Let an account of murdered innocence be opened in the records of Heaven against our enemies alone. The American soldier will follow the example of his Government, and the sword of the one will not be raised against the fallen and the helpless, nor the gold of the other be paid for scalps of a massacred enemy."

Why was it, Mr. C. asked, that we had not practised towards the Indian tribes the right of retaliation, now for the first time asserted in regard to them? It was because it is a principle, proclaimed by reason and enforced by every respectable writer on the law of nations, that retaliation is only justifiable as calculated to produce effect in the war. Vengeance was a new motive for resorting to it. If retaliation will produce no effect on the enemy, we are bound to abstain from it by every consideration of humanity and of justice. Will it, then, produce effect on the Indian tribes? No; they care not about the execution of those of their warriors who are taken captive. They are considered as disgraced by the very circumstance of their captivity, and it is often mercy to the unhappy captive to deprive him of his existence. The poet evinced a profound knowledge of the Indian character, when he put into the mouth of the son of a distinguished chief, about to be led to the stake and tortured by his victorious enemy, the words—

"Begin, ye tormentors! your threats are in vain:
The son of Alknomok will never complain."

Retaliation of Indian excesses, not producing then any effect in preventing their repetition, was condemned by both reason and the principles upon which alone, in any case, it can be justified. On this branch of the subject much more might be said; but, as he should possibly again allude to it, he would pass from it, for the present, to another topic.

It was not necessary, Mr. C. said, for the purpose of his argument in regard to the trial and execution of Arbuthnot and Ambrister, to insist on the innocence of either of them. He would yield, for the sake of that argument, without inquiry, that both of them were guilty; that both had instigated the war; and that one of them had led the enemy to battle. It was possible indeed, that a critical examination of the evidence would show, particularly in the case of Arbuthnot, that the whole amount of his crime consisted in his trading, without the limits of the United States, with the Seminole Indians, in the accustomed commodities which form the subject of Indian trade; and that he sought to ingratiate himself with his customers by espousing their interests, in regard to the provision of the Treaty of Ghent, which he may have honestly believed entitled them to the restoration of their lands. And if, indeed, the Treaty of Fort Jackson, for the reasons already assigned, was not binding upon the Creeks, there would be but too much cause to lament his unhappy if not unjust fate. The first impression made, on the examination of the proceedings in the trial and execution of those two men, is, that on the part of Ambrister there was the most guilt, but at the same time the most irregularity. Conceding the point of the guilt of both, with the qualification which he had stated, he would proceed to inquire, first, if their execution could be justified upon the principles assumed by General Jackson himself. If they did not afford a justification, he would next inquire if there were any other principles authorizing their execution; and he would, in the third place, make some observations upon the mode of proceeding.

The principle assumed by General Jackson, which may be found in his general orders commanding the execution of these men, is, "that it is an established principle of the law of nations, that any individual of a nation, making war against the citizens of any other nation, they being at peace, forfeits his allegiance, and becomes an outlaw and a pirate." Whatever may be the character of individuals waging private war, the principle assumed is totally erroneous when applied to such individuals associated with a power, whether Indian or civilized, capable of maintaining the relations of peace and war. Suppose, however, the principle were true, as asserted, what disposition should he have made of these men? What jurisdiction, and how acquired, has the military over pirates, robbers, and outlaws? If they were in the character imputed, they were alone amenable, and should have been turned over to the civil authority. But the principle, he repeated, was totally incorrect, when applied to men in their situation. A foreigner, connecting himself with a belligerent, becomes an enemy of the party to whom that belligerent is opposed, subject to whatever he may be subject, entitled to whatever he is entitled. Arbuthnot and Ambrister, by associating themselves, became identified with the Indians; they became our enemies, and we had a right to treat them as we could lawfully treat the Indians. These positions were so obviously correct, that he should consider it an abuse of the patience of the committee to consume time in their proof. They were supported by the practice of all nations, and of our own. Every page of history, in all times, and the recollection of every member, furnish evidence of their truth. Let us look for a moment into some of the consequences of this principle, if it were to go to Europe, sanctioned by the approbation, express or implied, of this House. We have now in our armies probably the subjects of almost every European power. Some of the nations of Europe maintain the doctrine of perpetual allegiance. Suppose Britain and America in peace, and America and France at war. The former subjects of England, naturalized or unnaturalized, are captured by the navy or the army of France. What is their condition? According to the principle of General Jackson, they would be outlaws and pirates, and liable to immediate execution. Were gentlemen prepared to return to their respective districts with this doctrine in their mouths, and to say to their Irish, English, Scotch, and other foreign constituents, that you are liable, on the contingency supposed, to be treated as outlaws and pirates?

Was there any other principle which justified the proceeding? On this subject, he said, if he admired the wonderful ingenuity with which gentlemen sought a colorable pretext for those executions, he was at the same time shocked at some of the principles advanced. What said the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. HOLMES,) in a cold address to the committee? Why, that these executions were only a wrong mode of doing a right thing. A wrong mode of doing a right thing! In what code of public law; in what system of ethics; nay, in what respectable novel; where, if the gentleman were to take the range of the whole literature of the world, will he find any sanction for a principle so monstrous? He would illustrate its enormity by a single case. Suppose a man, being guilty of robbery, is tried, condemned, and executed for murder, upon an indictment for that robbery merely. The judge is arraigned for having executed, contrary to law, a human being, innocent at heart of the crime for which he was sentenced. The judge has nothing to do, to insure his own acquittal, but to urge the gentleman's plea, that he had done a right thing in a wrong way!

The principles which attached to the cases of Arbuthnot and Ambrister, constituting them merely participes in the war, supposing them to have been combatants, which the former was not, he having been taken in a Spanish fortress, without arms in his hands, all that we could possibly have a right to do was to apply to them the rules which we had a right to enforce against the Indians. Their English character was only merged in their Indian character. Now, if the law regulating Indian hostilities be established by long and immemorial usage, that we have no moral right to retaliate upon them, we consequently had no right to retaliate upon Arbuthnot and Ambrister. Even if it were admitted that, in regard to future wars, and to other foreigners, their execution may have a good effect, it would not thence follow that you had a right to execute them. It is not always just to do what may be advantageous. And retaliation, during a war, must have relation to the events of that war, and must, to be just, have an operation upon that war, and upon the individuals only who compose the belligerent party. It became gentlemen, then, on the other side, to show, by some known, certain, and recognized rule of public or municipal law, that the execution of these men was justified. Where is it? He should be glad to see it. We are told in a paper, emanating from the Department of State, recently laid before this House, distinguished for the fervor of its eloquence, and of which the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts has supplied us in part with a second edition, in one respect agreeing with the prototype, that they both ought to be inscribed to the American public—we are justly told in that paper, that this is the first instance of the execution of persons for the crime of instigating Indians to war. Sir, there are two topics which, in Europe, are constantly employed by the friends and minions of legitimacy against our country. The one is an inordinate spirit of aggrandizement—of coveting other people's goods. The other is the treatment which we extend to the Indians.—Against both these charges, the public servants, who conducted at Ghent the negotiations with the British Commissioners, endeavored to vindicate our country, and he hoped with some degree of success. What will be the condition of future American negotiators, when pressed upon this head, he knew not, after the unhappy executions on our southern border. The gentleman from Massachusetts seemed on yesterday to read, with a sort of triumph, the names of the Commissioners employed in the negotiations at Ghent. Will he excuse me for saying, that I thought he pronounced, even with more complacency and with a more gracious smile, the first name in the commission, that he emphasized that of the humble individual who addresses you. [Mr. HOLMES desired to explain.] Mr. C. said there was no occasion for explanation; he was perfectly satisfied. [Mr. H. however proceeded to say that his intention was, in pronouncing the gentleman's name, to add to the respect due to the negotiator that which was due to the Speaker of this House.] Will the principle of these men, having been instigators of the war, justify their execution? It was a new one; there were no landmarks to guide us in its adoption, or to prescribe limits in its application. If William Pitt had been taken by the French army, during the late European war, could France have justifiably executed him, on the ground of his having notoriously instigated the continental powers to war against France? Would France, if she had stained her character by executing him, have obtained the sanction of the world to the act, by appeals to the passions and prejudices, by pointing to the cities sacked, the countries laid waste, the human lives sacrificed in the wars which he had kindled, and by exclaiming to the unfortunate captive, you miscreant, you monster, have occasioned all these scenes of devastation and blood? What had been the conduct even of England towards the greatest instigator of all the wars of the present age? The condemnation of that illustrious man to the rock of St. Helena, was a great blot on the English name. And Mr. C. repeated, what he had once before said, that if Chatham or Fox, or even William Pitt himself, had been Prime Minister, in England, Bonaparte never had been so condemned. On that transaction history will one day pass its severe but just censure. Yes, although Napoleon had desolated half Europe; although there was scarcely a power, however humble, that escaped the mighty grasp of his ambition; although in the course of his splendid career he is charged with having committed the greatest atrocities, disgraceful to himself and to human nature, yet even his life has been spared. The allies would not, England would not, execute him, upon the ground of his being an instigator of wars.

The mode of the trial and sentencing these men, Mr. C. said, was equally objectionable with the principles on which it had been attempted to show a forfeiture of their lives. He knew, he said, the laudable spirit which prompted the ingenuity displayed in finding out a justification for these proceedings. He wished most sincerely that he could reconcile them to his conscience. It had been attempted to vindicate the General upon grounds which he was persuaded he would himself disown. It had been asserted that he was guilty of a mistake in calling upon the court to try them, and that he might have at once ordered their execution without that formality. He denied that there was any such absolute right in the commander of any portion of our Army. The rightof retaliation is an attribute of sovereignty. It is comprehended in the war-making power that Congress possesses. It belongs to this body not only to declare war, but to raise armies, and to make rules and regulations for their Government. It was in vain for gentlemen to look to the law of nations for instances in which retaliation is lawful. The laws of nations merely laid down the principle or rule, and it belongs to the Government to constitute the tribunal for applying that principle or rule. There was, for example, no instance in which the death of a captive was more certainly declared by the law of nations to be justifiable than in the case of spies. Congress has accordingly provided, in the rules and articles of war, a tribunal for the trial of spies, and consequently for the application of the principle of the national law. The Legislature had not left the power over spies undefined, to the mere discretion of the commander-in-chief, or of any subaltern officer in the Army. For, if the doctrines now contended for were true, they would apply to the commander of any corps, however small, acting as a detachment. Suppose Congress had not legislated in the case of spies, what would have been their condition? It would have been a casus omissus, and although the public law pronounced their doom, it could not be executed because Congress had assigned no tribunal for enforcing that public law. No man could be executed in this free country without two things being shown: 1st. That the law condemns him to death; and, 2dly. That his death is pronounced by that tribunal which is authorized by the law to try him. These principles would reach every man's case, native or foreigner, citizen or alien. The instant quarters are granted to a prisoner, the majesty of the law surrounds and sustains him, and he cannot lawfully be punished with death, without the concurrence of the two circumstances just insisted upon. He denied that any commander-in-chief, in this country, had this absolute power of life and death, at his sole discretion. It was contrary to the genius of all our laws and institutions. To concentrate in the person of one individual the powers to make the rule, to judge, and to execute the rule, or to judge and execute the rule only, was utterly irreconcilable with every principle of free Government, and was the very definition of tyranny itself; and he trusted that this House would never give even a tacit assent to such a principle. Suppose the commander had made reprisals on property, would that property have belonged to the nation, or could he have disposed of it as he pleased? Had he more power, would gentlemen tell him, over the lives of human beings than over property? The assertion of such a power to the commander-in-chief was contrary to the practice of the Government. By an act of Congress which passed in 1799, "vesting the power of retaliation, in certain cases, in the President of the United States"—an act which passed during the quasi war with France, the President is authorized to retaliate upon any citizens of the French Republic, the enormities which may be practised, in certain cases, upon our citizens. Under what Administration was this act passed? It was under that which has been justly charged with stretching the constitution to enlarge the Executive powers. Even during the mad career of Mr. Adams, when every means was resorted to for the purpose of infusing vigor into the Executive arm, no one thought of claiming for him the inherent right of retaliation. He would not trouble the House with reading another law, which passed thirteen or fourteen years after, during the late war with Great Britain, under the Administration of that great constitutional President, the father of the instrument itself, by which Mr. Madison was empowered to retaliate on the British, in certain instances. It was not only contrary to the genius of our institutions and to the uniform practice of the Government, but it was contrary to the obvious principles on which the General himself had proceeded; for, in forming the court, he had evidently intended to proceed under the rules and articles of war. The extreme number which they provide for is thirteen, precisely that which is detailed in the present instance. The court proceeded, not by a bare plurality, but by a majority of two-thirds. In the general orders issued from the Adjutant General's office, at headquarters, it is described as a court-martial. The prisoners are said in those orders to have been tried, "on the following charges and specifications." The court understood itself to be acting as a court-martial. It was so organized; it so proceeded, having a judge advocate, hearing witnesses, the written defence of the miserable trembling prisoners, who seemed to have a presentiment of their doom. And the court was finally dissolved. The whole proceeding manifestly shows that all parties considered it as a court-martial, convened and acting under the rules and articles of war. In his letter to the Secretary of War, noticing the transaction, the General says: "These individuals were tried under my orders, legally convicted as exciters of this savage and negro war, legally condemned, and most justly punished for their iniquities." The Lord deliver us from such legal convictions and such legal condemnations! The General himself considered the laws of his country to have justified his proceedings. It was in vain, then, to talk of a power in him beyond the law, and above the law, when he himself does not assert it. Let it be conceded that he was clothed with absolute authority over the lives of these individuals, and that, upon his own fiat, without trial, without defence, he might have commanded their execution. Now, if an absolute sovereign, in any particular respect, promulgates a rule which he pledges himself to observe, if he subsequently deviates from that rule, he subjects himself to the imputation of odious tyranny. If General Jackson had the power, without a court, to condemn these men, he had also the power to appoint a tribunal. He did appoint a tribunal, and he became, therefore, morally bound to observe and execute the sentence of that tribunal. In regard to Ambrister, it was with grief and pain he was compelled to say, that he was executed in defiance of all law; in defiance of the law to which General Jackson had voluntarily, if you please, submitted himself, and given, by his appeal to the court, his implied pledge to observe. He knew but little of military law, and he had not a taste, by what had happened, created in him for acquiring a knowledge of more; but he believed there was no example on record where the sentence of the court has been erased, and a sentence not pronounced by it carried into execution. It had been suggested that the court had pronounced two sentences, and that the General had a right to select either. Two sentences! Two verdicts! It was not so. The first, by being revoked, was as though it had never been pronounced. And there remained only one sentence, which was put aside upon the sole authority of the commander, and the execution of the prisoner ordered. He either had or had not a right to decide upon the fate of that man without the intervention of a court. If he had the right, he waived it, and having violated the sentence of the court, there was brought upon the judicial administration of the Army a reproach, which must occasion the most lasting regret.

Of all the powers conferred by the Constitution of the United States, not one is more expressly and exclusively granted than that is to Congress of declaring war. The immortal convention who framed that instrument had abundant reasons for confiding this tremendous power to the deliberate judgment of the Representatives of the people, drawn from every page of history. It was there seen that nations are often precipitated into ruinous war from folly, from pride, from ambition, and from the desire of military fame. It was believed, no doubt, in committing this great subject to the Legislature of the Union, we should be safe from the mad wars that have afflicted and desolated and ruined other countries. It was supposed that before any war was declared the nature of the injury complained of would be carefully examined, the power and resources of the enemy estimated, and the power and resources of our own country, as well as the probable issue and consequences of the war. It was to guard our country against precisely that species of rashness, which has been manifested in Florida, that the constitution was so framed. If then this power, thus cautiously and clearly bestowed upon Congress, has been assumed and exercised by any other functionary of the Government, it is cause of serious alarm, and it became that body to vindicate and maintain its authority by all the means in its power, and yet there are some gentlemen who would have us not merely to yield a tame and silent acquiescence in the encroachment, but to pass even a vote of thanks to the author.

On the 25th of March, 1818, Mr. C. continued, the President of the United States communicated a Message to Congress in relation to the Seminole war, in which he declared that, although in the prosecution of it, orders had been given to pass into the Spanish territory, they were so guarded as that the local authorities of Spain should be respected. How respected? The President, by the documents accompanying the Message, the orders themselves which issued from the Department of War to the commanding General, had assured the Legislature that, even if the enemy should take shelter under a Spanish fortress, the fortress was not to be attacked, but the fact to be reported to that department for further orders. Congress saw, therefore, that there was no danger of violating the existing peace. And yet, on the same 25th day of March, (a most singular concurrence of dates,) when the Representatives of the people receive this solemn Message, announced in the presence of the nation and in the face of the world, and in the midst of a friendly negotiation with Spain, does General Jackson write from his headquarters that he shall take St. Marks as a necessary depot for his military operations! The General states, in his letter, what he had heard about the threat on the part of the Indians and negroes, to occupy the fort, and declares his purpose to possess himself of it in either of the two contingencies of its being in their hands or in the hands of the Spaniards. He assumed a right to judge what Spain was bound to do by her treaty, and judged very correctly; but then he also assumed the power, belonging to Congress alone, of determining what should be the effect and consequence of her breach of engagement. General Jackson generally performs what he intimates his intention to do. Accordingly, finding St. Marks yet in the hands of the Spaniards, he seized and occupied it. Was ever, he asked, the just confidence of the legislative body, in the assurances of the Chief Magistrate, more abused? The Spanish commander intimated his willingness that the American army should take post near him, until he could have instructions from his superior officer, and promised to maintain, in the mean time, the most friendly relations. No! St. Marks was a convenient post for the American army, and delay was inadmissible. He had always understood that the Indians but rarely take or defend fortresses, because they are unskilled in the modes of attack and defence. The threat, therefore, on their part, to seize on St. Marks, must have been empty, and would probably have been impracticable. At all events, when General Jackson arrived there, no danger any longer threatened the Spaniards from the miserable fugitive Indians, who fled on all sides upon his approach.

On the 8th of April the General writes from St. Marks that he shall march for the Suwaney River; the destroying of the establishments on which will, in his opinion, bring the war to a close. Accordingly having effected that object, he writes on the 20th of April that he believes he may say the war is at an end for the present. He repeats the same opinion in his letter to the Secretary of War, written six days after. The war being thus ended, it might have been hoped that no further hostilities would have been committed. But, on the 23d of May, on his way home, he receives a letter from the commandant of Pensacola, intimating his surprise at the invasion of the Spanish territory, and the acts of hostility performed by the American army, and his determination, if persisted in, to employ force to repel them. Let us pause and examine this proceeding of the Governor, so very hostile and affrontive in the view of General Jackson. Recollect that he was Governor of Florida; that he had received no orders from his superiors to allow a passage to the American army; that he had heard of the reduction of St. Marks; and that General Jackson, at the head of his army, was approaching in the direction of Pensacola. He had seen the President's Message of the 25th of March, and reminded General Jackson of it, to satisfy him that the American Government could not have authorized all those measures. Mr. C. said he could not read the allusion made by the Governor to that Message, without feeling that the charge of insincerity which it implied had at least but too much the appearance of truth in it. Could the Governor have done less than write some such letter? We have only to reverse situations, and to suppose him to have been an American Governor. General Jackson says, that when he received that letter, he no longer hesitated. No, sir, he did no longer hesitate. He received it on the 23d; he was in Pensacola on the 24th, and immediately after set himself before the fortress San Carlos de Barancas, which he shortly reduced. Veni, vidi, vici. Wonderful energy! Admirable promptitute! Alas! that it had not been an energy and a promptitude within the pale of the constitution, and according to the orders of the Chief Magistrate! It was impossible to give any definition of war that would not comprehend these acts. It was open, undisguised, and unauthorized hostility.

He would not trespass much longer upon the time of the committee; but he trusted he should be indulged with some few reflections upon the danger of permitting the conduct, on which it had been his painful duty to animadvert, to pass, without a solemn expression of this House. Recall to your recollection, said he, the free nations which have gone before us. Where are they now, and how have they lost their liberties? If we could transport ourselves back to the ages when Greece and Rome flourished in their greatest prosperity, and, mingling in the throng, ask a Grecian if he did not fear some daring military chieftain, covered with glory, some Philip or Alexander, would one day overthrow his liberties? No! no! the confident and indignant Grecian would exclaim, we have nothing to fear from our heroes; our liberties will be eternal. If a Roman citizen had been asked, if he did not fear the conqueror of Gaul might establish a throne upon the ruins of the public liberty, he would have instantly repelled the unjust insinuation. Yet Greece had fallen, Cæsar had passed the Rubicon, and the patriotic arm even of Brutus, could not preserve the liberties of his country! The celebrated Madame de Stael, in her last and perhaps best work, has said, that in the very year, almost the very month, when the President of the Directory declared that monarchy would never more show its frightful head in France, Bonaparte, with his grenadiers, entered the palace of St. Cloud, and, dispersing with the bayonet the deputies of the people, deliberating on the affairs of the State, laid the foundations of that vast fabric of despotism which overshadowed all Europe. He hoped not to be misunderstood; he was far from intimating that General Jackson cherished any designs inimical to the liberties of the country. He believed his intentions pure and patriotic. He thanked God that he would not, but he thanked him still more that he could not, if he would, overturn the liberties of the Republic. But precedents, if bad, were fraught with the most dangerous consequences. Man has been described, by some of those who have treated of his nature, as a bundle of habits. The definition was much truer when applied to Governments. Precedents were their habits. There was one important difference between the formation of habits by an individual and by Governments. He contracts it only after frequent repetition. A single instance fixes the habit and determines the direction of Governments. Against the alarming doctrine of unlimited discretion in our military commanders, when applied even to prisoners of war, he must enter his protest; it began upon them, it would end on us. He hoped that our happy form of Government was destined to be perpetual. But if it were to be preserved, it must be by the practice of virtue, by justice, by moderation, by magnanimity, by greatness of soul, by keeping a watchful and steady eye on the Executive; and, above all, by holding to a strict accountability the military branch of the public force.

We are fighting, said Mr. C., a great moral battle for the benefit, not only of our country, but of all mankind. The eyes of the whole world are in fixed attention upon us. One, and the largest portion of it, is gazing with contempt, with jealousy, and with envy; the other portion, with hope, with confidence, and with affection. Everywhere the black cloud of legitimacy is suspended over the world, save only one bright spot, which breaks out from the political hemisphere of the West, to brighten, and animate, and gladden the human heart. Obscure that by the downfall of liberty here, and all mankind are enshrouded in one universal darkness. To you, Mr. Chairman, belongs the high privilege of transmitting unimpaired, to posterity, the fair character and the liberty of our country. Do you expect to execute this high trust by trampling, or suffering to be trampled down, law, justice, the constitution, and the rights of other people? By exhibiting examples of inhumanity, and cruelty, and ambition? When the minions of despotism heard in Europe of the seizure of Pensacola, how did they chuckle, and chide the admirers of our institutions, tauntingly pointing to the demonstration of a spirit of injustice and aggrandizement made by our country, in the midst of amicable negotiation. Behold, said they, the conduct of those who are constantly reproaching Kings. You saw how those admirers were astounded and hung their heads. You saw, too, when that illustrious man, who presides over us, adopted his pacific, moderate, and just course, how they once more lifted up their heads, with exultation and delight beaming in their countenances. And you saw how those minions themselves were finally compelled to unite in the general praises bestowed upon our Government. Beware how you forfeit this exalted character. Beware how you give a fatal sanction, in this infant period of our Republic, scarcely yet two score years old, to military insubordination. Remember that Greece had her Alexander, Rome had her Cæsar, England her Cromwell, France her Bonaparte, and that, if we would escape the rock on which they split, we must avoid their errors.

How different has been the treatment of General Jackson, and that modest, but heroic young man, a native of one of the smallest States in the Union, who achieved for his country, on Lake Erie, one of the most glorious victories of the late war. In a moment of passion he forgot himself, and offered an act of violence, which was repented as soon as perpetrated. He was tried, and suffered the judgment pronounced by his peers. Public justice was thought not even then to be satisfied. The press and Congress took up the subject. My honorable friend from Virginia, (Mr. JOHNSON,) the faithful and consistent sentinel of the law and of the constitution, disapproved, in that instance, as he does in this, and moved an inquiry. The public mind remained agitated and unappeased until the recent atonement, so honorably made by the gallant Commodore. And was there to be a distinction between the officers of the two branches of the public service? Are former services, however eminent, to protect from even inquiring into recent misconduct? Is there to be no limit, no prudential bounds to the national gratitude? He was not disposed to censure the President for not ordering a court of inquiry or a general court-martial. Perhaps impelled by a sense of that gratitude, he determined by anticipation, to extend to the General that pardon which he had the undoubted right to grant after sentence. Let us, said Mr. C., not shrink from our duty. Let us assert our constitutional powers, and vindicate the instrument from military violation.

He hoped gentlemen would deliberately survey the awful position on which we stand. They may bear down all opposition; they may even vote the General the public thanks; they may carry him triumphantly through this House. But, if they do, in my humble judgment, it will be a triumph of the principle of insubordination—a triumph of the military over the civil authority—a triumph over the powers of this House—a triumph over the constitution of the land. And he prayed most devoutly to Heaven, that it might not prove, in its ultimate effects and consequences, a triumph over the liberties of the people.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, rose immediately after Mr. CLAY. He felt himself called on, having been a member of the committee which had had this subject under consideration, and as one of the minority on the report made by it, to express his views of the questions involved in the report, and in the propositions moved by way of amendment to it. Without further preface, he proceeded to state that the conduct of General Jackson, in regard to the trial and execution of Arbuthnot and Ambrister, had been the subject of censure, from a misconception of the law and of the facts connected with it; and, particularly, by confounding two principles of the laws of nations, which were in themselves separate and distinct. The general order directing the execution of these men asserted, that the subject of any nation, making war upon a nation at peace with that to which he belongs, is an outlaw and a pirate; and Mr. J. said it was correctly asserted. And the very same page of Vattel, on which gentlemen relied for the support of their doctrine, would bear him out in that for which he contended, and with which gentlemen had confounded one entirely different That, where persons have joined the standard of a belligerent, they may claim the character and privileges of the belligerent party, was a principle of public law, was not to be denied; but if an individual takes upon himself to create and carry on a war, without authority from any Government, it was a principle equally undeniable that he is an outlaw and a pirate—not that he is either technically, but that, in fact and by analogy, he is so to be regarded. It is an established principle of public law, that the crew of any vessel, engaging in war without the authority of any commission, may be treated as pirates, and put to the sword. If, on the land, the like course be pursued, he who is guilty of it is an outlaw and a bandit, and may be put to the sword. This was one principle of public law, and that which gentlemen had triumphantly asserted (and which nobody denied) was a wholly different one; both not only clearly supported by the authority of Vattel, but in the same page of that respected and excellent writer.

Mr. J. said he would venture to say that every ground taken by that man whose valor and conduct on the memorable eighth day of January, in the darkest period of the late war, had caused joy to beam from every face, would be found tenable on principles which have prevailed from the commencement of civilization to the present day. He pledged himself to produce chapter and verse to support his conduct in every incident of that war. He considered the essential interests of justice and of mercy to have been served in the execution of the foreign incendiaries who stimulated the Indians to barbarities on our frontier settlers; and that the military occupation of Florida by General Jackson was justifiable on the broad basis of national law, and of sacred duty to his country. When gentlemen undertook to say, that General Jackson had not the right of retaliation, let them recollect the case of proposed retaliation, during the Revolutionary war, for the barbarous murder of Captain Huddie. And on whom of the prisoners in our power did the lot fall? Not on a miserable interloper, but on Captain Asgill, an amiable and accomplished officer. What then said the Congress of the United States—that venerable and enlightened body which carried us through the Revolutionary conflict? What did they say? Why, sir, not only that the Commander-in-chief, but that every officer on separate command, possessed the right of retaliation, and that they would support him in the exercise of it. It was true that Asgill was released, for reasons of policy; but the right of retaliation was fully sustained. Four months, Mr. J. said, after the first blood was spilt in the Revolution, at the battle of Lexington, and two months after the memorable battle of Bunker Hill, which shed such a lustre upon our arms, and nearly a year before the Declaration of Independence, this question of the right of retaliation was solemnly discussed and settled in the correspondence between General Washington and General Gage; in which the former broadly asserted the right of retaliation, and declared that he should be governed by it. In order to take from our commanding General this right at the present day, Mr. J. said, gentlemen had again blended and confounded principles of the laws of nations, which in themselves were entirely distinct. In case of individuals in an army violating the laws of nations, and the known rules of war, it is a clear principle that they may be punished with death; and it was a principle equally clear, that in contending with a savage foe, you are at liberty to retaliate on them their own usages. But gentlemen had blended these powers and rights with the right of reprisal; and had confounded the power of putting to instant death a captive—a right inherent in the military power with which we have clothed the commander, and the exercise of which is a question between himself and his God.

I rejoice, said Mr. J., that the honorable gentleman who last addressed you, has expressed his opinion, that the intentions of General Jack son, in what he has done, were good. I rejoice in it, sir, from my respect for that gentleman, whose opinion has with me more weight than that of any other individual; but this is a case in which the obstinacy of nature will not permit me to surrender my opinion to any individual whatever.

It had been denied that any example could be produced of military execution, at the fiat of the commanding General, in our country. Mr. J. said he would give an instance, in which two individuals were put to death by General Washington. Being given up by the revolted State line of Pennsylvania, as emissaries, sent by General Carlton, these men were instantly executed. For this fact, Mr. J. referred gentlemen to the Annual Register, which now lay open before him.

It had been stated, that the crimes for which these men were executed, were offences not recognized by the laws of the United States. Mr. J. denied the fact, and in doing so meant offence to no one. These miscreants, who had imbrued their hands in the blood of our countrymen—the instigators of the murders, the fruits of which were three hundred scalps in one place, and in another, althongh, according to the documents read by the Speaker, it would appear that the Indians were three murders in arrear of us—these individuals had been condemned and executed in conformity to the letter, if not to the spirit, of the laws of the United States. According to our rules and articles of war, whoever should relieve the enemy with money, victuals, or ammunition, or should knowingly harbor or protect them, or hold correspondence with the enemy, were subjected to death. So far the rule as to our army, which, by subsequent articles, was made so broad as to apply to the whole human family. But, if there was, on this point, any defect of power, here came in the law of nations to supply the deficiency; for that which subjects to death one of our own citizens, shall much more subject to death the foreign incendiary. Examples, in illustration of this doctrine, were plentifully scattered on the page of history. What was the fact, said he, as to the trial of the distinguished officer who was Adjutant-General of the British forces, during the Revolution? He was convicted on his own confession and by a court composed of six major-generals and eight brigadier-generals. General Jackson, Mr. J. said, was only following in the steps of those who had gone before. He was not here, he said, about to maintain that General Jackson was faultless; if he had no faults, he would not be human—but he stood here to maintain his devotion to his country; and that, in the course he had pursued in the trial and execution of Arbuthnot and Ambrister, he had only trodden in the footsteps of the immortal Washington.

As to the execution of the two Indian warriors, by the exercise of a summary jurisdiction over them, and the distinction made between their case and that of the white men, the reason was obvious to every man who had ears and would hear, or who had eyes and would see. In relation to the Indian chiefs, their color was sufficient evidence of their subjection to his right of disposing of them as justice required. The law of nations clothed him with the power to put an end to their existence. As to the stratagem of which gentlemen had complained, no one was less disposed than himself to look with a favorable eye on such stratagems as were contrary to morality. But there was no immorality in hoisting the flag of a foreign power, nor in capturing the person of your enemy when he unwarily puts himself in your power. Nor, in what had been done in relation to these Indians, was there any violation of humanity or of public law. Do they meet us in honorable combat? said Mr. J. In the case of the unfortunate Mrs. Garret, did they meet us in honorable conflict there? When they burnt the seaman alive, whom they had previously tarred and feathered, did they meet us in open combat? Was the war one in which Greek met Greek, or an American met the citizen or subject of any civilized nation? If it were, the course of Gen. Jackson, so far from receiving approbation, would deserve execration. But, considering the treacherous enemy he had to cope with, and the object of his measures, which was to give security to the frontier, and to save the wasteful expenditure of the blood, and even of the treasure of the nation; when I think on this, said Mr. J., I do not censure General Jackson, but, as before my God, I give him my thanks. But for his energy what would have been the consequence? The frontier of Georgia would have been deluged with blood, as it has been once before, and the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. COBB) would again have called upon us, with a voice of patriotism, and a voice of thunder, too, to pay the gallant Georgians for going against the Seminoles.

With regard to the treaty of Fort Jackson, Mr. J. said, he should enter into no long argument, but he differed exceedingly from his honorable colleague. Have we not a right, said he, to dictate terms to a conquered enemy? Was not the war which was terminated by that treaty an unprovoked war? Was it not instigated against us, and without cause, on the part of the Indians? On whose head should the blood fall, if you cannot control the Indians with the Bible? I wish to God you could, said Mr. J., and towards that object I will do, and have done, as much in my sphere as any one. There is at this moment, in the heart of my country, a school for the education of the Indians in the arts of civil life. But when you come into contact with them—when they flourish their tomahawk over your head—are you to meet them with the Bible in your hands, and invoke their obedience of that holy religion of which the Speaker tells us? I should be the last to raise the sword against them, if the employment of such means would appease their fury. Experience had shown it would not; and it became necessary to meet and chastise them.

And would any man say that, having put down their hostility by force, we had not a right to dictate to them the terms of peace? We had the right, and we made the treaty. That treaty received the sanction of every part of the Government—this House among them—(by the appropriation to carry it into effect) and it was too late now to disturb it.

As to the war, the constitutionality of which had been doubted, Mr. J. said, the President of the United States was not only authorized, but it was his bounden duty to make war on the Seminole Indians. Admit, for the sake of argument, that, beyond our boundary, they were to be considered as exercising a sovereign and independent authority, what would gentlemen gain by that admission? If it were true, had we not a right to trace them to their strongholds, even in a neutral country? On that point the expositors of the laws of nations were not silent. It was there laid down, that you may pursue a retreating enemy into a neutral country, if the Government of that country, either from partiality to him, or from inability to prevent it, shall not stop the progress of the retreating army.

Now, as to another point which, perhaps, considering it as too delicate, the Military Committee had not thought proper to approach. Mr. J. said he should be deterred by no such motive from examining the question of the power of the President to prosecute this Indian war, and from censuring him, if, in doing so, he usurped power or exceeded his duty. As early as the year 1787, the Congress had authorized the stationing of troops on the frontier, to protect it from the Indians, and the calling out of the militia for the same purpose. And this power had been acted on, from year to year, until the law of 1795 settled the point conclusively that, without a declaration of war by Congress, the President had the right to make war upon the savages: or, in the words of the law, on the Indian tribes. Let us, said Mr. J., look at our own powers—and how we have discharged them—instead of attempting to divest other branches of the government of their powers. What was our duty? To provide for calling out the militia—for what? To execute the laws, to suppress insurrection, and to repel invasion. It was on that principle that the power was granted to the Executive of this country to chastise the ruthless savages for individual murders, or for murders committed with their combined force. Has the President, then, said Mr. J., violated his authority? Certainly not. And if you take from him this authority, which he has so rightfully exercised, what is to become of our citizens on the frontiers? The heart of our country might be penetrated, and the savages besiege our very doors, while we are making long speeches about the policy and humanity of repressing their hostilities. Had such been the case in the recent instance, either from a defect in the law or in the execution of the law, the people would have said, our Government is a rope of sand, and the blood and treasure spent in its establishment have been lavished in vain. According to the first word of military command, a little varied, it is made the duty of the Executive to take care that the laws of the Union are executed, and that invasion is repelled; and for this purpose he may use the regular or militia force of the country. Would it not be an invasion to have our helpless women, and the infant descendants of those who have fought our battles, butchered by the indiscriminate tomahawk and scalping-knife? And would it not be a violation of the laws of the country to permit the hands of the Indian to be imbrued in the blood of our citizens?

Mr. J. then proceeded to touch upon the opinion of his honorable friend and colleague—for whom he felt not only friendship, but affection—that these incendiaries were put to death without necessity. He argued that, though after destroying Mickasuky and burning the Suwaney towns, General Jackson thought the war was at an end, he was afterwards convinced he had been mistaken; so much so, that he had found it necessary afterwards to go to Pensacola, and to leave two companies to scour the country around it, who were now fighting gallantly against the savages, who would have deluged the country in blood but for these measures. It was kind, if not just, to General Jackson, to take the reasons which he himself assigned as the ground of his measures. He stood before this House not only as a great captain, but as a man of sound sense and discretion. Gentlemen had said the war was at an end, But how many of the enemy had been killed? Look to the fact, in relation to the power of the enemy. They yet existed, when the sentence of death was carried into effect against Arbuthnot and Ambrister, in a force of greater amount than that which General Jackson had with him. Look at the communication of Arbuthnot, stating their force to be three thousand five hundred men; suppose these instigators of the war had been suffered to remain and go at large; suppose the benign influence of mercy, in the breast of this honorable and respectable court-martial, had weighed down the scale of justice, and these men had been discharged, what would have been the situation of the frontier of Georgia? Would it not have been the same as during the British war? These ignorant savages were deluded by their abettors into a belief that they were competent to cope with the forces of the United States. Of the twelve chiefs who signed the power of attorney to Arbuthnot, though two had been hung, there yet remained ten, and three thousand men who formed their command, to make battle against our forces under the instigation of the miscreants who had before stimulated them to war against us, and to their own ultimate ruin.

THURSDAY, January 21.

Seminole War.

Mr. JOHNSON resumed the speech which was interrupted by yesterday's adjournment.

He had already stated, he said, that General Jackson displayed more knowledge in the wilds of Florida, on this subject, than any member who had taken part in this discussion; and that gentlemen had blended two principles in the laws of nations together, the distinction between which General Jackson had seen and observed. The one was the case of volunteers entering a foreign service, for the purpose of improving themselves in the use of arms and the knowledge of the art of war—which case is thus stated in Vattel, p. 401, sec. 230:—"The noble view of gaining instruction in the art of war, and thus acquiring a greater degree of ability to render useful services to their country, has introduced the custom of serving as volunteers even in foreign armies; and the practice is undoubtedly justified by the sublimity of the motive. At present, volunteers, when taken by the enemy, are treated as if they belonged to the army in which they fight. Nothing can be more reasonable; they, in fact, join that army, and unite with it in supporting the same cause; and it makes little difference in the case whether they do this in compliance with any obligation, or at the spontaneous impulse of their own free choice." Such was the case of Kosciusko, of Lafayette, and the other illustrious foreigners who entered our armies during the Revolution, who were volunteers in the best of causes, but whose rights would not have been lessened had the cause been that of despotism and tyranny, instead of that of freedom and independence. But this case was widely different from that of interlopers, exciters of wars, and enemies of the human race, who might be hung up, and ought to be, by military law, as so many robbers and pirates. In the course pursued by General Jackson, then, and in his doctrine to which exception has been taken, he is even more than borne out by writers on the laws of nations, as Mr. J. showed by the following references: Vattel, p. 400, sec. 226.—"Even after a declaration of war between two nations, if the peasants of themselves commit any hostilities, the enemy shows them no mercy, but hangs them up as he would so many robbers or banditti. The crews of private ships of war stand in the same predicament: a commission from the sovereign or admiral can alone, in case they are captured, insure them such treatment as is given to prisoners taken in regular warfare." Martens, p. 272, b. 8.—"The violences committed by the subjects of one nation against those of another, without authority from their sovereign, are now looked upon as robberies, and the perpetrators are excluded from the rights of lawful enemies." Page 280.—"Those not authorized from their sovereign, who take upon themselves to attack the enemy, are treated by him as banditti." Page 284. "Those who, unauthorized by the order of their sovereign, exercise violences against our enemy, and fall into that enemy's hands, have no right to expect the treatment due to prisoners of war: the enemy is justifiable in putting them to death as banditti." The evidence before the court sufficiently established the facts on which, under the above passages of the law of nations, General Jackson was authorized, if not bound to proceed.

Was it supposed by gentlemen, Mr. J. asked, that General Jackson was so ignorant of the language of his country that he did not understand the meaning of the words "pirate and outlaw?" An outlaw the convict certainly was, as out of the protection of the sovereignty of Great Britain or of any other nation. In relation to the term "pirate," it had no other meaning than its technical one: there were pirates on land as well as on the ocean. We are not here, said Mr. J., to inquire whether General Jackson used technical terms, but whether he did substantially or legally right. While we are searching our law books and libraries for our definitions, I hope we shall not lose sight of the difference between our situation and that of the General while in the field; while our heads repose on downy pillows, and we can rise up and lie down when we please, he had an object to accomplish, at every hazard, and at every cost, which he could not have attained if he had not acted as he did. Would you rather, said Mr. J., that these men were living and the country deluged in blood, or that those men should have suffered according to their deserts? These men had been guilty of that for which one of our own citizens would have been put to death; and they were properly as well as legally put to death, in pursuance of General Jackson's object, which was, according to his instructions, to put a speedy and effectual end to hostilities so unprovoked. These men, living, said Mr. J., the tomahawk and scalping-knife would have been sharpened anew, and other emissaries would have derived encouragement from their impunity. Answer me this, Mr. Chairman—had you rather that the Mississippi and its various waters, the country to the Lakes, and beyond them to the North Pole, should have been jeopardized, that New Orleans should have passed from your power into the hands of the British during the late war, or that martial law should have been there established for a short time? For even that is now brought into view, which contributed so much to the glory as well as safety and honor of the country. If a man did not present himself in the attitude of suspicion, martial law did not affect him. I presume, sir, at least I hope, had I been there, I should have had no reason to dislike it. I have no particular respect for that desire of locomotion which could not bear to be restrained within certain bounds when the veterans of Wellington were to be met by the raw men of Kentucky and of Tennessee: I do not like that delicate fastidiousness of martial law, when the enemy is knocking at the gate. All men worthy of their country would make the sacrifice required of them on such occasions. If, for want of proper energy on the part of the commanding general, New Orleans had fallen into the possession of our enemy, what would have befallen the inhabitants, independently of the sacrifice of property and life? Beauty and booty was the watchword of the enemy. Had you rather, sir, that the enemy had succeeded in his object, or that this patriot should have put military law in force? As to the General, whose conduct I am proud to vindicate, said Mr. J., I consider him in the grave as to ambition—if he ever had any—which I never saw in him, except the ambition to serve his country. I do not speak of him because he is living, and that I ever expect to see again those eyes that never winked at danger when he was called upon to meet it. He has added to the military glory of his country more, perhaps, than any other living citizen; and, in the view of all statesmen and all writers on national law, the glory of a nation constitutes one of its greatest bulwarks of strength.

I now come, said he, to the consideration of the right of the President to make war on the savages; and on that point I contend that we have on the statute-book a perpetual declaration of war against them. I hope gentlemen will take down the expression, and attend to my explanation—I say we have a permanent and everlasting declaration of war—and why? The reason is very obvious. I shall not differ from gentlemen as to the policy and justice of observing the duties of humanity towards that unfortunate people. God forbid that a drop of Indian blood should be spilt except on the principles of civilized man. But the President would be wanting in his duty to his country, and to his God, if he did not use the strong arm of power in putting down the savages by the force he is authorized to employ, if they cannot be put down by the precepts of our holy religion; and Congress, had they not passed such a statute, would be wanting in duty to their country. Do the Indians ever declare war against their enemy? Do they embody themselves and engage in open conflict with their adversary, or do they come, like a thief in the night, and carry death to the unfortunate women, to the aged and infirm men, and the children whom they meet in their incursions? Is or is not that the universal practice? Let history answer the question. Should we, under these circumstances, have acted rightly, to take no precaution, but fold our arms in listless apathy, until roused by the Indian yell? Our predecessors too well knew their duty to do that. As early as 1787, and farther back if it were necessary to trace, provisions of the same nature as those now existing, were enacted by the venerable Congress of the Confederation. By various statutes the same provisions had been continued to the present day. The statute gave to the President a discretionary power to employ the forces of the United States, and to call forth the militia to repress Indian hostility; and gave it to him properly, on the principles of the constitution. By the constitution, the President is made Commander-in-chief of the Army; and it is made his duty to take care that the laws are executed, to suppress insurrections and repel invasions; and, by the same instrument, it is made our duty to provide for calling forth the militia to be employed in these objects. That power has been exercised in the manner which will be shown by the law of the United States. [Mr. J. here requested the clerk to read the statute to which he alluded;* and it was read accordingly.] Now, Mr. J. said, he thought this was a declaration of war of at least equal dignity to the manner in which the savages make war against us, and to the light in which we view them. We treat them, it is true, and we ought to treat them, with humanity; we have given them privileges beyond all other nations; but we reserve the right to repel their invasions, and to put to death murderers and violators of our peace, whether Indians or white men.

Mr. SMYTH, of Virginia, addressed the Chair. I promised, said he, when the House received the report of the Military Committee, that I would, when the time for discussing it arrived, attempt to show, that all the proceedings of General Jackson, in prosecuting the Seminole war, were justified by the law of nations. I will proceed to fulfil that promise.

In examining the proceedings of the armed force of the United States in Florida, I propose to make these inquiries: 1. Have the rights of the United States been transcended? 2. Have the constitutional powers of the President been exceeded? 3. Has General Jackson transcended his powers, or violated the laws of nations?

I proceed with the first inquiry: Have the rights of the United States been transcended?

The law of nations, like the common law of the land, is founded on reason and usage. To prove that it is reasonable that a nation should possess a certain right, is to prove that it does possess that right; unless it is shown that the custom and usage of nations is otherwise. We find those customs and usages in treatises compiled by writers on the law of nations.

The right of security, or of self-preservation, is one of the most important, and most unquestionable rights of nations. A nation has a right not to suffer any other to obstruct its preservation. This is one of those rights called perfect rights. The definition of a perfect right is, that it may be asserted by force. It is, therefore, the duty of the Government to preserve the people. "The safety of the people is the first law." And we have a right to do whatever is necessary to the discharge of our duties.

We have a right, by the law of nations, to destroy hostile savages residing within the territorial limits of a neighboring power, but not amenable to the civil laws. A neighboring territory is not to become a safe asylum for banditti, who carry on against us predatory and murderous hostilities. You may not pursue a fugitive from justice on the territory of a neighboring nation: there is no necessity to authorize you to do so. But, if you cannot otherwise deliver yourself from an imminent danger, you may enter the territory of a neighboring power.—(Vattel, page 167.) In short, the Government, being bound to preserve the people, has a right to all the means necessary to preserve the people, whatever they may be. Nothing can dispense with the obligation, and nothing can destroy the right to the means.

* The following was the part of the act passed February 28, 1795, which was read:

SEC. I. That, whenever the United States shall be invaded, or be in imminent danger of invasion, from any foreign nation or Indian tribe, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to call forth such number of the militia of the State or States, most convenient to the place of danger or scene of action, as he may judge necessary to repel such invasion, &c.

The right of necessity, and the right of self-defence, are paramount to all other rights claimed under the law of nations. The inviolability of Ambassadors, and even the inviolability of crowned heads, must yield to the security of nations.

Thus, a conspiracy having been formed in 1717, in England, contrived by the Swedish Ambassador, to invade the country and dethrone the King, the Ambassador was arrested and his papers seized, (Ward, vol. 2, p. 330;) the other foreign Ministers expressed their satisfaction, except the Ambassador from Spain, who observed that he was sorry no other way could be fallen on for preserving the peace of the kingdom. He then assigned a satisfactory reason for adopting the measure; there was no other way of preserving the peace of the kingdom; therefore, the measure was necessary for self-preservation, and consequently lawful.

The Speaker (Mr. CLAY) has questioned the right of the United States to enter the country of the Seminoles in Florida, to suppress them, and put an end to their hostile incursions. It is a strange doctrine that there is no way to put an end to the hostilities of a subject savage community, whose country lies within the territorial limits of a power with which we are at peace, but by declaring war against that power. The law of nations allows you to enter the territory of a neutral power in quest of an enemy, (Vattel, p. 313.) It is even still more reasonable that you should possess the right, when the territory claimed by the neutral power is, in fact, the country, the residence, of your savage enemy, where alone effectual hostilities can be carried on against him.

The right of a sovereign power to exclusive jurisdiction within a territory, is founded on the engagement to govern the inhabitants, and restrain them from injuring other nations. When the Government is no longer able to restrain the inhabitants from injuring other nations, they have an undoubted right to attack such inhabitants, and suppress them, without going to war with that power which has become too feeble to restrain them. Should Buenos Ayres, or the Banda Oriental, having shaken off the authority of Spain, make war on the Brazilians, the latter would seem to have an undoubted right to invade them without going to war with Spain. Should Mexico set at naught the Spanish Government, and make war against the United States, the latter would have a right to invade Mexico without declaring war against Spain. So, in the case under consideration, Spain being unable to restrain the savages of Florida, has no right to complain that the United States have entered that country to restrain them.

The law of nations may be illustrated by cases in municipal law. I may pursue and destroy on your land a noxious animal which I have started on my own. If your house adjacent to mine is on fire, I may enter on your premises, and pull it down, for the preservation of mine. Where the reason is the same, the law is the same.

Such being the right of the United States, by the law of nations, it is proper to inquire, what effect on those rights has been produced by the treaty between the United States and Spain. By that treaty both parties bind themselves "expressly to restrain by force all hostilities on the part of the Indian nations within their boundary; so that Spain will not suffer her Indians to attack the United States."—(Laws, v. 2, p. 266.) Spain, then, is bound to restrain her savage subjects, and is liable to pay all damages that may be sustained by her failure; and should she fail, from inability to suppress them, she is still bound to use all the means in her power, and to furnish all the aid in her power for that purpose. The engagements of a treaty impose a perfect obligation, and give a perfect right; a right which may, if necessary, be asserted by force.—(Vattel, p. 182.) Spain then agrees, and is bound, that the Indians shall be suppressed, and the United States have a right that the Indians shall be suppressed. It is preposterous to contend, that, because Spain is unable to restrain the hostilities of her Indians, that, therefore, they are to remain unrestrained, when Spain has agreed that they shall be restrained, and the United States have a right that they shall be restrained. The consequence of the inability of Spain is, that the United States may use force in restraining the Indians of Spain; and have a right to all the means of effecting that object that Spain can furnish. When the performance of the duties of Spain devolves on the United States, they have a right to the means of performing those duties. Therefore, if the possession of the forts in Florida, is necessary to the suppression and restraint of those savages, the United States have a right to the possession of them.

The law of nations also recognizes the right, arising from necessity, of seizing a place of strength belonging to a neutral power, and putting a garrison into it, either for defending itself against an enemy, or for the purpose of preventing him in his designs of seizing this place, when the neutral government is not able to defend it.—(Vattel, p. 315.) The treaty with Spain certainly neither diminishes nor weakens the rights of the United States. It increases and strengthens them. The object of the article under consideration, is the suppression of the hostile savages. This object is to be, and must be, effected. The two nations have agreed and bound themselves that it shall be effected; and that agreement is as to them a written law of nations.

Our right being established, and the incapacity of Spain to fulfil her obligation notorious, the law of nations allowed the United States, when they could not obtain due satisfaction by amicable means, or foresaw that it would be useless to try such means, to have recourse to forcible means in pursuit of their rights—(Martens, pp. 265, 268.) Indeed, the right claimed by the United States was of such a nature that a specific performance of the agreement to suppress the hostilities of the savages was indispensable. If that could not be performed by Spain, it must be performed by the United States, who would then be entitled to demand of Spain satisfaction for her failure to perform her engagements.

It therefore seems to me that there can be no doubt that the United States had a right to enter Florida in pursuit of the Seminole savages; to possess the means necessary to restrain them—and to restrain them.

The next inquiry that I propose to make is, Have the constitutional powers of the President been exceeded?

An honorable gentleman from Georgia was of opinion that there should have been a declaration of war against the Seminoles. He says, "the war-declaring power has been snatched from Congress." Let me here remark, that I think this objection would have come better from any other quarter than from the State of Georgia, for the safety of whose people this war has been commenced and prosecuted. I would also remark, that this objection would have come better from any other gentleman than him who made it; yet no doubt he made it in obedience to what he now deems his duty.

On examining the journals of the last session, I find, on the third of April, this entry: "On motion of Mr. CONE, resolved that the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of increasing the pay of the militia now in service, or which may hereafter be called into the service of the United States, in the war now prosecuting against the Seminole tribe of Indians." This was ten days after the President had informed the House that the army was authorized to enter Florida. An acknowledgment that war exists, is a declaration of war.* It then appears, that at least the gentleman and this House have declared the war. Another proof that the war was authorized by Congress, is found in the appropriation for the pay of militia employed therein. A third piece of evidence, which will prove satisfactory to the gentleman, is an act passed in pursuance of his resolution, which recognizes "the war against the Seminole tribe of Indians," and is a complete declaration of war by Congress.*

But all this was unnecessary to enable the President to make war against the Seminoles; for a defensive war need not be declared; the state of war being sufficiently determined by the open hostilities of the enemy.† Our war against the Indians is decisive, although carried on in their country, because we suffered the first act of violence.‡ Should Spain commence war against us after the rising of Congress, no doubt the President, with his fleets and armies, would be authorized to fight before the meeting of Congress, and to continue fighting, whether the war was ever declared or not. And we have given to the President a continuing authority to repel invasions by the Indian tribes.§ The act of Congress under which President Washington ordered the Generals St. Clair and Wayne to invade the Indian country, merely authorized him to call out the militia to aid in protecting the frontiers from the hostile invasions of the Indians.‖ The attack by the Indians of Florida being an invasion, the President was authorized to repel it, and in repelling to pursue and effectually to suppress the invaders.

It by no means follows, as some seem to suppose, that because the President cannot declare war, that he can do nothing for the protection of the nation, and the assertion of its rights. The power to declare war, is a power to announce regular war, or war in form, against another power. But it never was intended, by reserving this power to Congress, to take from the President the power to do any act necessary to preserve the nation's rights, and which does not put the nation into a state of war with another power. If Congress, in addition to the power of declaring war, assume to themselves the power of directing every movement of the public force that may touch a neutral; or that may be made for preserving the national rights; or executing the laws and treaties; they will assume powers given to the President by the constitution. A declaration of war against savages is not only unnecessary, but would be highly impolitic. It would be an acknowledgment of their independence; an acknowledgment that they may engage in war in form; that the usages of such a war apply to hostilities with them; and that they are entitled to the treatment of lawful enemies. I contend that there can be no such thing as a war in form between this nation and a tribe of American savages. A war, waged by Indians against the United States, can have no lawful object. The only object of such a war must be plunder, massacre, destruction, and revenge—and incursions committed without lawful authority, or apparent cause, and only for havoc and pillage, can be productive of no lawful effect. A nation attacked by such enemies is under no obligation to treat them as lawful enemies. They may be hanged as robbers,* or banditti.

If the President has a right to repel an Indian invasion without a declaration of war, as I have contended, then he may lawfully enter even a neutral territory in pursuit of the enemy without making war against that neutral power; and consequently without war having been declared against such power. If the United States have a right to enter the territory of Spain, there to suppress the Seminoles as I have contended, then the President may assert that right; for the act being no act of war against Spain, a declaration of war is not necessary to precede or authorize its performance. The exercise of a right is neither war nor cause of war; nor does the violence which opposition may render necessary, make it war. We may enter a neutral territory to attack an enemy; we may seize a neutral place to anticipate an enemy; we may pass by force, when necessary, through neutral territory; yet the place or territory is still considered neutral, and therefore the act is not war.

This right of the nation is to be exercised by those intrusted with its protection. The President is charged with the duty of asserting the rights of the nation, and he is furnished with the means. He is Commander-in-chief of the Army and Fleet; and it is his duty to see that the laws (which include treaties) be faithfully executed. He may therefore possess, on behalf of the United States, whatever another power by treaty authorizes the United States to possess. He may do beyond the jurisdiction of the United States whatever the law of nations or treaties authorize the United States there to do. He cannot seek satisfaction by war. He cannot make reprisals. But he may assert a specific right; or take possession of a specific thing, claimed by the United States. Thus, President Madison took possession of West Florida, claimed by the United States, and also by Spain. By his order, Wilkinson took the fort of Mobile from a Spanish officer. Force was to have been used, but the place was obtained by capitulation. I doubt not those proceedings had the entire approbation of the Speaker, (Mr. CLAY,) who very ably advocated the claim of the United States to that province.

I therefore conclude, that all the right which the United States had to do the acts which have been done in Florida, is vested in the President, the Executive branch of the Government.

The next inquiry which I propose to make is, Has General Jackson transcended his orders, or violated the law of nations?

In examining this question, it is necessary to see, in the first place, what were his orders. On examining the orders under which General Jackson acted, I find them to be as follows:

"26th Dec. 1817. To adopt the necessary measures to terminate a conflict which it has ever been the desire of the President, from considerations of humanity, to avoid; but which is now made necessary by their settled hostilities."

"16th Jan. 1818. To terminate speedily the war with the Seminoles; and with EXEMPLARY PUNISHMENT for hostilities so unprovoked; the honor of the United States requires it."

"29th Jan. 1818. To put a speedy and successful termination to the Indian war."

"6th Feb. 1818. To terminate the rupture with the Indians as speedily as practicable; to restore peace on such conditions as will make it honorable and permanent. The HONOR our army, and the interest of our country requires it."

In an order issued previous to all those which I have quoted, to wit, on the 16th of December, 1817, and addressed to General Gaines, he is allowed to march across the Florida line, and attack the Indians within its limits, should it be found necessary, "unless they should shelter themselves under a Spanish fort. In the last event, you will immediately notify this Department." This event never did happen; the Indians did not shelter themselves under a Spanish fort. And the event never having happened, the orders are to be understood as if no such clause was contained therein. This clause cannot be construed into a prohibition to possess himself of the forts of Florida, if necessity, or hostilities, justified the commanding officer in doing so, according to the law of nations or from treaties.

I will consider the objections that have been made to the proceedings of General Jackson: 1. In occupying St. Marks. 2. In occupying Pensacola. 3. In executing Arbuthnot and Ambrister. But here let me remark, that the President has refused to censure or punish General Jackson for his proceedings in Florida, and thus takes upon himself the responsibility for them. It is the President that is responsible to Congress, and we shall not turn aside from him to censure a subordinate officer. It is against the President that we should direct our measures, if we take any. He has applauded General Jackson's motives, and excused his actions, and it is not for us to condemn them. This House may impeach, and the Senate may try the President; but General Jackson is not responsible to either.

Let us see if General Jackson was not justifiable in occupying St. Marks. I have attempted to show that, as the United States had been compelled, by the delinquency of Spain, to do the duties of Spain, they were entitled to the possession of the means, and so entitled to the possession of the fort of St. Marks, as a means of restraining the Indians. I have also shown that, by the law of nations, necessity authorizes the temporary seizure of a place, for preventing the enemy from seizing this place, when the neutral sovereign is unable to defend it.* To require that the exercise of this right should be preceded by a declaration of war, is to deny the right altogether, which is to take possession of the fortress of a neutral power. The Indians and negroes had threatened to occupy St. Marks,* and premeditated seizing that post.† Five hundred of them had approached it, to the alarm of the commander.‡ The case in which it is justifiable to seize a neutral post, existed. The General therefore stands fully justified in the seizure of St. Marks. Thus the Great Frederick, having ascertained the intended invasion and partition of his dominions, by Russia and Austria, took Dresden in depot, that he might be beforehand with his enemies.

* Vattel, 296, 297.

* Vattel, 315.

I will pass from St. Marks to the occupation of Pensacola. The orders of General Jackson were to "adopt the necessary measures" to procure a speedy and effectual termination of the war, and a peace on such terms as would be permanent, and honorable to the army and the United States. But the war could not be speedily terminated, if the Spanish Governor of Pensacola abetted, encouraged, and supplied the savages, and obstructed the arrival of supplies for the American army. The possession of Pensacola was necessary to the execution of his orders.

Provisions may be seized by force when necessary.§ Then a post may be occupied which obstructs their arrival. The Spanish commandant of Pensacola having endangered the existence of the American army, by detaining their supplies of provisions, it was necessary that he should be deprived of the power of doing the same again, during the continuance of the war.

General Jackson was reminded, in his orders, of the honor of the United States, and the honor of the army. His duty to preserve both inviolate was thus particularly impressed upon him. While engaged in suppressing the Seminoles, and thus performing what it was the duty of Spain to have done, he was ordered by the Governor of Pensacola to retire with his forces from West Florida, with a threat to use force to compel him, if he did not comply.‖ Will any member say, that, on receiving this order, Jackson should have fled? Ought he to have forgotten the HONOR of the United States, the HONOR of the American army, so lately and particularly recommended to his safe-keeping, and fled from West Florida, before the Spanish Cross, to avoid the arms of Don José Mazot? I presume no one would say he should have fled. Whatever doubt there might be as to the necessity or legality of taking possession of Pensacola before the Governor issued this menace, there was none afterwards. General Jackson at once saw that if he retired, he retired in disgrace, the honor of the United States and of the army tarnished, and his orders shamefully violated. It became necessary that he should deprive Mazot of the means of carrying his threat into execution. A threat which, if he should not attempt to execute against General Jackson himself, while his army remained in full force, it now became extremely probable that he would carry it into execution, with the aid of the savage and negro enemy, against the diminished force which General Jackson might leave in Florida. The immediate occupation by General Jackson of the fort of Barancas, was the necessary and proper result of the hostile declaration of Governor Mazot.

I will next consider the objections made to the conduct of General Jackson, in the execution of Arbuthnot and Ambrister.

Some of my arguments on this branch of the subject, have been anticipated by the honorable member who has preceded me, the chairman of the Military Committee, (Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky,) and it gives me satisfaction to find that my opinion agrees with that of a gentleman who is as much distinguished by his humanity as by his valor.

My observations will chiefly relate to the case of Ambrister, as the proceedings against him have been the most censured; and what is said of his case, will in the general apply to that of Arbuthnot.

I will attempt to maintain that Ambrister was an outlaw, making war without authority, instigating savages to an unlawful war, a leader of banditti, and liable, by the law of nations and the usages of war, to suffer death.

It was found by the special court-martial, that Ambrister had led and commanded Indians in carrying on war against the United States, being a British subject. Peace exists between all the citizens of the United States and all the subjects of Great Britain; and the Englishman who counsels, aids, or abets savages to massacre the people of the United States, is a murderer.

It is the laws of war, a branch of the law of nations, that gives to the commanding General a right to put prisoners to death, either for a violation of the usages of war, or by way of retaliation. In the one case, they die for their own crime, and their punishment is just; in the other, they are put to death for the crimes of their party, and their punishment is justified by policy.

Among the crimes against the laws of war, for which a prisoner may justly die, are—1. Making war without authority, the war being lawful; 2. Making war, if the war is unlawful; 3. Using means contrary to the laws of war.

That article of the laws of war that provides that he who fights without authority is liable to suffer death, seems not to have been rightly understood by either branch of the Military Committee: but it is a rule well established, and very beneficial to humanity. General Jackson seems to me to have entertained a correct idea of the rule, but not to have taken time, when giving his order for the execution of Ambrister, to express himself with sufficient clearness. I should interpolate the rule as laid down by him, and make it read thus: "It is an established principle of the law of nations, that any individual of a nation making war against the citizens (or soldiers) of another nation, the nations being at peace, (and having no authority by being in the service of a power making a lawful war,) forfeits the protection of his government; and becomes an outlaw (or robber, if he makes war by land) or a pirate, (if he makes war by sea.") The rule thus amended is equally applicable to the case of Ambrister, as in the form expressed by General Jackson. And it is fully established by the writers on the law of nations.

Ambrister did not, by coming to Florida, owe allegiance to Bowlegs or to Hillishajo. He continued the subject of Great Britain; and he owed temporary allegiance to the King of Spain. By aiding savages to carry on war against the United States, he violated the British treaty, the Spanish treaty, the law of nature, the law of nations, and the laws of war, and justly suffered death.

It is only in lawful wars that those who are taken are entitled to the treatment of prisoners of war. A war, to be lawful, must be undertaken by the sovereign power.* There must be lawful authority for making it, and apparent just cause. It must not be merely an incursion for havoc and pillage. An individual cannot wage lawful war against a nation; he is a robber. A family cannot; they will be robbers. A tribe of savages cannot; they may be treated as enemies of the human race. "Nations which are always ready to take arms on any prospect of advantage, are lawless robbers; but they who seem to delight in the ravages of war, who spread it on all sides, without any other motive than their ferocity, are monsters unworthy the name of men. All nations have a right to join in punishing, suppressing, and even exterminating such savages."† This is the language of the law of nations. Then, as the Seminole savages could not themselves make a lawful war against the United States, their chiefs, Bowlegs and Hillishajo, could not communicate such a right to Ambrister.

Having considered the liability of Ambrister to suffer death, for a violation of the laws of war, in exercising unlawful hostilities, I will next consider his liability to be put to death by way of retaliation, as a person incorporated with the enemy.

I lay down, with regard to the savages, this rule of warfare. Whatever degree of force, whatever destruction, whatever punishment for violating the usages of war or by way of retaliation, is found necessary to deter them from robbing our citizens, and massacring our women and children; that force, destruction, and punishment, they should be made to feel, and no more. So much we have an undoubted right to inflict on the principle of self-preservation. And if we do not inflict so much, we fail in our sacred duty to preserve the people.

I find this opinion fully supported by the authority and example of the greatest man that this or any other country has produced. General Washington, who knew when to silence pity, if its exercise was injurious to his country, did not consider the usages of war, or the principles of humanity, as applicable to a war carried on for the punishment of the unprovoked and atrocious hostilities of savages.* In his order to General Sullivan, directing his operations in the Indian country, I find the following clauses:

"The expedition you are appointed to command is to be directed against the hostile tribes of the Six Nations of Indians, with their associates and adherents. The immediate objects are the total destruction and devastation of their settlements, and the capture of as many prisoners of every age and sex as possible."

"I would recommend that some post in the centre of the Indian country be occupied with all expedition, with a sufficient quantity of provision, whence parties should be detached to lay waste all the settlements around, with injunctions to do it in the most effectual manner, that the country may not merely be overrun, but destroyed."

"After you have very thoroughly completed the destruction of their settlements, if the Indians should show a disposition for peace, I would have you to encourage it, on condition that they will give some decisive evidence of their sincerity, by delivering up some of the principal instigators of their past hostilities, into our hands—Butler, Brandt, the most mischievous of the Tories that have joined them, or any other they may have in their power, that we are interested to get into ours."

"But you will not, by any means, listen to overtures of peace, before the total ruin of their settlements is effected."

"Our future security will be in their inability to injure us—the distance to which they are driven, and the terror with which the severity of the chastisement they receive, will inspire them—peace without this would be fallacious and temporary."

"When we have effectually chastised them, we may then listen to peace; and endeavor to draw further advantage from their fears."

Such were the orders given by General Washington for inflicting exemplary punishment on the savages. Let us see how they were executed. "Every lake, river, and creek, in the country of the Six Nations, was traced for villages, and no vestige of human industry was permitted to remain. Houses, corn-fields, gardens, and fruit-trees, shared one common fate. Eighteen villages, a number of detached buildings, one hundred and sixty thousand bushels of corn, and all those fruits and vegetables which conduce to the comfort and subsistence of men, were utterly destroyed.† On receiving the communication of General Sullivan, Congress passed a vote of approbation of his conduct, and of that of the army."

Had Brandt and Butler fallen into the hands of General Washington, they would, no doubt, have met the fate of Arbuthnot and Ambrister.

So resolved was General Washington that a severe example should be made, that he would not even listen to proposals of peace until it had been done. In the present case, also, the punishment was inflicted for example; to preserve the peace of the frontier; to preserve from the hatchet and scalping-knife women and children. Many will be saved by the example; but, should only one be saved, Arbuthnot and Ambrister have not died in vain.

The committee come to the conclusion that General Jackson acted unlawfully by supposing that the special court or board of officers appointed to investigate the fact in the cases of Arbuthnot and Ambrister were a general court martial, appointed to try and determine offences under the articles of war. If that were so, the second sentence of the court in Ambrister's case, that he should receive fifty stripes, and be confined with a ball and chain to hard labor for twelve calendar months, is contrary to law, and, therefore, void; for, an act of Congress has repealed so much of the articles of war as authorizes the infliction of corporeal punishment by stripes.* But the court was not appointed under the articles of war. It was neither a general nor a regimental court-martial. Its authority was derived from the order of the commanding General, and was to investigate charges, and record their opinion as to the guilt or innocence of the prisoners, and what punishment, if any, should be inflicted. The law under which Ambrister was punished was the laws of war. Those laws do not authorize infliction of torture. Therefore, the second sentence, to inflict stripes and labor at a ball and chain, is illegal and void. Whatever law the court was appointed and acted under, the second sentence is unlawful and void; consequently, the first sentence, that Ambrister should suffer death by being shot, was the only legal sentence, and properly carried into execution.

Ambrister died by the sole authority of General Jackson. No court-martial had power to try him by any law of the United States. But the committee say, that, "wherever severity is not absolutely necessary, mercy becomes a duty." A similar expression has been used by the writers on the laws of nations in regard to retaliating on the innocent for the guilt of others; but that is not this case. What mean the committee by "absolute necessity?" The nation indeed was not in danger: nor was it in danger when André died; and according to the reasoning of the committee, General Washington should have pardoned André; but André suffered, because the case required that the example should have its full effect; and so it was required in the case of Ambrister. Where pardon will have a pernicious effect on the interests of society, mercy becomes weakness and folly.

It is alleged that these incidents, the execution of Arbuthnot and Ambrister, are at variance with the principles of our constitution and laws. Our constitution and laws were formed for the people of the United States. They have no force in Florida. Ambrister and Hillishajo never came under the shade of the umbrella of the constitution. "They should," says the honorable Speaker, (Mr. CLAY,) "have been turned over to the civil authority. So soon as the stranger treads the American soil, he is encircled by the laws." I answer, there was no civil authority having jurisdiction of their cases, to which they could have been turned over. They never did tread on that portion of American ground where they could claim the benefit of our laws. Nor do those laws protect enemies in time of war. They did not protect Sir Charles Asgill; they did not protect André, or the emissaries who sought to corrupt the soldiers of the Pennsylvania line.

FRIDAY, January 22.

The Seminole War.

The committee again took up the subject of the Seminole war.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, next addressed the House. He said he had really felt some degree of astonishment when this resolution was introduced by the Committee on Military Affairs; not because this House ought not to examine, and strictly to examine, the conduct of any of the officers of this Government—a right which he hoped it would ever claim, and prayed God it might never fear to exercise. But, said Mr. J., when we are informed that, during this war, not only Arbuthnot and Ambrister, two British gentlemen, have been executed, but that two Indian chiefs have also suffered death, by order of the commanding General, it indeed seems somewhat strange that not a breath should be uttered as to the latter. Why, sir, is this discrimination? Is it because they were Britons? Is it because they were subjects of a civilized nation? Is it because they understood, but would not obey, the precepts of morality, of mercy, and of justice? This, sir, I have no doubt, the committee would be unwilling to admit. These Indians, Mr. Chairman, were also human beings; and, sir, I am free to declare that, on this subject, I partially accord with the honorable Speaker. If those chiefs had been mere Indians, or Indian chiefs, fighting the battles of their country, as they had a right to do, rude, ignorant, and superstitious, as they may have been, I should, to say the least of it, have deeply regretted their execution. Poor, wretched, miserable beings! Absolute necessity alone should demand their lives. Rather than shed their blood, rather than drive them from the face of the earth, rather than hunt them down, (as we have been compelled to do,) like the wild beast of the forest, I would, if possible, show them the light of science—point out to them the manner by which they may know something themselves, and be acknowledged men by the nations of the earth. But, sir, we are informed, as to these chiefs, that they were not mere Indians, fighting the battles of their country; but, on the contrary, when our army was lying on the confines of Florida; when General Gaines was ordered merely to demand the perpetrators of murders which had been committed on our defenceless citizens; when we were declaring to them that we were desirous of nothing more than peace, these were the men who commanded the party that murdered Lieutenant Scott and his company—scalped and tomahawked the women of his party; and, to close the scene, when the men had fallen, and the women were murdered, against the boat that bore them the heads of the babes were dashed in pieces. But, if the honorable Speaker could convince us that these chiefs should not have suffered, would we, therefore, be convinced that we should adopt the resolution now under consideration, which relates only to the execution of Arbuthnot and Ambrister? In examining this subject, I beg leave explicitly to state, that I claim not of this House its sympathy or its pity for General Jackson: if he cannot be justified by the law of nations, let him fall. I am rejoiced to learn, Mr. Chairman, that all who have yet expressed an opinion either way on this subject, have willingly admitted that his motives for his actions were of the purest character. I may also be permitted to state, that I have had the honor of a personal acquaintance with General Jackson—have served under him, and fought with him; and, although it was my misfortune to differ with him as to the correctness of some of the measures which were adopted during the short period of my service, still, sir, since the commencement of his military career, in 1812, till the present period, I have had but one uniform opinion as to the main object which he has kept steadily in view; that is, that it was nothing else than the glory and honor of his country. Now, sir, let us examine what were the charges against these men. They were these: exciting and stirring up the Indians to war, and, as to Ambrister, leading them to battle; these were the charges of which they were found guilty, and for which they were executed. It was established, beyond a doubt, that these men had crossed the Atlantic for no other purpose than to carry into complete execution the hellish views of the famous Colonel Nicholls and Captain Woodbine, their predecessors; that these men, the subjects of a civilized nation, well understood the manner in which these savages carry on war; that they regard neither age, female, nor infantine innocence; whose almost only rule is indiscriminate murder; that, in fact, they were the prime movers of the war; that they, in fact, were really the murderers of our women and children. Are these men, I may here be permitted to ask, less guilty of the murders which they indirectly perpetrated than the wretched savage by whose hand they did the deed? Ask the soldier whose wife has been murdered by savage hands, upon whom he would take vengeance; or the mother, whose children have been butchered, upon whom she will be avenged. Ask common sense itself, who are the real actors in these bloody scenes. But we are told by the honorable gentleman from Georgia, with some degree of triumph, that General Jackson has established a new rule of the law of nations; says the gentleman, he declares that it is an established rule of the law of nations, that any individual of a nation, making war against the citizens of another nation, they being at peace, forfeits his allegiance, and becomes an outlaw and a pirate. It is not General Jackson, sir, who is mistaken, but the gentleman himself; he has confounded two distinct and separate rules of the law of nations. The first of which is this, that I, a citizen of the United States, have a right, by the law of nations, to advise the Government of France to war with Great Britain, or any other power; and if she choose to take my advice; if she declare war; if (which is essential to this rule) the act of declaring war be a national act; or if, without my advice, she be at war, I may of right enlist under her banners; I may lead or fight with her troops. Under these circumstances, I am identified with the French troops, and, if taken prisoner, am entitled to the same treatment as a French prisoner of war. The other rule of the law of nations will be found to be nearly in the words of the General; that is, if, as in the case above stated, I advise a nation to go to war, but she does not choose to take my advice, finding that the nation cannot be engaged; or if, without consulting anybody, I set about making war myself, I engage a set of desperate characters, or whoever else you please, and proceed to acts of hostility against the nation I would injure. This, sir, in the words of the General, would be an individual of one nation making war against the citizens of another nation, and this band, by the law of nations, are declared outlaws and pirates. Which of these rules, then, sir, will apply to the case of Arbuthnot and Ambrister? Are these vagrant savages a nation of people, within the meaning of the rule first mentioned; and, if so, has that nation declared war, and might these men have enlisted under their banner, and so have been entitled to the rights of prisoners of war? Whoever will take the trouble to examine the history of this war will be satisfied that it never can be viewed as having been a national act, within the rule above mentioned; and, to prove this, in the first place, I ask, if the fugitive Red Sticks, having formed a desperate band, partly of the relics of their own nation, and partly of Seminoles, could be considered as a nation, having a right to make war or peace? Or were they a banditti? Or what would you call the civilized wretch who would lead them? If these had not the right, I ask if the Indian and negro party of Colonel Nicholls had a right to make war? Will any one pretend to say that this tri-colored party were a nation? No, sir, they were the refuse of villany itself; and yet, sir, it is an important fact, that these parties were perhaps the most prominent in the war; they did not enlist under the banners of the nation, but, sir, many of the citizens of the nation, (if it may be so called,) rallied round their standard. It is also a fact, worthy of consideration, that a considerable part of the nation were averse to the proceedings of their brethren, and fought with us against them. Under these circumstances, General Jackson might well view them in the character of individuals making war upon us, or as leaders of a lawless banditti. But, sir, suppose he was incorrect in this view of their case; suppose they were not outlaws and pirates, still their punishment was just; for, sir, the charges against them were not that they were outlaws and pirates, but that they had excited and led the Indians to war against us, and for this they were executed. Whether the crimes for which they suffered constituted them outlaws and pirates, is a question different from the establishment of the crime itself. I said, sir, that, admitting they were not outlaws and pirates, that still they suffered justly. If they were not the exciters and leaders of a banditti, and, of course, according to the rule before stated, outlaws and pirates, they were officers or soldiers, fighting under the banners of a nation which had the right to declare, and which had declared war, and were identified with the citizens of that nation, and were subject to all the laws of war and of nations, as applied to that nation. They had, in fact, become savages. What, then, sir, is the rule of the law of nations which will apply to them in this situation? It is this: "that when we are at war with a savage nation, which regards no rules, we may retaliate upon its citizens the cruelties committed on our own, care being taken to punish alone the guilty." Then, sir, I ask if ever there were fit subjects for punishment, under this rule, if these were not they? men around whom the light of science had shone in its most refulgent splendor—who were not ignorant of the precepts of mercy, of moderation, and of justice, to become worse than savages, to stimulate, to lead those wild, those untutored, those miserable men of the forest, to imbrue their hands in the blood of unresisting innocence.

But, it is said, there was no necessity for their execution, because, say gentlemen, the war was nearly over, we had no danger to apprehend. Sir, the necessity for executing such lawless miscreants exists now as much as then. What, sir, was the object of their punishment? Not merely that they should atone for the crimes which they had committed, but, sir, it was to teach an important lesson to the unprincipled subjects of Great Britain and Spain; it proclaimed to them, sir, in language which could not be misunderstood, what they might expect for like offences; and, sir, I have no doubt but that if, at the commencement of this Government, a determination had been fixed and avowed to the world, to punish with instant death all such offences, the effect would have been the salvation of the lives of many of our citizens.

The honorable committee who reported this resolution, have told us that the court-martial has no jurisdiction of the offence. In reply to which I will observe, that if I have shown that, by the law of nations, these men could be punished with death by a prince or by his general, I may be permitted to ask that honorable committee how the commanding General is to ascertain the fact of their guilt? Is he to sit as judge and juror? Is he to execute them on the mere suggestion of any one who chooses to charge them, or are the facts to be ascertained by respectable and honorable officers detailed for the purpose? Sir, if without the investigation of this respectable court these men had been executed, well, indeed, might we censure the General. The honorable gentleman from Georgia inquires, why General Jackson did not execute Weatherford? and answers the interrogatory himself, unhesitatingly, by stating that General Jackson did not then know the plenitude of his powers. Sir, I am happy to know that I have it in my power to give to this honorable committee the true reason why that gallant chieftain was not executed. Some time, sir, before the treaty of Fort Jackson, this chief was informed that General Jackson intended, if he could take him, to put him to death. He was advised by his friends, as his warriors were almost all slain, as his country was ruined, and as his escape was almost impossible, to surrender himself to General Jackson; that it was useless to attempt further resistance, and this was the only means by which his life could be saved; he determined to do so, and presented himself to the General, at his headquarters. We are informed that it was demanded of him who he was, and how he came there. He replied, "My name is Weatherford, one of the chiefs of the Red Sticks. I have fought you till my warriors are all slain. If I had warriors I would fight you still, but I have none; my country is overrun, and my soldiers are fallen. Here I am in your power—do with me as you please—only recollect that I am a soldier." This, sir, was the reason why the life of that brave chief was saved. If, under these circumstances, our General could have executed so distinguished a savage, the most verdant laurel would have faded on his brow.

Mr. TALLMADGE, of New York. In rising to address the House at so late an hour of the day, when the attention of the House was necessarily fatigued by those who had preceded him, and its patience somewhat exhausted, Mr. T. said, he was aware of the dangers that awaited him; he was aware of the perils that he must encounter in attempting to proceed. But, Mr. T. said, the resolutions under consideration were so important in their nature, and so replete with consequences of such magnitude, involving the interest and the honor of our country, that a sense of duty impelled him to go on.

Sir, said Mr. T., a question of war discussed in the highest deliberative assembly known to a free people, can never fail to become a question of great individual excitement—of great public interest. Its cause, and its consequences, to the public happiness, present it in an aspect almost appalling. But, said he, when the friends of the proposed resolutions tell this House, and tell this nation, that, in addition to the question of the Seminole war and its natural consequences, which we are called upon to discuss, in its progress, the constitution of our country has been violated by military power, and the honor of our nation stained by base and inhuman cruelties—it is then, sir, that the question assumes an aspect of tenfold more importance, and calculated to excite the feelings of this House and to arouse the spirit of the nation. Such, said Mr. T., is the question now presented for discussion. It was due to himself to confess to this House that his feelings were excited upon the occasion, and that he entered upon the discussion with a determination to meet it in all its bearings. But, he said, while he thus frankly avowed his feelings, he begged the indulgence to add, that, while he intended his course in debate should be marked with zeal and decision, yet he also intended to observe the decorum in debate due to the dignity of this House. He said it was his pride to say that, since he had the honor of a seat on this floor, he never had used against any member a harsh expression or severe allusion, and that he never would. He tendered his acknowledgments to the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. COBB) for the example he had set in the opening—ardent in debate, but temperate in expression. Mr. T. said it should be his course; he hoped others would also observe the example. His own opinion was decisively formed upon full examination of all the documents—and, while he did not doubt of the proper result, and which he should endeavor to prevail on this House to adopt, yet he was free to declare, there was ample room for difference of opinion, and, therefore, he was not inclined to cast any imputations upon those from whom he might differ. He was disposed to proffer to them the most charitable indulgence, and he was the more desirous they should accept from him the proffer, because he solicited it for himself from them in return.

Mr. T. said a doubt had already been expressed whether this House had the power to discuss and express its opinion upon the present subject, and a hope had been intimated that those who opposed the resolutions would not put that opposition upon the want of right and power in the House, and thus prevent the inquiry. He said, as for himself, he would not. It was a point upon which he had doubts. A great national question had arisen, connected with a recent war, and which had justly excited public feeling—it was, in his opinion, fit and proper that the Representatives of the people should investigate the subject and express their opinion. Mr. T. said, it was asserted that the Major General, who had conducted the war in its progress, had violated his orders—had broken the constitution, and had, by cruelties, dishonored our national character. Yet, said he, the President, from whom those orders emanated, has not arrested him, but has approved of his proceedings, and, consequently, stands responsible for the result. Whatever doubts might have been entertained as to our powers in the question between this House and the Major General, approved and adopted as the transactions had been by the President, it was now a question between him and the public; and no doubt of our powers could be reasonably entertained. Mr. T. said he hoped the power of the House would ever be sparingly exercised, and be reserved for great occasions. But, I hold, said he, that we have the power, and that it becomes a duty to investigate and express our opinions on great public occasions, producing public excitement. It is here, on this floor, and through their Representatives, that the people can only speak. Your Administration may become corrupt—your Executive officers may violate the laws, break the constitution, and, by violent outrages, even involve the country in war. In such an event, here, on this floor, and in this power for which I am now contending, will ever be found the only sure corrective. It is one of the dearest privileges of this House; one of the most essential to the liberties of the country to be preserved and maintained; and he hoped it would be the last prerogative ever surrendered. So far, then, from wishing to avoid the present discussion, I hold, said Mr. T., that the charges made are of so deep a dye, and have produced such excitement, that it has become our duty, as the Representatives of the people, to inquire, and to advise; nay, even to instruct public opinion upon the subject now under discussion. And, Mr. T. said, it afforded him a proud consolation to believe that the State which he had the honor in part to represent, would be willing to adopt as correct the opinion which this House should announce. Such, said Mr. T., has been the sensation produced by the manner and character of the accusations which have been thrown out, that he had no hesitation to say, if this House should terminate their session, and omit to inquire into and avow their opinion upon the present subject, it would disappoint the nation, and fix upon this House an eternal stigma, as wanting spirit to pronounce between the country and the Administration; or, if gentlemen would rather have it so, between the proposed resolution and General Jackson. He said he had no unwillingness on his part; and he hoped the House would hold fast upon the present resolutions, and insist upon a direct vote upon the accusing propositions. If the constitution has been violated, if the honor of the nation is stained by cruelties, this House should declare it to the country. If, on the contrary, the accusations are found to be incorrect, it was due to the Administration, it was due to the character of General Jackson, that we should so declare, and thus wipe away the unjust imputations. A vote of thanks has been talked of. Mr. T. said he should oppose any substitute for the present resolutions. The thanks of this House constitute the best wealth of this nation; too precious to be used, unless on extraordinary occasions. Such was the affair of Orleans. But, it is sufficient that on investigation of the Seminole war, there shall be found no cause for blame. A decided rejection of the proposed resolutions of censure was all that the present occasion required.

But, said Mr. T., in addition to the proposed censure contained in the resolutions, they also contain subjects on which legislation is proposed. He said he was not prepared to say but legislation on those points might be proper, at a proper time, and under proper circumstances; but he was prepared to say that, on this occasion, under the present public excitement, and coupled with the proposed resolutions for censure, he, for one, would not consent to legislate. The act of legislation, under existing circumstances, would necessarily imply in itself a disapprobation of this House to the proceedings approved and adopted by the President, and would include a direct censure upon General Jackson. Let us, said Mr. T., reject the whole of the resolutions. If any gentleman thinks that legislation on any of these subjects is requisite for the public good; if he would bring it forward as distinct and disconnected propositions, it would undoubtedly receive the deliberate consideration of this House, and under no other circumstances ought it to be entertained. He said he was opposed to any act of this House which, by any inference, would look like censure on General Jackson, a man whose name and whose fame was identified with the history and the glory of his country—he would not say the first military captain of any country, but he thought he might say the first in ours.

But, said Mr. T., we have been told that this war was, on the part of our country, an offensive war; and, therefore, it did not come within the powers of the Executive to carry it on; and therefore the powers of this House, and its right to pronounce on peace and war, had been invaded, and our constitution had thus been violated. I am extremely embarrassed to determine how to answer this objection—an objection presenting an aspect so tremendous. The prerogatives of this House, on peace and war, are invaded — the constitution of our country violated. The Executive of our Government, upon his own responsibility, has waged an offensive war; or he has sanctioned, and subsequently approved of, General Jackson's making offensive war upon a defenceless Indian tribe! Is the Seminole war offensive on our part? At the last session of this House we specially appropriated money for the support of this war. But my excited feelings, said Mr. T., forbid me to discuss this point.

Sir, you are an American! Go, count the bleeding scalps of your murdered countrymen, of all ages and sexes, found by General Jackson, and then return, and tell to this House if this Seminole war was, on the part of your country, an offensive war! Tell this House, also, if you advise a vote of censure to be passed on the conduct of either the Executive, for his just orders, or upon General Jackson, for discovering upwards of three hundred dried and fifty fresh scalps, with a red pole erected as the beacon of Indian war, and crowned with the scalp of an American citizen!

Sir, said Mr. T., if I am correct that the Seminole Indians had waged an inhuman and destructive war upon the frontiers of Georgia, it became obligatory upon the Executive of the Union, both in the spirit and letter of his duty, to extend the arm of Government for their protection: no matter from what causes the war was produced; no matter from whence its origin. It was sufficient that a sister State was assailed, and called upon the Union for defence. Its omission by the Executive would justly have incurred the censure of this House. Sir, the President did not omit, in this respect, his duty. He called General Jackson into the field, and vested him with discretionary powers, "to concentrate his force, and to adopt the necessary measures to terminate the conflict." General Jackson promptly performed his duty; he did adopt the necessary measures; he has terminated the conflict; he has reported his proceedings; they have been adopted and approved by the President. Here, then, said Mr. T., the affair with General Jackson is at an end. He stands justified and discharged; whatever may have been the incidents in the progress and the conduct of that war, committed to his charge, he is exonerated from all responsibility. Good intentions and a faithful exercise of his discretion, under the circumstances as they transpired, were all that could ever be required of General Jackson. This is not doubted. The responsibilities of the transaction are therefore cast upon the Executive. It is an affair between the country and the President. Mr. T. said he rejoiced that it was; for he had no idea of Executive irresponsibility. He never would consent that a military officer should be charged with discretionary powers, and then be held responsible for any thing more than good intentions, and good faith in the performance of his duties.

But, he said, let me not be misunderstood. He disclaimed any wish to prevent inquiry. He had no desire to claim for General Jackson the protection of Executive responsibility. It would be doing injustice to the high character of that man. And he believed the whole tenor of his conduct would bear the strictest scrutiny. With this view, and although he thought General Jackson was sufficiently acquitted and discharged by Executive approbation, yet he should now proceed to examine the progress of the war; and he invited the fullest investigation.

Sir, said Mr. T., I hold that General Jackson was vested with full and ample powers for the conduct of the Seminole war. The orders to him were discretionary; vesting in him adequate authority for every emergency that might be incident to the campaign. Under the circumstances, such discretionary orders were correct. He was about to be immersed in the wilderness, from whence he could neither communicate nor receive information from the War Department. It was, therefore, necessary to confide to him the whole conduct of the war; and the orders from the War Department, collectively considered, clearly vested in him ample powers for every exigency that the campaign might require. The functions of the War Department were expended in the amplitude of his orders. No additional powers could have been given, under any state of circumstances, had the War Office accompanied him into the wilderness. His ample and discretionary powers embraced every case, and covered and justified his whole conduct. Not, said Mr. T., that the orders to General Jaceson could justify him in doing any wrong—in making an offensive war, or in violating a neutral territory; but whatever act was required to be done, whatever the events of the war justified to be done, and which the War Office might have ordered, so far the orders to General Jackson extended. If I am correct in this position, there is an end to all question about violation of orders; General Jackson is justified; and the question only remains between the Executive and the country.

SATURDAY, January 23.

Monument to De Kalb.

Mr. REED submitted the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas a resolution was passed by the Congress of the United States, on the 14th day of October, in the following words, to wit:

"Resolved, That a monument be erected to the memory of the late Major General, the Baron de Kalb, in the city of Annapolis, in the State of Maryland, with the following inscription:

"Sacred to the memory of the Baron de Kalb, Knight of the Royal Order of Military Merit, Brigadier of the Armies of France, and Major General in the service of the United States of America; having served with honor and reputation for three years, he gave a last and glorious proof of his attachment to the liberties of mankind, and the cause of America, in the action near Camden, in the State of South Carolina, on the 16th of August, 1780, when, leading on the troops of the Maryland and Delaware lines, against superior numbers, and animating by his example to deeds of valor, he was pierced with many wounds, and, on the 19th following, expired, in the 40th year of his age. The Congress of the United States of America, in gratitude to his zeal, services, and merit, have erected this monument."

Resolved, therefore, That the aforegoing resolution be referred to a select committee, with instructions to report a bill now to carry the same into effect.

Mr. MERCER advocated the adoption of this resolution at some length, and with much ardor; urging in its support the valuable services of the Baron de Kalb, his gallant character, and illustrious death in defence of the liberty and independence of the United States, &c.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kentucky, in reply, said he would never give his vote for a monument, or any other memorial to any subordinate, or any foreign officer, no matter how meritorious their services, so long as the remains of WASHINGTON lay neglected. He referred to the resolution now before the Senate, proposing an equestrian statue to WASHINGTON; and said, when that had been adopted, it would be then, and not till then, fair and proper to propose similar honors for other Revolutionary worthies. Mr. A. moved that the resolution be laid on the table.

Mr. REED said it was true that a proposition was now before the Senate to carry into effect the resolution of the Old Congress, which voted an equestrian statue for General WASHINGTON, but whether that should pass or not ought not to interfere with the present motion, and the fate of that proposition would not prevent him, Mr. R. said, from calling on this House to carry into effect a law passed nearly forty years ago, and to which the faith and honor of the nation were pledged. If Congress erected no monument to WASHINGTON, it would be no fault of his; he would go as far as any gentleman in obtaining it. There was, Mr. R. said, a law of the Old Congress directing a monument to Montgomery in the city of New York; it had been neglected by the nation; but the State of New York, to its lasting credit, has performed that duty itself, and, in the course of last year, removed the bones of the immortal Montgomery from the spot where he fell, to the land which he had so gloriously defended. Propositions had been frequently brought forward in this House, Mr. R. said, to erect a memorial of some kind to WASHINGTON, but, for some reason or other, they were never carried. It had been said, the page of history perpetuated the glory of WASHINGTON; but was not a monument also a history, in which every one might read not only the virtues of the man, but, also, the gratitude of his country? Certainly it was.

The question to lay Mr. REED's motion on the table was carried—yeas 76, nays 42.

Seminole War.

The House then proceeded again to the consideration, in Committee of the Whole, (Mr. TERRY in the Chair,) of the report of the Military Committee, and the amendments offered thereto by Mr. COBB.

Mr. STORRS said, that when he took his seat in the House at the commencement of the session, he looked with much anxiety to the Message which should disclose the true character of the transactions during the past year, on our southern frontier. We had, indeed, been informed, by the Message of the 25th of March last, that war existed between the United States and the Seminole tribe of Indians—that orders had been issued for the advance of the army into Florida, but that the commanding officer was strictly enjoined against any attack on the Spanish fortresses, without the sanction of the Government. During the recess, he had heard of the entry of our troops into the territory of Spain, the seizure of St. Marks, the capture of Pensacola and the Barancas, the military trials of Arbuthnot and Ambrister, and the execution of the Seminole chiefs. Notwithstanding no evidence of disapprobation of any of these measures had transpired, except the offer to restore Pensacola unconditionally, and St. Marks, on terms prescribed by us, he was unwilling to believe that they had received the sanction of the Executive. The documents transmitted to the House had shown how vain was this expectation. He had carefully and attentively examined them, and formed an opinion upon them, he hoped with that deliberation which was due to questions of so great and vital importance to the constitution and character of the country. That opinion he had not found reason to change, nor was he ashamed or afraid to avow it, and should discharge his duty with frankness and fearlessness, let the censure, which, in his judgment, these transactions merited, fall where it might.

When, said he, the trials of Arbuthnot and Ambrister were laid upon our tables, and it was first developed that one of them had suffered death in consequence of the reversal of the sentence of the court-martial, by General Jackson, a universal burst of indignation seemed to have electrified the House. Have these manly and generous feelings, so honorable to our nature, fled from our bosoms, or have they chilled into insensibility during the long interval which has elapsed? He had waited in painful suspense for the report of the Military Committee, and acknowledged his gratitude to them for the firm stand which they had made against these encroachments of military power. He saw among them some of those who, in other times—in the darkest days of our adversity, when the yoke of parliamentary and military despotism was riveting on our necks, had stept forth as the protectors of their country, and with unconquerable spirit persisted in the contest which delivered us from the tyranny of Britain. He was happy to find that, during his life, this spirit has not left us—that, in his day, those were to be found among us who yet cherished the principles of that glorious conflict, and knew how to appreciate the value of those liberties which were earned at the expense of so much blood and treasure.

I am gratified, said he, to find that, to this period of the debate, excepting by the honorable gentleman for Virginia, (Mr. SMYTH,) the power of this House to interpose has not been questioned. We are the peculiar guardians of the constitution. Our liberties are safe in the same proportion that we execute our duty with firmness, vigilance, and fidelity. Offences short of impeachment, but which threaten the public safety, it is the right of this House to present to the nation; against evils of this sort it is the most effectual remedy. However the direct interposition of our constitutional power of impeachment may be evaded, there is a tribunal —public opinion—to whose judgments no man is indifferent, whose decision none can successfully withstand or defy, and which causes the stoutest heart to tremble. The genius of our institutions, the experience of other Governments, the records of all history, and the sad and melancholy fate of a long train of fallen republics, admonish us that liberty is only safe when faithfully guarded by the immediate representatives of an enlightened people.

The services of General Jackson have been eminently great. He has justly received from a grateful country its high rewards and honors. I am not disposed to detract from his well-merited fame. The victory of New Orleans was, indeed, a proud triumph—and, though I do not unite with some gentlemen in pronouncing it, in reference to its consequences, the greatest which this country has achieved, I cheerfully accord to the sentiments which have been expressed in praise of that great exploit. Though, with the rest of my countrymen, I felt and gratefully acknowledged that to him we owed much of our national character, and the security of a valuable portion of our territory, yet, I do not forget that even on that occasion he overstepped his power. I was disposed to forgive it. The evils which he averted and the blessings which he conferred upon us, were some atonement for the violated majesty of the constitution. But, great as his services have been, they afford no sanctuary against our inquiry—much less do they furnish any exculpation for the violation of the constitution. An example of impunity on such grounds, for these assumptions of power, will produce the most pernicious consequences among the subordinate officers of the army. Day after day have petitions been presented to this House, from the army, for indemnity against judgments awarded for the violation of the personal liberty of our citizens. The disposition to encroach upon the civil authorities of the Government should receive no encouragement from our hands. For some time past the people of this country have indulged a dangerous predilection for the army. In the civil departments one may attain to the highest eminence, and scarcely attract attention beyond the immediate sphere in which he moves; but, clothe him with the glare of military renown, and the eyes of the people are dazzled—his fame has no limits, and every one is ambitious and eager to honor him. It is time that we were roused from this fatal delusion. The affections of the country have been too bountifully devoted to the army, and the time may yet come when the people will find it too late to retrieve this error of their hearts.

If, sir, we consult the past history of other countries, and turn our eye back through ages which have gone before us; or, if we look only to the events of our own times, we find much to warn us against receiving the services of public men as an apology for their usurpations. Every tyrant who has succeeded in overturning the liberties of his country, first stole away the affections of his countrymen by the services which he had rendered to the State. On this occasion it is well worthy of remark that these have, with few exceptions, been military services. Cæsar and Bonaparte only commenced their bloody career of tyranny after they had risen to power on the misguided affections of the people. In forming my judgment on the specific propositions before us, I lay altogether aside the motives of General Jackson. Laudable as they may have been, or faithfully as he may have believed himself to be acting in the discharge of his duty to his country, these form no part of the inquiry before us. To me it is immaterial with what views or what motives he has infringed upon the constitution. Our object should be to prevent the force of the precedent which these measures establish. If the powers of Congress have been encroached upon, let us declare it, unless we are prepared to surrender our prerogatives to a military chieftain, or to give up the constitution to mere matter of delicacy. This is not an inquiry with a view to the censure of General Jackson. It is required from us by the duty of self-preservation. The indirect censure which some of these resolutions imply, is no fault of ours. The enemy whom he triumphantly vanquished at New Orleans can derive no self-gratification from our proceedings. Would they boast, I would tell them to meet him in the field. The measures of this House will afford but a miserable consolation to those who there felt the energy of his arm, and whose pride was there humbled in the dust before his skill and valor.

The subject of these resolutions divides itself into several inquiries: the capture of Pensacola, the seizure of St. Marks, the crossing of the Florida line, and the execution of the captives. Whatever may be the justification for the seizure of Pensacola, the Barancas, and St. Marks, which the Executive has urged as between us and Spain, it is plainly admitted by him that the occupation of these posts was not justified by any orders which were issued. Such is the fair import of the Message communicated at the commencement of the session.

The immediate restoration of Pensacola is unequivocal evidence that the post was not captured in conformity to the views or instructions of the Executive, and virtually amounts to a disavowal of its seizure, on the part of our Government. Although, as between us and Spain, the Executive has not, and perhaps ought not, to have yielded to the demand of that Government to inflict punishment on General Jackson, it is not certain how far they have intended to adopt his acts as constitutional. From a careful examination of the letter from the Secretary of State to Mr. Erving, I have been led to doubt whether they have, in unqualified terms, sanctioned the occupation of St. Marks and Pensacola. In that letter, it is said that "it became, therefore, in the opinion of General Jackson, indispensably necessary to take from the Governor of Pensacola the means of carrying his threat into execution." Again: "It was, in his judgment, not sufficient that they (the Indians) should be suffered to rally their numbers under the protection of Spanish forts," &c. The cautious phraseology of these, and many other passages of this letter, leaves it somewhat equivocal whether even the Government has, as between General Jackson and us, assumed to their whole extent the doctrines on which General Jackson founded the justification of his proceedings. If, however, such sanction was intended on the part of the Executive, the powers of Congress are doubly jeopardized.

On the subject of the trials of Arbuthnot and Ambrister, it is said that "the defence of the one consisted solely and exclusively of technical cavils at the nature of part of the evidence against him, and the other confessed his guilt." It is here gravely asserted, that, on a trial for life or death, an objection to the hearsay declarations of an Indian is a technical cavil!—that this country recognizes an institution for trial of capital offences, on which an objection to the proof of the hearsay declaration of an Indian, who, if himself present, could not have been a competent witness, is a technical cavil! To be condemned to an ignominious death on testimony of this sort is what the honorable Secretary has termed "the benefit of a trial by court-martial." The threat contained in the conclusion of this letter deserves, at least, to be remarked by this House: "if the necessities of self-defence should again compel the United States to take possession of the Spanish forts and places in Florida, declare, with the frankness and candor that becomes us, that another unconditional restoration of them must not be expected." Before a war of conquest is carried into the dominions of Spain; before the armies of this nation are sent to enforce the conditions which we prescribe to other nations as the tenure by which they shall enjoy the sovereignty of their own territories, I trust that this House will at least be consulted; that the discretion of Congress alone will determine the question of war or peace. I do not relish the fulmination of these threats by a Secretary of Foreign Affairs. We have, indeed, heard of imperial edicts in another quarter of the globe. At one time it is decreed, that the Bourbon dynasty no longer existed in Spain; at another, the Queen of Etruria no longer reigns, and a band of soldiery is forthwith sent to enforce the mandate, and overturn the Governments of other nations. These imperial examples are hardly worthy of our imitation; and I pray that, if this letter is to be hereafter the model of our diplomatic correspondence, some means may be devised to remedy its effect upon our national character. It would hardly be imagined, from perusing that letter, by one unversed in our institutions, that our form of government was republican. And against whom is this threat issued? "Poor, miserable, and degraded Spain!" Indeed she is too weak to repel or scarcely to resent the encroachments of any; but, fallen as she is, it affords but a sorry triumph to insult her weakness. I fear that the wrongs of which she has been guilty towards us have induced less regard for her rights, and that we have not, therefore, been scrupulous to respect them.

The capture of St. Marks was equally unauthorized by orders, and was equally in derogation of the rights of Spain. It appears to have been seized as a convenient "depot" to facilitate the operations of our army. I shall not detain you by again repeating what has already been so ably and satisfactorily illustrated by those who have already addressed the committee on this point. The terms, however, on which St. Marks was offered to be restored, are worthy of notice. They tend to show how greatly the importance of this war with the Seminoles, and that necessity which is resorted to as a justification of the capture of this fort, has been magnified. St. Marks is in the heart of the territory occupied by these tribes—and yet it appears, from the letter of the 30th of November, that two hundred and fifty men would be accepted as "a Spanish force adequate to its protection against the Indians." Yes, sir—two hundred and fifty "poor, miserable, and degraded" Spaniards, as the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. HOLMES) was pleased to call that nation, were considered as competent effectually to restrain these tribes from its forcible occupation "for purposes of hostility against the United States."

Gentlemen have defended these proceedings as a case in which a belligerent is justified in seizing neutral forts or territory, in self-defence, arising out of extreme necessity. I admit that cases may exist of that sort; they are rather exceptions to the doctrines which I maintain. I can easily imagine that, even under the treaty with Spain, an attack by the Seminoles might be so sudden and unanticipated, that we might be justified in pursuing them even into Florida. But this necessity must not originate from the fault of the belligerent. If, as in the case before us, our neglect for so long a period to require of Spain the fulfilment of the treaty, or to represent to that Government, or even to its Minister here, the hostile intentions of the Indians, has brought this necessity upon ourselves, the fault is on our side. These Indian tribes, and their associates, have been represented as mere banditti, outlaws, renegadoes. If so, then Spain was answerable to us, on well settled principles, for their acts. But I ask, in what code of the law of nations is an authority asserted for one Government, at its own pleasure, to pursue banditti, outlaws, renegadoes, or even its own felons, into the territories of another, in any case, without first demanding that they should be delivered up? Sir, I will detain the commitee no longer on this part of these proceedings. When the order was issued for the advance of our army into Florida, Congress was in session. Subsequent events have shown how greatly it is to be lamented that an appeal had not been made to that body which could only change our relations with Spain, and which was then in the full exercise of its constitutional functions. I have been somewhat surprised at hearing the encomiums which have been bestowed on General Jackson for this incursion into Florida. A vote of thanks has been talked of. He has been called by the imposing names of conqueror, hero, benefactor. Conqueror! If the rout and dispersion of a race of barbarians, degraded and defenceless as the Seminoles, can confer this title, high, indeed, is his elevation. When Tigranes, with two hundred thousand men, had been defeated by Lucullus, with only twenty thousand, the Roman soldiers, after pursuing the enemy for some distance, suddenly stopped, and burst into loud laughter, to think that they had used their swords on such a set of cowardly slaves. Hero! If the blaze of burning towns, the extermination of their wretched inhabitants, the death of captives, and the extirpation of the human race, can confer renown and elevate our nature, glorious and ennobling, indeed, are these achievements. Benefactor! If the honor of our country, the dignity of its character, the justice of its institutions, and the purity of our religion, are sanctified by deeds like these, pour out your full libations of praise, and offer the unaffected homage of a nation's gratitude. How keenly does it wound the sensibility, how low should it sink the pride, of an American, to compare the laurels won upon the plains of Orleans with this sickening nightshade, plucked from the morasses of Florida!

As to the execution of Arbuthnot and Ambrister, I acquiesce in the moral justice of their sentence. Without expressing that opinion from the evidence on their trials, they probably deserved their fate. But I can never admit the legality of the trials, or the punishment which was inflicted. Had they been put to death in the heat of battle, considering the course which they have pursued, I should not have censured it, how much soever I should have regretted such an exercise of power. But they were tried by a court-martial. Such it was originally called in the despatches of General Jackson, and such it is recognized to have been in the letter to Mr. Erving.

I shall vote my disapprobation of the trials of Arbuthnot and Ambrister, because they were executed under the forms of law, and because I am not prepared to avow to the world, that we, who boast so much of our justice, recognize an institution of this nature. I am anxious to blot out this stain upon our national character. Their case was not within the jurisdiction of a court-martial. Courts-martial, among us, are but the mere creatures of positive law. All their authority is derived from the statute which creates them; without that they are nothing.

They can take cognizance of no offences whatever, except those specifically named in the statute. Their jurisdiction over persons is strictly confined to the army and those attached to it, and, without that express authority which has been conferred, I should doubt whether they, as courts-martial, had any jurisdiction even in the case of a spy. They are tribunals of special and limited jurisdiction; their powers cannot be extended by implication, and they are strictly confined to the powers expressly granted to them. What, sir, is the nature of these tribunals? The accuser prefers the charges; the accuser, in the first instance, selects the judges from his own subordinate officers; the accuser appoints the public advocate; the accuser approves or disapproves the sentence; and the accuser executes it. Lamentable would be our situation if courts-martial should be suffered to transgress a single letter of the law which creates them. Their proceedings are contrary to all those safeguards which the municipal law has provided for the security of personal liberty. The charges are not even sanctioned by an oath; the arrest is not founded on oath; the trial is without jury; the decision is in secret, and the correction of their errors depends on the pleasure of him to whom the sentence is submitted. It is now asserted that he may even alter it. By the municipal law of England and of this country, a judge who should venture to pronounce a sentence of death, contrary to the punishment which the law has prescribed; or an officer who should execute even a sentence of death in a different manner from the judgment, would suffer the punishment of death. Is there any thing, then, in the nature or proceedings of a military tribunal, which should induce us to view them with a more partial and indulgent eye? The sword is almost the only emblem of justice which guides them. Shall we now say to Europe that an American army, on entering a foreign country, carries with it these dreadful engines of human misery and oppression? With my consent these transactions shall never be recorded by history as the acts of the nation. Mr. S. here entered into an examination of the charges on which Arbuthnot and Ambrister were tried, and concluded that none of them (except that of being a spy, on which they were acquitted) were cognizable by a court-martial; that they were inconsistent and absurd; and that, as to Arbuthnot, he doubted whether sufficient evidence was produced to establish them.

Seminole War.

The House then proceeded to the order of the day, and again took up, in Committee of the Whole, the report of the Military Committee, on the subject of the Seminole war.

Mr. BARBOUR, of Virginia, rose, and addressed the committee, as follows:

Mr. Chairman, it was my wish to have addressed the committee at an earlier period of the debate, but I have not been so fortunate as to get the floor. The subject under consideration is one which has excited much interest in this House, as well as in the nation. I have bestowed upon it all that reflection which was due to its importance: I feel a disposition to state the conclusions to which I have arrived, and the course of reasoning which has conducted me to them. I feel that I labor under great disadvantages in following gentlemen, whose eloquent and pathetic appeals have affected the feelings and commanded the attention of the committee; whilst, on my part, I have nothing to offer them but the plainest kind of argument, consisting of a statement of the case, and the principles of public and constitutional law which apply to it. I feel another disadvantage: Gentlemen who have gone before me have necessarily anticipated some of the points which I had intended to discuss. In presenting my view, then, in continuity, I must unavoidably recur to some topics which have been already touched upon; but I will promise, as far as I am able, when this shall be the case, to avoid the tedium of mere reiteration, and to endeavor to present them in some new point of light, and with some variety of illustration. I will, however, without further preface or apology, proceed at once to the argument.

This subject seems to me to present three distinct questions to our consideration: 1st, the propriety of marching the Army of the United States across the Florida line; 2dly, the propriety of the occupation of the Spanish posts of St. Marks and Pensacola, and the Barancas; and, 3dly, the trial and execution of Arbuthnot and Ambrister. These are the questions which, it seems to me, we are called upon to decide, and this the natural and consecutive order in which they present themselves. Each of these questions, too, as had been justly remarked by the Speaker in an early part of the debate, presents itself in a twofold aspect—1st, as between our own and a foreign Government; and, 2dly, as between our Government and its officers. First, then, as between the Government of the United States and Spain, had we a right to march our armies across the Florida line? I shall endeavor to prove that we had. There would be no sort of difficulty in this question, if it were the case of a nation confessedly sovereign and independent. That one nation when at war with another, has a right to pursue that other into its own territory, I am persuaded no member of the committee would question; and I shall, therefore, take it for granted, as one of those principles which, in public law, have become axioms; but the difficulty arises from the anomalous character of the Indian tribes. Gentlemen have gone much into the discussion upon the question, whether they are or are not sovereign. I shall not enter into a controversy about words; I care not whether they are called sovereign, demi-sovereign, or by what other name they are designated. I shall attempt to define their character by some of the attributes of sovereignty which belong to them, or which at least they have been in the habitual practice of exercising. One of the criteria of sovereignty which has been adopted by Martens, a writer of some celebrity on public law, is this:

"That a nation is governed by its own laws, and acknowledges no legislative superior on earth; though there are certain limitations or restrictions on its sovereignty, by treaty or otherwise, if it possess this attribute, it is sovereign; and examples are given of States, which, though under treaties of alliance, of protection, and even of vassalage, are nevertheless considered sovereign."

If the character of the Indian tribes be tried by this standard, I believe they will be able to sustain their claim to sovereignty. True, it is, they have no regular legislative body, and no code of written laws, but they have customs and maxims, which may be considered as a sort of common law among them—which have been adopted either by express consent or tacit acquiescence—which have been consecrated by time, and handed down from one generation to another by traditionary history; by these maxims and customs are they governed, without any legislative superior, though we claim a right of regulating their trade, and a kind of pre-emptive right of purchasing their lands; yet I have never heard that we pretended to any right of legislating for them, or interfering in their interior concerns, in the administration of justice or otherwise. But there is another distinguishing and characteristic attribute of sovereignty which belongs to them, and which from the earliest settlement of this country they have exercised—I mean that of making war. This bears directly upon the present question. If they have a right of making war, they have a right to make it against whom they please, and they have chosen to make it against us. Have we not a right to defend ourselves against them? Yes, sir, and I will point you to the source from which we derive it. The principle of self-defence is a part of the instinct of our nature; "not written on the heart by precept, but engraven by destiny; not instilled by education, but infused at our nativity;" it belongs to us, as individuals, in a state of nature; we carry it with us when we form societies, which are only aggregations of individuals. We then have a right to defend ourselves against the Seminole Indians. But they reside within the limits of Florida, on lands to which they have at least the title of occupancy, but within the jurisdictional limits of Spain; from thence they make their incursions against us, and having committed their devastations and murders repass the Florida line. Shall we cease to pursue them when we reach that line? Is there any principle of national law which tells us that, in our pursuit, thus far we shall go, and no further? If these questions must be answered in the affirmative, then is the right of self-defence a mere mockery; then, indeed, are we in the situation of a man against whom a ferocious wild beast is let loose, and who, bound hand and foot, is cut off from the means of destroying him.

I come now, in the order of my argument, to the second question; that is, the propriety of the occupation of the Spanish posts of St. Marks and Pensacola, and the fortress of Barancas; and, first, its propriety as between Spain and the United States; and here, sir, at the threshold, I will lay down a principle, the correctness of which, I presume, will not be questioned—it is this: That, as it regards Spain, if any act shall have been committed which amounts to war, it is to be considered a public war; regularly carried on by the sovereign power of the United States. The different powers which constitute the whole mass of sovereignty, originally resident in a nation, may be separated or limited according to its will; in conformity with this idea, in the distribution of power, the Constitution of the United States has assigned to Congress that of making war. If the President shall ever encroach upon this constitutional power of Congress, either by engaging, without a previous declaration in an offensive war, or in the prosecution of a defensive one, by committing any act of hostility which may amount to war against a neutral nation, any question which may arise out of such a violation of the constitution, will be between himself and Congress. But, surely, it cannot be competent for a foreign power to open our constitution, construe it for us, define the distribution of the powers of sovereignty among the respective departments of our Government, and object that the President has impinged upon the sphere of Congressional jurisdiction. No, sir; as between us and Spain, admitting for the present, that what has been done amounts to war, it is to be considered and treated as a public war duly declared by the proper authority, and therefore to be followed by all the consequences which flow from one of that character. Assuming this, then, as a principle, the United States, as a Government, will stand justified, if we had just cause of war against Spain. Now, without recurring to ancient grievances, which have long been the subject of negotiation between the two nations, I think, sir, there are two palpable causes of war of recent date; the first is, the violation of her neutrality during and immediately after the late war with Great Britain, in suffering her territory, as well as forts erected on it, to be made use of by our enemies, to our great annoyance; the second is a violation of a positive treaty stipulation, in not only not restraining Indian hostilities, but, on the contrary, in giving them countenance and aid. It does not require a reference to books to prove that a violation of neutrality is cause of war; equally plain is the proposition, that the violation of a treaty stipulation is so too. It rests upon this obvious principle, that a positive stipulation in a treaty imposes a perfect obligation on one party, and consequently vests a perfect right in the other; for right and obligation are always correlative.

Now, the violation of a perfect right is on all hands considered as legitimate cause of war.

The next inquiry is, whether the conduct of the Spanish authorities be such as to make them associates in the war; if it were, they were, as I have already remarked, equally our enemies with the Indians, and liable to be treated as such without any necessity for a declaration of war. Vattel, in b. 3, ch. 6, s. 97, says, "I account associates of my enemy, those who assist him, in his war, without being obliged to it, by any treaty." If, sir, we had been left to this definition alone, it might have been fairly contended that the Spanish authorities were associates, because they assisted the Indians in the war, in various ways which I have already enumerated. But the author goes on, afterwards, in the same section, to explain, more particularly, this general proposition; and from a case which he puts, and the reasoning which follows, I acknowledge it to be my own opinion that the assistance afforded was not of that character which he requires, to make them associates, so as to authorize the occupation of those posts, without a declaration of war. Considering the subject in this point of view, it results that this part of the proceedings of the commanding General is not strictly defensible; and yet, sir, I cannot concur in a vote of censure upon his conduct; because, in relation to each of the points, to which I have just called the attention of the committee, the correctness of his course depends upon the decision of a question of degree only. Thus there is a degree of necessity which would justify the seizing and garrisoning a neutral fort, without violating the rights of the neutral to whom it belonged. And there is a degree of co-operation with the enemy, on the part of the Spanish authorities, which would have made them associates; and which would, consequently, have authorized the commanding General to have treated them as his enemies, without the necessity of a declaration of war against them. If, for example, our army had been in imminent danger of being cut off by the enemy, that would have justified their occupation, without making it an act of hostility. If the garrison of St. Marks, or Pensacola, had actually fought with the Indians, or if the Governor of Pensacola had executed his threat, by actually using force, either of these things would have made them completely associates. Here, then, was a graduated scale, before the commanding General, on which there was a degree, both of necessity and military co-operation, which would have strictly justified him. The question for him to decide was, which was that degree? Is there no difficulty in deciding this question? Yes, sir. The nation is divided upon it; the members of this House, after much investigation, after much debate, and quotations from public law, are greatly and variously divided in opinion. Some justify the whole proceedings, some justify a part and disapprove a part. Thus, some think the occupation of St. Marks correct, but not that of Pensacola; some justify the occupation of Pensacola, some approve both, whilst others disapprove both. What one gentleman thinks correct, another altogether reprobates: and even those who agree in the same conclusions, arrive at them by different modes of reasoning.

I come now, sir, in the order of my argument, to the trial and execution of Arbuthnot and Ambrister. I beg leave, in the first place, to call the attention of the committee to the facts, in relation to these two men. Arbuthnot was guilty of exciting and stirring up the Creek Indians to war against the United States, and of aiding and abetting them, by supporting them with the means of war. Ambrister led and commanded the Lower Creeks, in carrying on the war. These are the facts.

Since the institution of Government, if the citizen or subject of one country commit an ordinary outrage against the sovereignty of another, the mode of punishment is a plain and simple one, and is, I believe, almost universally acquiesced in throughout the civilized world. If the guilty person be within the jurisdiction of the offended sovereign, he, without difficulty, punishes him; if he escape and return into his own country, his own sovereign will either inflict exemplary punishment upon him, or, sometimes, deliver him up to the offended State, there to receive justice. But, sir, if, instead of its being an ordinary crime, it have a hostile character; if it be an act of war, in alliance with, or under the auspices of the enemies of the country against which the hostility is committed, then it assumes a different aspect; it is either sanctioned by the nation of the person committing it, or it is not; if it be sanctioned, then it is cause of war against that nation; if it be not, then the person, by thus committing an act of hostility, imparts to himself the character of the people with whom he unites himself. If they be civilized, he, in common with them, is entitled to the laws of civilized war. If they be savage, in like manner he must be content, having embarked himself upon the same bottom, to share the same fate. What that fate may rightfully be, will now be the subject of my inquiry; and here, sir, it will be necessary to ascend to first principles, in order to understand the rights of war, in the various circumstances in which nations may be placed.

"War," says Bynkershoek, page 2, "is a contest by force." The author goes on to remark, that every force is lawful in war; that it is lawful to destroy an enemy, though he be unarmed and defenceless; it is lawful to make use of poison, of missile weapons, &c.; in short, he adds, that every thing is lawful against an enemy. This, then, is the original and fundamental principle of the rights of war. In the progress of time, as civilization advanced, and moderation and philanthropy obtained a great prevalence, the nations of the earth have ingrafted upon this principle many modifications, the whole of which combined constitute what are called the usages of civilized warfare. Though, therefore, by the original principle the mere existence of war made every individual, and every description of property belonging to each country, mutually and reciprocally hostile, and subject to destruction in every possible mode, yet, since the usages of civilized warfare were introduced, certain instruments of war are altogether reprobated, and persons as well as property of certain descriptions, and under particular circumstances, are spared. Sir, at the moment of expressing this sentiment, I behold one memorable exception to this mitigated rule, in an act perpetrated by a nation conspicuous for its civilization. I see the Capitol of my country just rearing its head from a heap of ruin and desolation; in its destruction a lasting monument of British outrage; in its re-edification a magnificent emblem of the recuperative energy of my country! But I will let the pall of oblivion fall upon any painful recollections—I will return to my subject. Those usages of civilized warfare which I mentioned a moment since to the committee, are the subject, though not of express yet of tacit compact; they are founded upon the idea of an equivalent, and based upon the principle of reciprocal obligation. Thus the language of one nation to another is, spare my monuments of art, and I will not ravage your country—spare my people engaged in the peaceable pursuits of agriculture, and I will spare your women and children. Am I asked for the proof of this? It is found at once in the doctrine of retaliation, universally recognized as a sound principle of public law. If, contrary to the rules of modern war, you put my soldiers, when made prisoners, to death, in return I may inflict the same severity upon yours, if, by the fortune of war, they shall chance to fall into my power; because, in this instance, as you have violated your part of the compact in relation to mitigated war, I am consequently absolved from mine, and restored to my original rights. What is an exception merely in civilized States, is the general rule in relation to savages; because, as they never acknowledge the obligations of the rules of modern war, they are without the pale of the compact, and can, therefore, claim no benefit from it. But as against them we have a right, if we choose, to exercise, in its fullest extent, the original rule which I have just laid down. True it is, sir, that we do extend to them many of the benefits of this compact, but it is a gratuitous act on our part, and what, therefore, they have no right to demand; for, in the language of Bynkershoek, though justice may be insisted on in war, yet generosity cannot.

Sir, it was Arbuthnot who poured the secret poison of discontent into the minds of the Indians; it was he who awakened the sleeping tiger and let him loose against us, with all his native ferocity whetted by exasperation; it was he who sharpened with new keenness the edge of the tomahawk; it was he who used the deluded savages as the instrument of his wicked purpose, as the man who stabs you to the heart makes use of the poniard. But, said the Speaker, we have never, in a long series of wars, practised retaliation for Indian barbarity. Sir, this is not retaliation. That consists in a literal execution of the great precept of "an eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth"—that "measures blood by drops, and bates not one in the repay." It is never appeased until it sacrifice just as many victims as the enemy has, and those, too, of the same grade, if within its reach. Thus, if the Indians had killed three hundred of our men, women, and children, we should, upon this principle, put to death an equal number of theirs. Retaliation then not only may, but frequently does, fall upon the innocent. The execution of these two men is, in the most prominent points of view, the reverse of this. Instead of the innocent, we have punished the guilty; instead of counting the victims, and sacrificing an equal number, though we have lost hundreds, we have only executed units. It is said, however, that we have never departed from the rules of modern war but in burning their habitations and destroying their food. Is this departure, indeed, allowable; and will gentlemen yet say, that it is not a measure of more rigorous severity than the death of the two men, who are the subject of this discussion?

When we destroy their habitations, we turn out, not only their warriors, but the old and the young, without respect to age or sex, without a roof to shelter them from the pelting of the pitiless storm. The miserable pittance of property which they own, is all consumed by the same devouring flame which destroys their dwellings and makes them houseless wanderers. When we destroy their food, we expose them to the danger of all the horrors of famine which may involve in indiscriminate death the guilty and the innocent; whilst, in the execution of these men, the guilty only have suffered. Gentlemen have, indeed, in the most glowing colors of pathetic eloquence portrayed to us the sufferings of Arbuthnot and Ambrister. If I could dip my pencil in as vivid colors as they have used, and if I had occasion to use them, I, too, could present a picture which, I am persuaded, would excite the keenest sympathies of the human heart. I would present to you, not two guilty men, suffering death according to the sentence of the law, but a scene of slaughtered innocence—not one or two suffering victims only, but a group, a family group. That is but a miniature painting. To make it as large as life, I would present you almost a national group. The figures represented on it would be, old men bending beneath a weight of years, inhumanly butchered; multitudes of women and children gored with wounds and weltering in their own blood; and others, sleeping in the arms of death, with here and there a solitary survivor to deplore their fate. But, sir, I will not attempt to harrow up the feelings of the committee by even a further description of such scenes—it is not necessary; for I cannot but believe that the execution of these men stands justified by the laws of nature and of nations.

But, it has been objected, that whatever our rights may have been, it was not competent to the commanding General to execute them. Do gentlemen mean to say, that their offences were cognizable before any court having criminal jurisdiction? I answer, that they could not have been tried in the United States; because the acts were not committed within our jurisdictional limits. They could not have been tried in England, for the same reason. And, indeed, though the offences were committed within the territorial limits of Spain, yet the authors of them were on the lands owned, or at least occupied, by the Indians. I do not believe that they could have been tried there—for, I will ask, whether we should claim jurisdiction to punish an offence against a foreign Government, committed by an Indian on the lands occupied by his tribe within our boundary? This, however, is an objection to jurisdiction founded upon locality only. I assume a much higher ground. I object to it upon the ground of the nature and character of the act committed. My principle is this—that it is a right directly derived from, and appertaining to war, and, therefore, the civil power has no jurisdiction over it.

In regard to the court-martial, gentlemen say it had no jurisdiction. This is conceded to be correct; and I have attempted to show, that the power belonged to the commanding General. Although, however, the court had no jurisdiction to decide the fate of the two men, it was not improper through them to get at the facts; and though they had no jurisdiction, it would have been desirable that the General, after submitting the case to them, should have followed the sentence which they pronounced, but for an unanswerable reason, which, I believe, has already been urged, that the punishment which they pronounced in the case in which their sentence was not followed was unknown to the national law, and therefore could not properly be inflicted. I have thus, sir, shown, as I think, that the power of putting these men to death, belonged to us as one of the rights of war, and that it was legitimately exercised by the commanding General; and yet, sir, I acknowledge that I feel a regret at their execution—but what kind of regret? Just such as I would feel for the execution of a man who had been sentenced to death under the municipal law of the country, and in whose favor, under certain circumstances, I might join in a petition for a pardon, which petition was rejected. I could not, however, in the case which I have stated, concur in a vote of censure against the executive officer for refusing this pardon, because he has only executed the sentence of the law; because he has carried into effect the public justice of the country; and, because an act, conformably to law, and in accordance with the principles of justice, even if you call it stern justice, cannot be morally wrong.

Mr. SAWYER, of North Carolina, rose and said—

Mr. Chairman: As it is not my intention to go over the same grounds that other gentlemen have, my observations will be necessarily few. And I am sorry to be obliged to differ with my friend from New York, in the outset, with respect to the powers of this House over the present question.

I think the principle a new one, that Congress has no power to pass any resolution of condemnation or removal, nor of censure, of any military officer. If such a power exists, let it be pointed out. I have examined the constitution, clause by clause, for such a power, but I have searched in vain. The Legislative and Executive powers are distinctly marked and independently delegated, and we cannot pursue this course without infringing upon the rights of the Executive. He is, by the constitution, the Commander-in-chief of all our forces, and to him alone are our officers responsible. Besides, a resolution of this kind implies a censure on our Executive, by intimating that he had been so negligent in his duty or partial in his affections, as to permit a fault in one of his officers to pass unnoticed, which this House might think worthy of animadversion. I have too much confidence in the Executive to believe he would fail to do his duty, upon the commission of any criminal act on the part of General Jackson. But I am yet to learn whether such has been the case on the part of the General. What is the true state of the case? Arbuthnot and Ambrister were apprehended in the Indian country, under such circumstances as would have justified their immediate execution. But General Jackson, wishing to afford proofs to the world of their guilt, ordered a special court of inquiry to convene at St. Marks, the 26th of April last, for the purpose of investigating the charges, and imbodying the evidence against them. [Here, Mr. S. read the order, &c.] This court, as a court of inquiry, had no right to pass judgment. They were sitting merely as jurors, and were to find a verdict of guilty or not guilty. They did find the prisoners guilty of such charges as subjected them to the punishment of death. They found Arbuthnot guilty of both charges; exciting the Creek Indians to war against the United States, and of comforting and supporting the enemy, by furnishing him with the means to carry it on. This was, in fact, treason against the United States; for these Creek Indians were quasi citizens, enjoying the protection, and were under the jurisdiction of the United States, and, notwithstanding Arbuthnot was a foreigner, he could commit treason against the United States as well as a citizen, and would be either punished for it civilly, by being turned over to the civil authority, or by martial law, for such other offences as came under the cognizance of that tribunal. As to Ambrister, it was proved that he gave intelligence to the enemy, and he plead guilty to the second change, that of being a party and even a leader in the war; of course, they brought on themselves and justly deserved that punishment, which the right of retaliation entitled us, and the orders of General Jackson commanded him, to inflict upon the savage foe. The prisoners being found guilty on such charges as subjected them to capital punishment, there was an end of the authority of the court, and it remained with General Jackson to apply the law of the military code, and see it executed. The opinion which the court thought proper afterwards to express, that the offence of Ambrister did not deserve capital punishment, could only be viewed by General Jackson as a recommendation to mercy by several respectable individuals; but which, in obedience to the laws of the army, he could not observe. But it was inconsistent with the sentence which they had already pronounced against Arbuthnot; for they had ordered him to be hung, although he was only an accessory in the war, and how could they condemn Ambrister to a less severe punishment, who was a principal in it! General Jackson was merely reconciling their own decisions, when he, at the same time, conformed to the laws of his country, which forbid the infliction of torture, and was the minister of even-handed justice, that "returned the poisoned chalice to their lips who prepared it."

Although I am hurt at the zeal with which I see this prosecution carried on, and the joy manifested at it from a certain quarter of the House, yet I cannot be so uncharitable as to impute their motives to the conduct of General Jackson prior to this event. Surely no gentleman within these walls can harbor a prejudice against him for his victories over any of our enemies. I must believe their motives are pure, but I cannot but think their views are erroneous. What would they have, even admitting, for argument's sake, that the conduct of General Jackson was not strictly legal? Would they wish to see that man, at his time of life, grown gray in his country's service, dragged before a military tribunal to answer for it? Can his age—can his services—can his victories—plead nothing? Must they all be buried at the shrine of two demi-devils, whose conduct has drawn tons of blood from an unoffending country's breast? I trust not. The blaze of Jackson's glory is too bright, in my eyes, to be obscured by the transaction. But the course proposed is very extraordinary. Are we a self-constituted tribunal, to whom General Jackson is responsible? What purpose can it serve to pass a resolution criminating the commanding General? Have we any authority, and can we claim the privilege of attacking the characters of the best and greatest men among us, and of depriving them of the most "precious jewels of their souls?" This is a new species of legislative domination, dangerous to the liberties of the people. If you claim the use of it, what man can be safe? There is no man of elevated rank but what may be obnoxious to some member of this House; and would it be right for him to use his privilege of a member to assail his character? Will the people endure to be dragged before this council of anatomists, to undergo the worst of all dissections? I for one will not, by any act of mine, sanction the extension of this censorial power over my constituents. The age of proscription, I trust, is over, never to be revived. There is a proper tribunal, clearly marked out by the constitution, for the punishment and censure of every grievance; to that tribunal General Jackson is answerable, and no other. If the President has omitted to do his duty, let the gentleman impeach him; but this criminating course, in this House, is mere brutum fulmen, without any corresponding power, but fraught with great mischief, by fixing a sting in the bosom of a person who is not permitted to be present to make his defence. What effect can the passage of this resolution have? Can it deprive General Jackson of his commission? If the President approves his conduct, will he be driven to act the ungrateful task of dismissing from his service the man whom he may think deserves well of his country, by any officious intermeddling on our part? Sir, I trust the President has too high a sense of his own rights and dignity. The Government—the people—have too high a sense of Jackson's merit, ever to give him up as a victim to the manes of such creatures as Arbuthnot and Ambrister. So far from censure, he deserves the grateful thanks of this House, and I trust he will receive them. I consider we are bound to tender him a vote of thanks, as a balm to his wounded spirit—as an antidote to the worst of all poisons—that which is inflicted with the tooth of ingratitude?

And here I beg leave to quote the General's own words, for, as ably as he has been defended on this floor, I believe his own defence, considering all circumstances, is nearly as good as any that can be made for him. I will take the liberty of reading an extract from his letter of the 5th of May last, dated at Fort Gadsden, to the Secretary of War. This letter affords another proof that he had the heart to conceive, the hand to execute, and the talents to defend, the best measures which the urgency of the occasion required.

"I hope the execution of these two unprincipled villains will prove an awful example to the world, and convince the Government of Great Britain, as well as her subjects, that certain, if slow, retribution awaits those unchristian wretches, who, by false promises, delude and excite an Indian tribe to all the horrid deeds of savage war. Previous to my leaving Fort Gadsden, I had occasion to address a communication to the Governor of Pensacola, on the subject of permitting supplies to pass up the Escambia River to Fort Crawford. This letter, with another from St Marks, on the subject of some United States clothing, shipped in a vessel in the employ of the Spanish Government to that post, I now enclose, with his reply. The Governor of Pensacola's refusal to my demand, cannot but be viewed as a hostile feeling on his part, particularly in connection with some circumstances reported to me from the most unquestionable authority. It has been stated that the Indians at war with the United States have free access into Pensacola, that they are kept advised, from that quarter, of all our movements; that they are supplied from thence with ammunition and munitions of war; and that they are now collecting in a body, to the amount of four or five hundred warriors, in that town; that inroads from thence have been lately made on the Alabama, in one of which eighteen settlers fell by the tomahawk. These statements compel me to make a movement to the west of the Appalachicola, and, should they prove correct, Pensacola must be occupied with an American force, the Governor treated according to his deserts, or as policy may dictate. I shall leave strong garrisons in Forts St. Marks, Gadsden, and Scott, and in Pensacola, should it be necessary to possess it. It becomes my duty to state it as my confirmed opinion, that so long as Spain has not the power or will to enforce the treaties by which she is solemnly bound to preserve the Indians within her territory at peace with the United States, no security can be given to our southern frontier, without occupying a cordon of posts along the shore. The moment the American army retires from Florida the war hatchet will be again raised, and the same scenes of indiscriminate massacre, with which our frontier settlers have been visited, will be repeated, so long as the Indians within the territory of Spain are exposed to the delusion of false prophets and poison of foreign intrigue; so long as they can receive ammunition, munitions of war, from pretended traders and Spanish commandants, it will be impossible to restrain their outrages. The burning their towns, destroying their stock and provisions, will produce but temporary embarrassments. Resupplied by Spanish authorities, they may concentrate and disperse at will, and keep up a lasting and predatory warfare against the United States, as expensive to our Government as harassing to our troops. The savages, therefore, must be made dependent on us, and cannot be kept at peace without being persuaded of the certainty of chastisement being inflicted on the commission of the first offence. I trust, therefore, that the measures which have been pursued will meet with the approbation of the President of the United States; they have been adopted in pursuance of your instructions, and under a firm conviction that they alone were calculated to insure peace and security to the Georgian frontier."

There would have been no end to the war, if he had permitted the enemy to retreat to those strongholds, the Spanish forts, without pursuing them with fiery expedition. The trial was made, and as soon as our forces retraced their steps, the Indians recommenced their system of robbing and murder. Does the gentleman require that we should be at the expense of keeping up a regular standing force throughout the whole extent of the Georgia frontier; to make it an armed barrier against the savages? Ought he not to be satisfied that the war has terminated in the manner it has, in the complete dispersion and conquest of the enemy, by the only mode in which it could be done promptly and completely? Ought he not to be thankful that his constituents can now pursue their peaceful avocations, without hourly apprehensions of murder and conflagration? If any irregularities have happened in the course of this war, leave it to be settled between us and Spain; let us not be guilty of such monstrous ingratitude to our worthy commander as to forget all his services, his midnight vigils, and his uniform success, by passing a string of resolutions which many of us do not comprehend, and which he never could have intended to violate. For, I believe it is not usual to censure a general for his success; he could have expected no worse had he been beaten. This is but poor encouragement to our officers.

TUESDAY, January 26.

Honor to Learning and Philanthropy.

Mr. BASSETT addressed the Chair, and said that he rose to perform a pleasing task, because it was connected with humanity. It was to give praise and honor where praise and honor were due. It was, continued Mr. B., said last night, from that chair, that sensible objects most forcibly attracted us. My heart responds to its truth. Most sensibly did I feel, on beholding in that chair a man whose life has been devoted to the amelioration of the state of man; one who, without influence of kindred or country, and without any aid save that of a common tongue, has passed the vast Atlantic, to make known the hidden powers and blessings of knowledge. Thousands, said Mr. B., are now enjoying the happy fruits of his exertions, and millions to come will reap their profits, and drink again and again of the never-failing spring. I should do injustice to the feelings of the House, to dwell on this subject. Mr. B. then submitted the following resolution, which was read and agreed to:

Resolved, That Joseph Lancaster, the friend of learning and of man, be admitted to a seat within the hall of the House of Representatives.

The bill for the relief of Hannah Ring and Luther Frink, was ordered to a third reading; and the bill for the relief of Lewis Joseph Beaulieu, was taken up, and ordered to lie on the table.

Regulation of Coins.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the committee appointed to inquire whether it be expedient to make any amendment in the laws which regulate the coins of the United States, and foreign coins, made the following report:

That the laws of the United States make all gold and silver coins issued from their Mint, and Spanish dollars, and the parts of such dollars, a legal tender for the payment of debts. The gold coins of Great Britain, Portugal, France, Spain, and the dominions of Spain, and the crowns and five franc pieces of France, are also declared to be a tender, by an act passed on the 29th of April, 1818. These coins, excepting the five franc pieces, had been made legal by two earlier acts, which had been allowed to expire, and their renewal, with slight modification, must be attributed, not to a disregard of the inconveniences which the use of coins so various and unequal in their purity must produce, but to the exigencies of a country endeavoring suddenly to recover a specie circulation. The act of 1816 was accordingly passed but for three years, and will expire on the 29th of April, 1819, after which, no foreign coin but the Spanish dollar will, under our present laws, pass current as money within the United States. The act for establishing a Mint was passed in April, 1792, and it was then expected that foreign coins, including the Spanish dollar, might be disused after three years. But, neither an examination of the laws which regulate the currency of American and foreign coins, nor the observations of the effects which they have as yet produced, will justify us in expecting that a continued reliance upon them will enable us to dispense at any time with foreign coins.

To preserve the coins which are issued from the Mint from being melted and exported, the laws must give them some advantages in internal commerce over foreign coins of equal purity and weight. In respect to the gold coinage of the United States, the Mint depends for its supply of bullion upon banks or individuals, as it does in the coinage of silver. But there is a difficulty in the operations of the Mint, which is peculiar to the coinage of the gold. The relative value of gold to silver is fixed by our law at one to fifteen, which is much below the relative value which is assigned to it in all those countries from which we might have expected to procure it. In Spain and Portugal, the legal value of gold is to that of silver as one to sixteen; and in the colony of Spain with which our intercourse is most frequent and valuable, (Cuba,) its price in commerce is at least seventeen for one. Hence, we are not only precluded in the common course of trade from obtaining gold from these rich sources of supply, but the little which finds its way into the country from other quarters, is drawn from us by the higher estimate which is there placed upon it. In France, the legal value of gold is to that of silver nearly as 1 to 15 1-2. In most parts of Italy, it is somewhat higher. In England, silver coin is only current in small sums; but if a specie circulation shall be restored in that country on the basis of its present mint regulations, the relative value of gold to silver will be about 1 for 15 1-5. The exaction of a seignorage on its silver coins makes the comparison less easy; but the merchant who shall carry bullion to the British mint, will obtain very nearly the same amount of current money for one ounce of pure gold, or 15 1-5 of pure silver. In Holland, the relative value of gold to silver is estimated (if there have been no recent changes in respect to it) at 1 to about 14 3-4. In Germany, and the north of Europe, the value may be stated as rather below an average of 1 to 15. The West Indies, which are probably our most considerable bullion market, estimate gold in proportion to silver very little, if at all, below an average of 1 to 16. And this is done, although some of the most considerable colonies belong to powers whose laws assign to gold a lower relative value in their European dominions. This estimate, which was forced upon many of the colonies by the necessity of giving for gold the price which it commanded in their neighborhood, and particularly in the countries which formed the great sources of their supply, seems to indicate the fair proportion between the metals in the West Indies, since it is believed to have been, in most instances, confirmed by the colonial laws, rather than introduced by them. The difference established by custom in the United States, between coined gold and silver, before the establishment of the present Government, seems to have been nearly as 1 to 15 6-10. The difference proposed by Congress, in their resolution of the 8th of August, 1786, was nearly 1 to 15 1-4; and the reduction in the valuation of gold by the act of April 12th, 1792, to the proportion of 1 to 15, may be attributed to the belief, which was expressed in the report on which that act was founded, "that the highest actual proportion in any part of Europe, very little, if at all, exceeds 1 to 15; and that the average proportion was probably not more than 1 to 14 8-10." The difficulty of obtaining correct information upon points of this kind, makes it not improbable, that there may have been some error as to the state of the Mint regulations of Europe at the period of the report. But, be this as it may, the principle which seems to be assumed in it, that the valuation of gold in this country should be higher than in Europe, would lead to the conclusion, that the present valuation of 1 to 15 is too low.

This conclusion is confirmed by the circumstance of the contract made not long since, between the Bank of the United States and Messrs. Baring and Reed, for the supply of specie. Under this contract, gold and silver were to be furnished, if it were practicable, in equal amounts, according to the American relative valuation of 1 to 15. Upwards of two millions of dollars of silver have been accordingly supplied, but not an ounce of gold.

As the committee entertain no doubt that gold is estimated below its fair relative value, in comparison to silver, by the present regulations of the Mint; and as it can scarcely be considered as having formed a material part of our money circulation for the last twenty-six years, they have no hesitation in recommending that its valuation shall be raised, so as to make it bear a juster proportion to its price in the commercial world. But the smallest change which is likely to secure this object (a just proportion of gold coins in our circulation) is that which the committee prefer, and they believe it sufficient to restore gold to its original valuation in this country, of 1 to 15 6-10.

Seminole War.

The House then again proceeded, in Committee of the Whole, (Mr. PITKIN in the chair,) to the consideration of the report of the Military Committee, and the amendments moved thereto by Mr. COBB, touching the transactions of the Seminole war.

Mr. MERCER addressed the Chair as follows:

The resolutions before us have for their object neither a censure of General Jackson nor of the Executive. Pursuing the natural course of legislation, they ascertain the existence of a public abuse, and recommend the application of a constitutional corrective. They spring from an inquiry into the conduct of the Seminole war, to which the President's Message at the opening of the present session, called the attention of the House. It cannot be forgotten, that, during the two first administrations of the Federal Government, the President, at the commencement of every session of Congress, met in person the two Houses, convened together, and pronounced the address which his Secretary now conveys to us in the form of a Message. In relation to every part of the address, the two Houses separately exercised the unquestioned right of responding. These responses brought into brief review the whole course of administration. All the political acts and the actors of the past year were held open to the scrutiny and opinion of either House.

Such was the operation given to this Government by the framers of the constitution, who filled the first Congress which assembled after its ratification. Such continued to be its operation for the first twelve years of its existence.

During the last eighteen years, this practice has been disused, but it would be difficult to prove that the powers of this House have been abridged by the substitution of the President's Message for his speech. Like the latter, the former yet undergoes, at the opening of each session, a political analysis, which terminates in the reference of every important member of it to some committee, charged with the duty of reporting an opinion upon the subject which it embraces, and of recommending, if necessary, some correspondent act of legislation. Hence the origin of the report which has given rise to the present debate.

Is it not absurd to imagine, even, said Mr. M., that the President of the United States can apprise this House that its highest powers have been usurped? That the constitution has been violated, and yet no complaint can be made of the usurpation, nor any exertion to prevent its recurrence?

I find myself arrested, Mr. Chairman, on the very threshold of my first proposition, by the assertion of one of my colleagues, (Mr. SMYTH,) that the Indians cannot wage war; because, he added, they do not make prisoners of war; while another honorable member, (Mr. JOHNSON,) who preceded him on the same side of the question, maintained that our statute book contains a declaration of perpetual war against all the Indian tribes within our limits. Let the statute book answer these extraordinary doctrines. The aborigines of this country have been our associates, or our neighbors, for more than two centuries; and we have maintained towards them, during that period, relations of commerce and amity, as well as of war, by the same means by which we have regulated our intercourse with other States. Instead of recurring to the treaty and correspondence of Ghent, allow me to consult the volume which I hold in my hand, and to ascertain, from our own intercourse with this unfortunate race of men, in what light we have hitherto regarded them. To ascend no further back than to the formation of our Union, the first volume of the laws of the United States will afford us Indian treaties, embracing every variety of stipulation known in the diplomatic intercourse of the most polished nations; from the articles of agreement and confederation with the Delaware nation, a treaty of alliance and commerce, concluded at Fort Pitt in 1798, down to the articles of agreement and capitulation, a treaty of conquest, but of peace also, concluded at Fort Jackson in 1814. In direct contradiction of the assertion of my colleague, we find among the intermediate conventions stipulations for the mutual exchange of prisoners of war; and, in hostility with the doctrine contended for by the honorable member from Kentucky, the far greater number of them are treaties of peace, promising the oblivion of past injuries, and the establishment of perpetual friendship. Nor will a recurrence to the history of the United States authorize an unfavorable comparison of the good faith of these untutored savages with that of our more polished European allies. With the Chickasaw and Choctaw nations we have made several treaties of boundary, but have had occasion to make no treaty of peace since that of Hopewell, concluded two and thirty years ago, under the old confederation. The treaty of Greenville, with the Northwestern Indians, endured from 1795 till the battle of Tippecanoe, in 1813. The first treaty with the Creeks and Seminoles, concluded with the White Chief, McGilvray, in New York, in 1790, was, with the exception of some border hostilities with Georgia, of questionable origin, and terminated by the treaty of Colerain, in June, 1796, preserved inviolate till 1815. Compare these dates, sir, with those of our treaties with England, France, and Spain. Call to mind the repeated violations of these treaties, and then ask your conscience if it will permit you to cast an imputation of bad faith on your savage neighbors.

It has not, and I presume will not be pretended, that the destruction of the negro and Indian fort near the mouth of the Appalachicola, was required by any absolute necessity. The Governor of Pensacola, so far from authorizing the act, expresses his expectation "that, until he receives the decision of his Captain General, no steps will be taken by the Government of the United States, or by General Jackson, prejudicial to the sovereignty of the King of Spain, or the district of Appalachicola, a dependency of his Government." It cannot be pretended that this hostile measure was taken with the consent of the Seminole Indians; and if, as I hope, it was done without the order of the President of the United States, it was certainly without any legitimate sanction—the authority of Congress.

If the alleged reason for this wanton injustice were deemed sufficient to warrant it, "that the fort had become a refuge for runaway negroes and disaffected Indians," where would it carry us? With what neighboring nation, civilized or savage, could we preserve relations of amity? Will it be pretended that we have a right to punish disaffection in those who owe us no allegiance; or to recover by violence the persons of our fugitives, whether bond or free? The attempt to gloss over this cruelty by the suggestion that the force of the miserable negroes was "daily increasing, and that the fertile banks of the Appalachicola were about to yield them every article of subsistence," is calculated to shed additional horror over a transaction wanton in its motive, and savage in its execution. A war upon the peaceful negro settlements on the Wabash would be equally politic, and, in principle, alike justifiable.

I have thus traced the Seminole war, Mr. Chairman, to the unauthorized invasion of East Florida in 1816; but, from thence to the month of October of the ensuing year, the terror inspired by this act seems not to have produced the usual retaliation of savages—the indulgence of private revenge. Along a line of four hundred and seventy miles, from the mouth of the St. Marys to the intersection of the Perdido, by the thirty-first degree of latitude, we hear, in fact, of scarcely an Indian aggression. The destruction of their fort, and the murder in cold blood of two of their chiefs, must have inspired the sentiment of hostility, but they wanted the means of indulging it. Even at the moment when the friendly Indians of Fowltown, who had preserved their neutrality during the whole Creek war, were assailed by order of the American General, there had been no invasion of our territory by any Indian force. Stories, indeed, sir, have been told us of Indian massacres, at the recital of which my very soul sickened; and, were it not for the documents on our table, I should believe that the tomahawk and scalping-knife had deluged our Southern frontier with blood. But, in addition to the President's declaration on the 16th of November, 1817, that we were at peace with the Indian tribes, I discover that, with but two exceptions, that murder of a family on St. Mary's River, and of some travellers five hundred miles off in the Alabama Territory—transactions which I deplore as much as any man—we were ourselves the aggressors. The unfortunate detachment of Scott, (the attack upon which is said to have given a new character to the Seminole war, and to have justified the invasion of Florida,) fell a victim to savage revenge, upon the river Appalachicola, without the territory of the United States. After the destruction of the Indian fort in the preceding year, was it too much to expect that the Seminole Indians would resist the progress of another armed force through the bosom of their territory? Had they to consult authorities for the right of self-defence? They recurred to that which nature has stamped upon the hearts of all men. Sir, these Indians are represented to have been sufficiently powerful to be the objects of our fears. They must be regarded as independent of us from our own express acknowledgment. Spain asserted that they had subverted her sovereignty; and, under our constitution, war could not be waged upon an independent neighboring power without the authority of Congress. At one moment, indeed, we hear the Indians of East Florida styled wretched savages, outlawed Creeks, fugitive slaves. At another they are represented to be capable of bringing a force of thirty-five hundred men into the field, a force equivalent to half our military establishment, and the most alarming necessity is plead to justify the infraction of the neutrality of Spain in our hostilities against them.

I will now proceed to consider the alleged necessity of seizing those fortresses. And, first, that of St. Marks. General Jackson, as early as the 25th day of March, soon after crossing the Florida line, announced his intention of taking St. Marks "as a depot for his supplies, should he find it in the possession of the Spaniards, they having supplied the Indians." That he derived no right to take it from the latter use of it, I have already demonstrated, and that he derived none from the use which he meant to make of it himself, an attention to the local position of St. Marks will readily evince. St. Marks is situated one hundred and four miles to the northwest of the Suwannee towns, the main object of General Jackson's campaign. It stands on the bank of the river to which it has given or owes its name, and nine miles above its mouth. The fort is surrounded by an open prairie, about two miles across, and below it extends an open forest of pine. As a military depot, a position below St. Marks, on the same river, would have been more accessible to the vessels, which were to furnish supplies from New Orleans; and the labor of a fatigue party, for a few days, would have constructed, of the adjacent forest, a protection sufficiently strong to resist the attack of any savage force which could have threatened the safety of the position. Such is the necessity, on which this infraction of neutral right is grounded. The Spanish fort deriving its supplies, also, from the water, would have been dependent on the American, and the danger of an Indian attack, which threatened St. Marks, before the arrival of the American army, had ended with its approach. Nor is it the least extenuation of this unauthorized act of war, that discoveries were made, after the capture of the fort, which evinced that its commander was unfriendly to the American arms. The antecedent act should be tried by its own evidence. The subsequent discoveries, if they amounted to any thing, constituted, as I have remarked, a cause of war against Spain, which General Jackson had no right to declare, or to wage, without a declaration.

St. Marks was more than a hundred miles from the Suwanee towns. To reach Pensacola, it was necessary to march across West Florida one hundred and fifty miles further from the principal theatre of the war. The necessity, however, which urged the occupation of the capital of West Florida is, if possible, less apparent than that which was plead for the seizure and occupation of St. Marks. The defeated Indians had retired down the peninsula of Florida, or crossed over it towards St. Augustine. Fort Gadsden and the Appalachicola River, to say nothing of St. Marks, then in our possession, cut off their retreat upon Pensacola. Above Pensacola itself, on the Cannco, a branch of the Escambia, Fort Crawford served as a check upon the Indians in that vicinity, and fifty miles from this last position stood the American fort Montgomery, on the Alabama. The desert country between the Appalachicola and the Bay of Pensacola, contained neither Spaniards nor Indians; yet, on the 5th of May, after having discharged a part of his force, and proclaimed the war to be at an end, General Jackson announces to his Government his intention to occupy Pensacola, if certain reports, which he had heard, should prove true, while the whole tenor of his letter of that date evinces a determination to occupy it at all events. He expresses it to be his confirmed opinion, "that, so long as Spain has not the power or will to enforce the treaty, by which she is solemnly bound to preserve the Indians within her territory at peace with the United States, no security can be given to our Southern frontier, without occupying a cordon of posts along the seashore." After the seizure of Pensacola, he enforces the same reasoning, in an argument in favor of its restoration.

In the subsequent proceedings of General Jackson, a more striking illustration is offered of the extent to which his conduct was influenced by this threat. Not satisfied with the seizure of Pensacola, without resistance, he proceeded fourteen miles below it, invested, and, after a heavy cannonade of many hours, took the fortress of the Barancas and the Governor, by capitulation. Nor did he stop here; but, regarding the Spanish troops as prisoners of war, and all West Florida as a conquered country, he shipped the former to the Havana, and usurped over the latter the civil, as well as military, administration. One of my honorable colleagues has, with singular felicity, offered the same apology for these defensive measures of the American commander which he allows to the Emperor of France for subverting the Prussian monarchy. The honor of the French arms required that a threat should be repelled! Sir, the force of the argument will appear very nearly the same, in both cases, when reference is had to the relative strength of the combatants; but there is this remarkable difference between the Emperor of France and General Jackson, that the former was the acknowledged sovereign of France, and the latter had merely usurped the authority of Congress to make war upon a foreign State. Whether General Jackson's conduct was in obedience to his orders, as my honorable colleague (Mr. SMYTH) has so earnestly and ingeniously maintained, is a question between him and the authority from which he derived them, except so far as regards the pernicious example of military insubordination, which is afforded by the impunity of this act.

Allow me, also, Mr. Chairman, to say, that, although Spain, in my opinion, has given us ample cause of war, I am decidedly opposed to a declaration of hostilities against her. We claim, I understand, as our western boundary, the territory west of the Mississippi, as far as the Rio del Norte. If by treaty it is ours, let it be occupied by our arms; and, having taken possession of that which belongs to us, let us tender to Spain the exchange of that part of it adjacent to her Mexican possessions, for Florida, which she does not want, and which would be to us of great value. If she shall now reject this proposition, the time must speedily arrive when she will perceive it to be her interest to accede to it. So far would I go, and no farther. Not from any apprehension of the power of Spain, but for reasons of policy, too obvious to require to be enforced. A war, even with Spain, would cripple that commerce, on the prosperity of which materially depends the future growth of our yet infant navy. In such a war we would have to contend, not with Spain alone, but to encounter, under the disguise of a Spanish flag, the enterprise and resources of France, of England, and I greatly fear of some of the most abandoned of our own citizens.

Having, Mr. Chairman, consumed so much of the time of the committee on the first propositions which I proposed to sustain, I shall pass, with more brevity, over the last, which involves the character rather than the constitution of our Government. In the inquiry, whether the rules of judicial proceeding in the trial of military officers have been wantonly disregarded in the trial and execution of Arbuthnot and Ambrister, an unexpected difficulty is started by our opponents, who question whether the special court which tried them was a court-martial, or a mere board of officers. It was not sufficient, it seems, that General Jackson informed the Secretary of War that "Arbuthnot and Ambrister were tried under his orders by a special court of select officers; legally convicted; legally condemned; and most justly punished:" or, that he calls the court a court-martial wherever he speaks of it, whether in his letters, or his general orders. His friends, acknowledging their utter incapacity to defend him, on his grounds, persist in denominating the court a mere board of officers. Its proceedings they regard as subject to no legal restraint; its judgment as mere counsel or advice, submitted to the discretion of the General, to be altered or extended at his mere pleasure. Is their view then, sir, correct? Were Arbuthnot and Ambrister tried by a court-martial, or merely examined by a board of officers? A court-martial is either a general court for the trial of all offences whatever, or a regimental or garrison court, for the trial of offences not capital. The former must consist of five, and may consist of thirteen officers. The latter cannot exceed three. A prisoner was here sentenced to death, and the assemblage of officers who sentenced him to that punishment consisted of thirteen; it was, therefore, either a general court-martial or no court at all. A general court-martial is required, by the rules and articles of war, to consist of "any number of commissioned officers from five to thirteen; but it shall not consist of less than thirteen, where that number can be convened without manifest injury to the service." The court which tried Arbuthnot and Ambrister consisted of thirteen officers, with a supernumerary appointed to act, in case of unforeseen absence or incapacity of any one of that number. A general court-martial is required to have a judge advocate, whose duty it is to administer to the officers the oath prescribed by the sixty-ninth article of war, and to act as counsel for the accused as well as the court. The court which tried Arbuthnot and Ambrister had a judge advocate, who administered the oath required by law, and interrogated the witnesses. The prisoner may challenge any member of a general court-martial appointed to try him. Arbuthnot and Ambrister were called upon to exercise this privilege. The prisoner before a court-martial is regularly arraigned upon charges and specifications filed against him. So were Arbuthnot and Ambrister. He is entitled to counsel if he requires it. Arbuthnot made application for counsel, and counsel was allowed him. A court-martial sits with open doors, except when it decides a question, and then the doors are closed. So proceeded the court which tried these prisoners. A court-martial has only a limited jurisdiction, both as to offences and persons. So this court decided, for, of the third charge and specification against Arbuthnot, the court decided, "upon the suggestion of a member, after mature deliberation, that it had no jurisdiction." A court-martial can sit, unless by express permission from the officer creating it, only between certain hours of the day. This court was, by order, allowed to sit without regard to hours. In the organization of a general court-martial the members are seated alternately, according to rank, on each side of the President. So was this court arranged. A court-martial records, along with a minute of its proceedings, all the testimony laid before it. So did this court. It is its special province to decide on the guilt or innocence of the accused, and on the punishment, if any, which shall be inflicted upon them. So was this court required to do, and so it did. A general court-martial is required to pronounce upon every charge and specification exhibited against a prisoner. This court obeyed this requisition by acquitting the prisoner, Arbuthnot, of being a spy, and responding to all the charges and specifications against him except that, of which they disclaimed any jurisdiction. A general court-martial cannot sentence a prisoner to death, without the concurrence of two-thirds of its members. A concurrence of two-thirds of the court is here certified.

The general order of the 29th of April, commanding the immediate execution of Arbuthnot and Ambrister, uncondemned even to this day, nay, more than tacitly approved, is, Mr. Chairman, a stain on the records of the judicial proceedings of this nation, to the insecurity of the honor and life of every officer and soldier of the armies of the United States, and of every citizen of America, who may be legally, or otherwise, subjected to the judgment of a court-martial; a proceeding which imperiously calls for the interposition of the authority of Congress, in order that, instead of being converted into a precedent for future imitation, it may be shunned as an object of abhorrence. Sir, it is no little cause of alarm to behold the highest military court of criminal justice, which should be the shield of innocence, converted into a rod of oppression. While I listened with equal attention and delight to the eloquent and able argument of my honorable friend from New York, I thought that even he underrated the security which a military court is designed to afford to an innocent prisoner. I thought he supposed that a military judge was not sworn to discharge the duties of his office with fidelity and impartiality. [Mr. STORRS arose to explain. He had remarked, he said, that the charges were not sworn to on which a prisoner was arrested.] I misunderstood my honorable friend, said Mr. MERCER; but even here the charge must be sanctioned by the honor of an officer. A general court-martial derives its appointment from the sound discretion of the highest military authority in an army; its sentence is inoperative until it receives his approbation; and any officer who should seek, by the instrumentality of such a court, to gratify secret resentment or malignity, would render himself odious to his whole corps.

Who, sir, were the other captives condemned to death? It has been said of some of the Suwanee chiefs, that he was the author of the massacre of Scott's detachment, destroyed, as I have proved, in that Indian territory which our army was not only preparing to invade, but had, in fact, invaded; and the participation of this chief in the bloody massacre which closed this scene, is unsustained by any proof whatever.

As to his unfortunate comrade, the Indian Prophet, what are his imputed crimes? That he was, himself, the victim of superstition; that he deluded his wretched followers. Such was the guilt, sir, of all the augurs and soothsayers of the ancient republics, sometimes Prætors, Consuls, and Dictators, not to Rome alone, but to a conquered world. A guilt, in which lies still involved three-fourths of the human race; many of whom yet groan, in cities, in palaces, and temples, beneath a superstition, compared with which, the religion of the wandering inhabitants of our western wilds is simple, peaceful, and consolatory. Or did his guilt consist in returning home with a foreign commission, after having crossed the Atlantic in quest of aid, to sustain the sinking fortune of his tribe? Has it, then, become a crime, in our day, to love our country; to plead her wrongs; to maintain her rights; or to die in her defence? Sir, had not the God I worship, a God of mercy as well as truth, taught me to forgive mine enemies, did he, as the Great Spirit whom the Seminole adores, allow me to indulge revenge; were I an Indian, I would swear eternal hatred to your race. What crimes have they committed against us, that we have not, with superior skill, practised upon them? Whither are they gone? How many of them have been sent to untimely graves? How many driven from their lawful possessions? Their tribes and their very names are almost extinct. My honorable colleague, (Mr. BARBOUR,) who differs from us on this question—my honorable friend I will call him, for he inspired that sentiment, while he eloquently described the wrongs and sufferings of this unhappy race—will not condemn in a poor Seminole Indian that love of country, of which, if it be indeed a crime, no man is more guilty than himself. But it seems he was an Indian. The Suwanee chief, his comrade, was so too. Arbuthnot and Ambrister, who inspired their counsels and led them to combat, are to be regarded as themselves, and, under the law of retaliation, they were all liable to suffer death, at the pleasure of General Jackson. And thus, Mr. Chairman, the clemency which has been observed, for two centuries, in all our conflicts with the aborigines of America, is at length discovered to have been an impolitic abandonment of the rights which we derive from the laws and usages of war. Nay, sir, the victories of all our former commanders, in all other Indian wars, are cast into the shade, in order to magnify the effect of this new policy. In the hard-fought battle of Point Pleasant, in which I have heard that three hundred Virginians fell, my colleague (Mr. SMYTH) tells us, that only eighteen Indian warriors were found dead on the field. Before the impetuous charge of the gallant Wayne, but twenty fell. At Tippecanoe, but thirty. On the banks of the Tallapoosa, General Jackson left eight hundred Indians dead. Sir, it is consolatory to humanity to look beyond these fields of slaughter, to the peace which followed them, the only object of a just war. From the battle of Point Pleasant to the present day, Indian hostilities have ceased in Virginia. The victories of Wayne led to the treaty of Greenville, and was followed by a peace of eighteen years. The treaties of Hopewell, of New York, and of Colerain, preceded by no battles, were succeeded by a peace, which, with the Creeks and Seminoles, it required, after the lapse of nineteen years, another British war to disturb; and which, with the Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians, endures to this moment. While the splendid victory of Tallapoosa, and the treaty of Fort Jackson, have not yet, it is said, secured to us peace, although aided by our new code of retaliation, and its practical commentary, the execution, in cold blood, of four Indian captives.

Mr. COLSTON said that he rose at that late period of the debate, trusting that the committee would excuse his trespassing, for a short time, upon their attention, whilst he discharged his duty to himself, his constituents, and his country, by expressing his sentiments on this important question, involving, as it did, the constitution and laws of the country. In the investigation of it, he would not be deterred from expressing his opinion freely, either by the declarations of those high in authority, that General Jackson's conduct must be defended, or by the character of the individual who was the subject of this investigation, or by any of those means which had been used to prevent the expression of disapprobation by those who thought his conduct censurable.

Sir, had an ordinary man said that the Governor of an independent State had no right to issue a military order to the militia of that State, under his command, whilst an officer of the United States was in service, we should have smiled at his ignorance of our peculiar form of Government; but the same doctrine, coming from General Jackson, becomes dangerous. Had one individual indulged in the same style of correspondence with another individual, which is used in the letters to the Governor of Georgia, we should have considered it rude; but, coming from a general in the service of the United States, and that officer General Jackson, it has an awful squinting towards the degradation of State authorities—the prostration of State sovereignties, with the preservation of which is connected the best interests of this nation. And, finally, had a man unknown to fame, executed two individuals, without any law of this nation to justify it, we should have found no difficulty in giving to the deed a name; but, when it is done under claim of military authority, it constitutes a political offence of a much higher and more dangerous nature. Such acts, he must confess, roused all his jealousy of military power and military usurpations.

With regard to entering Florida, much national law had been quoted to justify the measure; but all those principles apply to sovereign powers, and only serve to show that this nation, in its high sovereign capacity, would have had a right to order its armies into that province, without giving just cause of offence to Spain. But where is this sovereign power lodged by the constitution of this country? In Congress, unquestionably, and not in the Executive. I am not prepared, however, to say that, being once involved in war with the Seminoles, the Executive had no right, even under our form of Government, to order the troops into Florida, without the consent of Congress, as an incident to that war. But here another question will arise as to the power of the Executive to enter into that war, without a law. The wars which have heretofore been waged against Indian nations have always been against those within our acknowledged territorial limits. The use of the army against them has resembled more the case of suppressing an internal enemy, than waging a foreign war. The President, therefore, has, under the authority of a general law, exercised the power of calling out the militia, and sending against them the military force of the United States, without a particular law to authorize it; but surely the case is very different in relation to Indian nations without our territorial limits, and, as far as regards us, to all intents and purposes independent. With regard to these, he had no doubt the assent of Congress to the war was as necessary by the constitution as in any other war whatever, although he had no doubt the omission to obtain that assent arose from the former practice of the Government, and their not having reflected upon the change in circumstances, which, in the present instance, required a change of that practice. He was never disposed to blame, upon slight grounds, the Executive Magistrate of the Government. But these two last questions were entirely of a domestic nature, and were only differences of opinion as to the mode of exercising a right unquestionably belonging to the nation; and, as he before observed, that Spain had no right to complain of the entrance into Florida, so also she has no right to inquire into the legality of this war against the Seminoles. But, with regard to other acts in the progress of the war, of which Spain has just reason to complain, which might have involved this nation in a foreign war, and which did, in effect, amount to a war on her part against Spain, let us again recur to the original question, whether they proceed from the Executive, or were the acts of General Jackson, upon his own responsibility.

To ascertain this, let us examine his orders. They were given to General Gaines on the 16th of December, 1817, and are referred to in the order directing General Jackson to take the command of the army. In those orders the Executive strictly conforms to the established laws of nations; they permit the army to cross the Florida line, if necessary, but expressly direct that, if the Indians should even take shelter under a Spanish fort, and be protected by them, not to attack the place, but report it to the War Department, and wait for further orders. Did General Jackson obey these orders? Let St. Marks, Pensacola, and the Barancas answer. But I am not disposed to censure General Jackson unjustly; there may have been some reason for his taking St. Marks, notwithstanding his orders. As far as the laws of nations are concerned, it might certainly be justified by a milder code than that from which he has drawn his definition of a pirate. But where was the necessity of taking Pensacola and the Barancas? General Jackson himself shows that there was none; for, in his letter of the 20th of April, he states that the war may be considered at an end—that only a few Red Sticks, &c., remained, who were not a formidable enemy, and that even if the war were renewed, the posts they then had, with only a small military force, would be sufficient to restrain the Indians. If this be the case, where the necessity of taking Pensacola? General Jackson himself does not put it upon the ground of necessity, nor entirely upon the ground of their hostility, manifested by affording comfort and supplies to the Indians; for that could not have justified him, inasmuch as his orders had forbidden him to attack a Spanish fort, even under circumstances of much greater hostility, viz., the Indians taking shelter under it, and being protected by it. What, then, is the immediate cause assigned for the capture of that place? He states that on the 23d of May, being then in full march towards Pensacola, he received a protest from the Governor of that place, which protest Mr. C. was surprised to hear some gentlemen call a threat. Now, what was this protest? Only that he disapproved of General Jackson's conduct in approaching his command with a large military force, in a time of profound peace between the two nations, without having given those explanations and security against aggressions which the neutral has always a right to demand; and a declaration, that, if the aggression was continued, that is, his post attacked, he should repel force by force. And this General Jackson construes into such a manifestation of hostility, that he no longer hesitated upon the course to be pursued, but marched the next day to take possession of the place. A manifestation of hostility, sir! What could the Spanish officer have done less? He did his duty merely, and less would have been inconsistent with his own honor, or that of his nation. In this transaction, sir, General Jackson seems to have yielded to the impressions of anger, that any one should have dared to oppose the slightest obstacle to his wishes. He took the place in violation of his orders; and, in violating them, he violated the constitution of his country, and for this the Congress of the United States should express their decided disapprobation. And yet some gentlemen speak of voting thanks. Thanks, sir, for what? Mr. C. confessed that, for his part, in the conduct of the Seminole war, he saw but little to approve, and much, very much, to censure.

WEDNESDAY, January 27.

Seminole War.

The House then proceeded to the orders of the day, and resumed in Committee of the Whole, (Mr. NELSON in the chair,) the report of the Military Committee on the subject of the Seminole war.

Mr. STROTHER said, that at that late hour of the day, when the subject had been so much exhausted, and the attention of the committee so much wearied, he with reluctance engaged in the debate; but his excuse would be found in the artificial importance the subject had assumed by the wide excursions in which gentlemen had indulged, embracing, in the scope of their arguments, not only the illustrious chief against whom the attack is directly aimed, but mounting up to the Executive, and charging him with a violation of the constitution.

He said, the advocates of these resolutions claimed to be the exclusive guardians of the constitution: a portion of them, he admitted, held the title by prescription; they had sounded the tocsin when the midnight judiciary disappeared; they had raised a warning voice against the embargo, and the whole restrictive system, as infractions of that sacred charter; and they protested against rejoicing for the brilliant victories achieved by our heroic armies and gallant navy, as unbecoming a moral and religious people: when now called upon, as formerly, to put the finger upon the principle which is wounded in that instrument, they cannot agree upon the point where it is to be found; it was an intangible, fleeting principle, which eludes the grasp of examination. He claimed no participation in the vision, but he claimed a conscientious discharge of duty, and the credit of the humble endeavor to vindicate the honor of the nation, and to preserve the constitution inviolate.

He objected to the mode of proceeding; he denied Congress had power to proceed in this manner; the bright page that records the immortal deeds of our ancestors, and the happiness of this favored people, is shaded by the paroxysms of party heat. The Congress of the United States once stepped down from the elevated duties of legislation, to censure the self-created democratic societies; it was then the eloquent Ames sung the syren song that spell-bound the people: the delusion was but for a season; the enchantment dissolved; the nation awakened from its trance, and, gifted with the energy that freedom bestows, sprung upon that basis of correct principle upon which the present Administration stands; then the democratic party contended, in vain, that the right to the proceeding was not vested in this House. On another occasion, when the army, commanded by St. Clair, sustained a bloody and disastrous defeat, a democratic member proposed a resolution, requesting the then President, General WASHINGTON, to set on foot an inquiry into the causes of that inglorious affair; the Federal majority rejected the proposition as unconstitutional, and improperly interfering with the powers of the Executive department.

Each party was correct when contending for the negative, as will appear from an examination of the question. This is a Government of departments, shedding light, emitting heat, and promoting political health. When each revolves in its peculiar orbit, the limits and extent of each are distinctly marked out in the constitution. Congress can speak an army into existence; by repealing the law that gave it being, you annihilate it; or, by refusing to appropriate the means of subsistence, it languishes and expires. The management of this army is placed in the hands of the Executive; speak it into existence, it bounds into another sphere beyond your control. This division of power is wisely ordained—guarding against this dangerous machine by legislative jealousy, and giving it energy and promptitude of movement by the Executive. This army, existing by your will, is only responsible to the Executive and the Judiciary. Personal wrong, and the invasion of private rights, give the courts jurisdiction. If the peace of the nation is compromitted, and its honor tarnished, the Executive holds the corrective; and, if this high constitutional officer sleeps at his post; if he shield the delinquent, and hesitates to redeem the sullied justice of his country, he becomes accessory—is implicated in the guilt, and subjects himself to punishment, by impeachment. The inconvenience and impracticability of exercising this power, prove it is not granted to this department of the Government. If it is your right and your duty to stoop beneath the Commander-in-chief, to lay hold of a Major General, it is equally incumbent upon you to descend into the ranks; place a private soldier into legislative inquisition, and gravely discuss, and sagely decide, upon his demerits. The doctrine contended for lays hold of both ends of the Military Establishment. He said, amidst the awful convulsions of the French revolution, the convention wasted an entire night in examining a sergeant; descending from "riding in the whirlwind, and directing the storm," to the examination of a soldier. Some claim the right to censure, as the correlative of the practice of giving thanks. He denied that this practice was predicated upon right. This is no novel idea, intended for the present moment. In a proposition to return thanks to General Wayne, for the brilliant victory of the Miami, Mr. Tracy and others denied that Congress possessed this power. The practice has grown out of usurpation. It can only be claimed upon the presupposition that Congress represent the entire sovereignty of the people, and reflect their feelings. On the contrary, the members of this House are only special agents, for limited and defined purposes. This power is not delegated to you by any affirmative grant, nor is it incidental to any express grant. When Congress, warmed by the gratitude which glowed in the bosom of this nation, poured out the rich libation of its thanks, and entwined the laurel around the brow of the hero, no one paused to inquire if, beneath the leaf, the asp was hid, whose poison would wither that laurel, and sting the wearer to death.

No, sir, this people have not constituted you the agents to confer her thanks, or to select objects of benevolence, and distribute her gratuities. More arduous employments are assigned—more important duties imposed. You have been tolerated in weaving eulogies, and braiding and festooning them with all the art of taste and criticism, to decorate the favorite of the day. It was an innocent waste of time; it did not render a heroic deed more brilliant, nor did it sully the bright chastity of a well-earned renown. But when you censure, you desert legislation; you exercise high judicial power; you inflict punishments upon ex parte examination; you deprive a man of that property which he holds in a cherished reputation; that property which he hugs nearest to his heart, and which is the richest and most precious patrimony of his descendants; your censure "rives and blasts like the lightning of heaven," leaving its victim exposed to scorn and contumely, and brings him to trial, if a military court shall be ordered, with presumed guilt, and anticipated conviction. By practice you are the grand almoners of the nation. In the spirit of beneficence, you made a magnificent donation to a South American province; charity cast her mantle over the act, and the nation would not rend the veil. Sir, this nation has a heart to feel, and magnanimity to forgive, when the error is on the side of generosity and humanity. Build upon this acquiescence a right to punish; touch but a vested right in the humblest citizen, and its justice will lead you back to the constitution, the instrument of your power and their protection.

But, admitting that this House possess the power, the transactions of the Seminole war do not justify its exercise. The advocates of the resolutions, by different routes, arrive at one common conclusion: one contends that the President made war, and usurped the powers of this House; others take post at the thirty-first degree of south latitude, and some few push on to Pensacola, and contend that there the original sin was committed—there the forbidden fruit was eaten that stains the whole Government with the guilt of violating the constitution, and insulting the majesty of the King of Spain. Many, to be sure, Mr. Chairman, drop by the way, and fill up the intermediate chasms. Did the President make war, and usurp the powers of Congress, the just exposition of our constitution is best seen, and most clearly understood, in the uninterrupted practice of this Government. The Administration of Washington, to which we all look with pride, and many with regret, as the good old constitutional times, presents the first link in that chain of precedent which reaches down to the present transaction. This Government found several of the States engaged in hostilities with the Indians. The President communicated this circumstance to the first Congress, who immediately appropriated money; and a bloody contest ensued, distinguished only by appropriations and defeat. Harmar's army sprung from an appropriation bill; that commanded by the unfortunate St. Clair stood upon the same basis, and when its disastrous defeat roused the Government to the miserable condition of the frontier, the military establishment was considerably increased, and placed under the command of the gallant Wayne, who infused his martial spirit into that army, and achieved the victory which gave peace and tranquillity to the harassed and bleeding frontier. As early as 1792, Congress vested power in the President to call out the militia to suppress insurrections, or repel invasion from any foreign power or Indian tribe. The power transferred by that act being insufficient to the purpose contemplated, in 1795 another law was enacted, clothing him with further power—authorizing him to take advantage of the indications of hostility—to anticipate the approach of the storm, and to strike before the elements of havoc and desolation were collected together, and poured upon the frontier in fire and indiscriminate massacre.

Those who then filled the Government were fresh from the Revolution, and were animated by the spirit which is embodied in your constitution. No passion then existed in which could flourish party spirit; it could germinate, but to expire, in the then pure state of our political atmosphere; in the calm light of mild philosophy, they examined their duties and transferred this power; these were the men who worshipped Liberty in her favorite temple, in sincerity and in truth; these were the men whose blood and suffering elevated you to the rank of a nation, and whose wisdom gave you a constitution which breaks upon the view of enslaved and benighted Europe, like the star in the East, happy harbinger of hope, proclaiming there is power sufficient to redeem from thraldom and misery.

This treaty is said to have violated the religion of the Indians, by demanding their prophets: and they appeal to modern Europe and ancient Rome, to suffuse the American cheek with the blush of guilt. Those prophets were not the ministers of religion—they were political agitators; instigators to war, they were not the messengers of peace and good will towards man, that stilled the tempest of the savage soul, and called the chaos into light and order; they were the fit and supple instruments of Woodbine; they breathed confusion and havoc—humanity to these Indians, and the interest of this country, demanded their surrender. Rome never lost sight of policy; she transplanted the idols of the subdued provinces, and incorporated them with her gods; and by the strong tie of superstition, chained the province to the foot of the Capitol. Yet the Druids were extirpated, and the forests of Germany tell a bloody tale. These forests still echo the expiring groans of those priests who smoothed the brow of the rugged warrior in peace, and nerved his arm in the hour of battle. England extracts a revenue from the idolatrous worshippers of the bloody Juggernaut, whilst the Irish Catholic, who believes in the same God, and relies upon the same Redeemer, is torn from the horns of the altar, a victim to ecclesiastical pride, and the jealousy of despotism. The genius of these polished and religious courts, passed from those seats of science and the arts, into the wilds of Africa; it dealt in slavery and blood, and sundered every tie that connects man to his species. It spread its wings over the East Indies—fifty millions of human beings have there for years, been hunted as lawful prey, in the indiscriminate chase of death. The timid Hindoo has been swept from the plains, and is now pursued to the mountain top, where he sought refuge amidst the clouds. This Government need not hang its head upon an appeal to Europe, unless the mere glitter of a diadem shall dazzle and confuse.

Sir, he said, the western frontier is that portion of the world where civilization is making the most rapid and extensive conquest on the wilderness, carrying in its train the Christian religion, and all the social virtues. It is the point where the race of man is most progressive; establish but the principle, that the God of nature has limited your march in that direction—that the Indian is lord paramount of that wide domain, around which justice and religion have drawn a circle which you dare not pass—the progress of mankind is arrested, and you condemn one of the most beautiful and fertile tracts of the earth to perpetual sterility, as the hunting ground of a few savages. The most celebrated philosophers have spoken a different language, and the ermine of the judiciary has interposed against these theories, and, without a stain, given this country to civilization and Christianity.

Mr. Chairman, it cannot now be denied, that, this being a defensive war, resulting from the necessity of repelling invasion, military movement was the bounden duty of the Executive, not only upon the principle of self-preservation—a law written by the finger of nature upon all animated creation—but under the practice of the Government and the laws of the country; and it will be found that the rights of war, extended to the management of the war by the international law, were exercised with extraordinary forbearance—never transcended. It would require no prophetic spirit to predict, that, so long as you confined your military operations to chasing the Indian from your territory, the war would rage, and the citizens would continue to fall under the tomahawk and scalping-knife. This Government has ever exercised its rights with forbearance: in the love of peace, it has relinquished many. This nation has bent under the weight of insult, and seldom appealed to the exercise of her rights, in full latitude, until compelled to it by principles identified with the paramount duty of all Governments. How long were your citizens torn from their families, scourged by a British captain, and compelled, in some instances, to point the cannon against their countrymen? The bitter cup of humiliation was emptied to the dregs. In scorn, it was said this Government could not be kicked into a war. The nation rose in the majesty of its strength, and hurled destruction upon the foe! Experience at length satisfied the Administration that these vexatious and cruel incursions could only be terminated by pursuing the erratic Indian. At length the ghost of the departed sovereignty of Spain in Florida, no longer alarmed. It fled before the demands of Georgia and Alabama for protection; and the extent of the orders given to the troops was communicated to you by the President, in his Message of the 25th March, 1818. He told you that "Orders had been given to the General in command, not to enter Florida, unless it be in pursuit of the enemy, and, in that case, to respect the Spanish authority wherever it is maintained; and he will be instructed to withdraw his forces from this province, as soon as he shall have reduced that tribe to order, and secured our fellow-citizens in that quarter, by satisfactory arrangements against its unprovoked and savage hostilities in future." How did you proceed upon the receipt of this Message? It was the basis of legislative acts, legitimatizing what had been done; countenancing the doctrine the Message contained; and embracing its views, you directed a brigade of militia to be called into service; you increased the pay of the Georgia militia engaged in the Seminole war. He said he recollected the proposition was made by his friend from that State, (Mr. COBB.) He felt a repugnance to it, but his objections melted away under the fervid zeal and eloquence of that gentleman; and a large appropriation was made to meet the expenses of the war. Here is a shield broad enough and thick enough to protect the Executive from attack, the work of your own hands.

But, considering the subject unaccompanied with this quasi declaration of war and the auxiliary measures, the step was strictly justifiable. If Spain had been a neutral power, and the Indians belligerent, not inhabiting her territory and being within her sovereignty, but merely retreating, then the Americans would have had an indisputable right to pursue them by the usages of nations. We will find this doctrine in Vattel, 515. It is certain that on my enemy's being defeated, and too much weakened to escape me, even if my neighbor affords him a retreat, his conduct, so pernicious to my safety and interests, would be incompatible with neutrality. If, therefore, my enemy on a defeat retires into a neutral country, he is to cause the troops as soon as possible to continue their march, and not permit them to watch an opportunity to attack me, because otherwise he gives me a right to enter his territory in pursuit of my enemy—a misfortune that often attends nations unable to command respect. The enemy not only retreated into the Spanish territory, and watched an opportunity to attack our citizens, but were the inhabitants of the country, and kept the Spanish authorities in subjection. It was said by a member from New York, (Mr. STORRS,) that the line should not have been crossed, until application had been made to the Spanish Court. For months had your soil been polluted by the foot of savage invasion; for months had this land, sacred to liberty, to justice, and to humanity, been crimsoned by the blood of its inhabitants; yet there should have been a pause in our movements until a messenger had crossed the Atlantic to call the attention of Ferdinand to the condition of his subjects—to awaken him to a sense of duty, and to ask him to re-assume the sovereignty of the Floridas, which he had carelessly lost. Your messenger would have found him tambouring a petticoat for the Virgin, surrounded by lazy monks, dreaming of schemes to establish the Inquisition, under whose tortures hypocrisy flourishes, and religion expires.

The Indian is only vulnerable in his town. An Indian war can only be terminated by destroying his means of subsistence, and penetrating his fastnesses, where he flies for shelter, until, like the tiger, in the still darkness of the night, he can spring upon his prey. It was said, the present Secretary of War gave vigor to the operations; that he boldly ordered the commander of our forces to terminate the war. It was the patriotic vigor that meets the exigency. Let that distinguished statesman pursue the course he has commenced, and ere long the hand of gratitude will crown him with the proudest honors of the Republic.

The execution of Ambrister and Arbuthnot is said to be unconstitutional; but ingenious gentlemen have not condescended to point out the provision which is invaded, unless, as his colleague (Mr. COLSTON) had contended, the constitution had repealed the law of nations, making this a transaction casus omissus, and carrying back the right of punishment to the old ground of natural law, where authority sufficient would be found for the measure. On the contrary this people, when they assumed a stand amongst the powers of the earth, became entitled to the benefit of all the law of nations. The constitution only distributes the exercise of these rights amongst a variety of departments, defining what portion of sovereignty shall be exercised by the one and the other—all the sovereign power that attaches to an independent government in its foreign relations and intercourse existing in, and to be performed by one of these departments, or by the co-operation of all. This Government claims all the rights of war and peace permitted to be exercised by the law of nations. This law, and the practice and usage of all governments, vest the right of punishing incendiaries like those in the commanders of armies. Your constitution does not interdict the exercise of this power in this ordinary mode, nor is it confined, by that instrument, to any particular department, nor has it been the subject of legislation.

Mr. S. said, that, although this was ample vindication, he placed the justification of these executions upon different ground. He did not consider these men British subjects. The doctrine of perpetual allegiance—once a subject always a subject—was not to be found in his political creed. The right of expatriation was admitted by this Government—the tide of emigration flowed into this country upon that principle; and its preservation is the shield of a large portion of your population, who have sought refuge here from tyranny and persecution. The evidence of the exercise of this right is, residence or acceptance of office. When an effort was made in this House, by an able and zealous friend to the rights of man, to prescribe a mode for the exercise of this right, it was rejected, for the simple reason that the right then stood upon the surest basis. These men had become members of the Indian tribe—they had incorporated themselves with the savages. Ambrister commanded a detachment, and marched at the head of an army, composed of negroes and Indians, to meet the American troops. Arbuthnot was admitted into the council of the nation, as a chief; he was the minister of foreign relations of the Seminole tribes and their dependencies, St. Marks and Pensacola. Appointed and commissioned to his high office by special power of attorney, he corresponded, officially, with British Governors and Spanish commandants; he communicated with the British Minister near the American Government, until the interesting correspondence was interrupted by the weight of postage. Sir, he said, it would have been an interesting spectacle to have seen the arrival, in this circle of etiquette, of this representative of Hillishajo, Bowlegs, Nero, and the Spanish commandants; he would have been a little smoked with monarchy, and great commotion would have resulted from the difficulty of fixing his rank in the scale of fashion. These men having incorporated themselves with the Indians—having voluntarily stepped down from civilized society and Christian warfare, made common cause with the savages, and contributed to their indiscriminate massacre; they were subject to the same treatment that the usages of the country and the laws of war permitted to be inflicted upon the savage. Hillishajo was hung; his memory is not embalmed, nor his fame perpetuated, by a single plaintive strain. Yet Hillishajo was a king and a prophet; he had swept your frontier with a besom of desolation; no feeling of his heart protected the infant or the timid female; indiscriminate murder marked his operations. Ambrister and Arbuthnot, enlightened by the Christian dispensation, which breathes peace and good will towards man, whetted his appetite for blood; stimulated him, by false and deceptive promises, to tear the scalp from the infant's head, and plunge the tomahawk in the aged matron's breast, and drove him inevitably to the fate he deservedly met. They were apprehended in the fact, and condign punishment inflicted.

Mr. WALKER, of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, it is with considerable difficulty I approach this subject, which has been discussed with so much interest and ability by those who have preceded me in this debate, as almost to preclude any further inquiry; like a body completely anatomized, leaves little room for the most skilful artist to improve upon the plan; much less one who does not profess to be very learned in the constitution or laws of nations, and has no pretensions to literary or legal acquirements. The ground which I shall attempt to take will be founded in plain facts and common sense. I do not calculate on giving any illustration on the subject in a legal point of view, as every point has been brought to the law and to the testimony, by gentlemen whose talents and abilities have proved them adequate to the task. But I shall briefly state the principles and reasons that shall govern my vote on this important and interesting question. Important, sir, as it will stamp a character on this nation, that will last for ages, and may be a precedent for future legislators, when we who are about to give this vote will be sleeping in the dust; important, as it respects the feelings of the nation, as we are accountable to them who sent us here, and the people are competent judges of our political opinions, and we must return and submit to the tribunal of public opinion. But, sir, it is materially important, as it will take into view the character and conduct of one of our most illustrious citizens, and one of the greatest captains the world ever saw, whose achievements and military fame have not been surpassed by any who has gone before him. Sir, from the high consideration I have for the honor and dignity of my country, and the esteem and veneration I entertain for the character of that brave and meritorious officer, I approach this vote with a due solemnity.

Sir, the Seminole war, which has made such an earthquake in this House, and on which so much eloquence has been displayed, and against which the constitution, the laws of our own country, and the laws of nations, have all been arrayed, so inconsiderable in the beginning, has become so magnified as to end in this House. Sir, I have paid a due attention to the debates on both sides of this question, and with much satisfaction have heard it clearly proved that the war was authorized consistently with the constitution and laws of our country, and that it was promptly and correctly carried on with energy and decision, and terminated in the event to the honor and interest of the United States; and all the lucid explanations delivered in support of that war, have, to my mind, been like so many candles lighted to the sun. Truth may be embellished, but cannot be changed. The necessity and expediency of that expedition always appeared clear as the light, duly authorized by the President, the proper organ of Executive power; and in the prosecution of that war, I have seen nothing done but what ought to be done, and nothing else could be done to effect the purpose. The nature and effects of savage warfare have been ably depicted by gentlemen who preceded me; but, as truth may sometimes be twice told, I will proceed to exemplify some of its horrors, which I not only know by the hearing of the ear, but mine eye hath seen it. Savages do not war as civilized nations, by formal declaration. No, sir, they come as a thief in the night; when peace and safety cover our dwellings, then cometh their dreadful, secret, and horrible depredations, when least expected; the instruments of death are in their hands, destruction attends their footsteps, no kind messenger to give us the watchword, no intimation of their approach; the blow is struck before it is known, and darkness, the pavilion that covers their deep design, and ambush secures them from the eye of the traveller, where neither age nor sex is spared; the hoary head, the sprightly youth, the suckling infant, and the tender and trembling mother, all indiscriminately fall victims to their savage fury; and those who are so unfortunate as to come within their grasp, and are made prisoners, are often reserved for a death more horrible than death itself—for the burning stake or bloody hatchet, the savage yell sounding through the forests, and desolation and destruction on every side. Hear the words of a great man on the subject of savage warfare: "The darkness of midnight shall glitter with the blaze of your dwellings, and the war-whoop shall wake the sleep of the cradle." Such a war was commenced by the Seminoles on the frontiers of Georgia, unprovoked and unknown to us. When application was made by the Executive of that State for a defensive force to repel the enemy, did they then request the President to consult the constitution or the Sibyl books to inquire into his Executive powers, whether he could send an army to their relief? No such reserve in any of their messages; they must have an army, they must have a general; it was then constitutional, highly approved, and graciously received; but now, Mr. Chairman, when their battles are fought and victory gained, peace concluded, and order and tranquillity restored—oh, it is now unconstitutional, and their voice is against the hand that saved them. But reverse the subject; sometimes things appear most true and best proved by their opposite. Suppose the President had hesitated, and adopted the policy gentlemen so strongly urge on this floor, and told the people of Georgia that he doubted his Executive powers, and that the constitution did not authorize him to send an army over the Spanish line, and so passed by on the one side; and that General Jackson, at the head of his army, advanced to the Spanish line, had also hesitated, and said, hitherto I go, and no farther, and passed by on the other side; what good Samaritan would they have found to come that way, and heal the wounds of their bleeding country? I fear they would have found none. What would have been then, and what now, the situation of the people of Georgia? For aught we know, the blood of the defenceless inhabitants might be yet streaming, and the Seminoles encamped in battle array on the banks of the Oconey. But the President chose the better part, and acted as he ought to have done; sent our army under the command of a General whose character and abilities were adapted to the enterprise—ever active, ever fortunate—and whatsoever his hand found to do, did it with his might.

I have always entertained a high sense of the merit of military men who have given their aid to rescue their country from oppression, and to secure the rights and liberties of mankind; their reputation is dearly earned; they have to encounter the extremes of every climate, the inclemency of every season, and all the conflicts of a military life, and deaths and dangers await them at every post; while we, who are here, are gaining the plaudits of our country, on a political eminence, as legislators, with good accommodations, and faring sumptuously every day; they would be cheered by a crumb from our tables while suffering and fighting the battles of our country. Sir, I am not among those who pay an unlimited devotion to any man's rank or character, abstractly, or because he is so; but it is my pride, and I ever feel it a grateful and pleasant duty to pay my tribute of respect to every faithful servant of his country, whether in the cabinet or the field, or in any condition of life. General Jackson to me is personally unknown, but I cannot be mistaken in giving my support to a man who has rendered such eminent services to his country; who has fought our battles, gained our victories, and restored peace and tranquillity to our Southern frontier. I trust, on this question, we will pay a due regard to public feeling, and do justice to him who has done so much for us, and declare to this nation, and to the world, that General Jackson well deserves the gratitude of his country.

Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, addressed the House as follows:

The United States of America and Great Britain terminated the war of the Revolution by the definitive Treaty of Peace made at Paris. The nations and tribes of Indians, over whom British influence prevailed, were allies of Great Britain in that war, and perpetrated barbarous cruelties. Desolation, burning, and murder, attended their movements—their paths were stained with blood—the tomahawk and scalping-knife spared neither age nor sex—a price was paid for scalps, from the mangled heads of men, women, and children, and triumphed over by the enemies of the people contending for liberty.

The United States of America, in the year one thousand seven hundred and seventy-eight, made articles of agreement and confederation with the Delaware nation of Indians—that treaty provided for perpetual peace and friendship through all generations—the territorial rights of that nation were amply provided for. The Delawares were the first with whom the United States treated, and were pre-eminently honored; and it seems, by the sixth article of the treaty, that, in that year, it was contemplated to institute an Indian State, with the Delawares at its head, with a right to a representation in Congress. The wandering life and habits of the Indians frustrated that benevolent plan. The experience of Indian disposition manifests the impracticability of a confederacy of that nature. It appears by a separate article of the treaty made with the Wyandot, Delaware, Chippewa, and Ottawa nations, that the Delawares were not able to resist British influence—they fell off. Three chiefs, Kehlamond, Hengue Pashees, and Wycocalind, only, with their families, continued to hold the chain of friendship with the United States.

The war of the Revolution ended; the territorial limits of the United States were defined; the nations of Indians, allies of Great Britain in the war, were not protected or covered by the Treaty of Peace; they were left to the humanity and mercy of the United States. Hence it is inferred, that all right whatever to lands claimed by Indian nations, who were allies of Great Britain in time of the war, and residing within the limits of the United States, were void, and ceased to be.

The United States, in the year 1784, by treaty, gave peace and protection to the Senecas, Mohawks, Onondagas, and Cayugas. The Oneidas and Tuscaroras were secured in the possession of the lands they lived on, and the boundaries of the Six Nations were fixed.

The United States, by treaties made in the year 1785, gave peace and protection to the Wyandot, Delaware, Chippewa, and Ottawa nations of Indians, and to the Cherokee nation—and these nations acknowledged themselves under the protection of the United States of America, and of no other sovereign whatever. Lands were allotted to them, respectively, to live and hunt on.

The United States, in the year 1786, by treaties, gave peace and protection to the Choctaw, Chickasaw, and Shawanee nations of Indians, respectively, and they acknowledged themselves to be under the protection of the United States, and no other sovereign whatever. Lands were allotted to them, to live and hunt on.

The United States of America, in the year 1790, made a treaty with the Creek nation of Indians. The first article provides that there shall be perpetual peace and friendship between all the citizens of the United States of America, and all the individuals, towns, and tribes, of the upper, middle, and lower Creeks, and Seminoles, composing the Creek nation. By the second article, the kings, chiefs, and warriors, for themselves and all parts of the Creek nation within the limits of the United States, acknowledged themselves and all parts of the Creek nation, to be under the protection of the United States, and of no other sovereign whatever. A boundary line was designated, and the lands allotted were guaranteed to them to live and hunt on. The second article of the treaty manifests that the Creek nation had been hostile to the United States. Two other treaties were made with the Creek nation; one in 1802, the other in 1806, whereby ample provision was made for their comfort, and to promote their civilization. Great Britain, by the Treaty of Peace, acknowledged the United States to be free, sovereign, and independent; that he treated with them as such, and for himself, his heirs, and successors, relinquished all claims to the government, proprietary, and territorial rights of the same, and every part thereof. The United States of America, by that treaty, became the acknowledged sovereign of, and over, all the territories within the boundaries designated by that treaty, agreeably to the principles of the confederation. The nations and tribes of Indians, allies of Great Britain, and enemies to the United States, in the Revolutionary war, not covered and protected by the Treaty of Peace, no longer retained any right or claim to lands within the limits of the United States; all their rights and claim to land therein became void, and ceased to be, the Delaware nation not excepted.

The United States, said Mr. R., proceeding on this principle, made, after the Treaty of Peace with Great Britain, treaties with the several nations and tribes of Indians within their territorial limits; and gave peace to, and received them into their protection, and these nations and tribes acknowledged themselves under the protection of the United States of America, and of no other sovereign whatever. The United States allotted lands to them to live and hunt on.

The treaty of Holston was made with the Cherokee nation of Indians, in the year 1791, and that nation again acknowledged themselves to be under the protection of the United States, and of no other sovereign whatever.

The Creek nation, soon after the treaty of 1790, began to manifest a disposition hostile to the people of the United States living on the south-western frontier. That disposition was known to have been excited by foreign emissaries inducing the Indians to believe that the United States had wrongfully taken land from them. In the year 1792, the Creeks began their ravages on the frontier, and murdered several persons. A large body of them, aided by a considerable reinforcement of Cherokees, crossed Tennessee river, marched to the Cumberland settlements, attacked Buchanan's fort there, and, being repulsed with great loss, returned, after having committed depredations and murders, conformably to their usual manner. The Indians continued the war on the frontier of the south-western territory, until another treaty was made with the Cherokees, at Philadelphia, in the year 1794. The articles of which were stipulated to be considered as permanent additions to the treaty of Holston.

In the year 1795, a treaty of amity, friendship, limits, and navigation, was made between the United States of America and Spain; and afterwards, in the year 1796, another treaty was made at Colerain, in Georgia, with the Creek nation, and by it the treaty of 1790 is declared to be obligatory on the contracting parties, except as provided for by the treaty of Colerain. So ended that war with the Creek Indians and Cherokees.

A variety of circumstances manifested that, in the time of the Revolutionary war, frequent communications had been, between the northern and southern nations of Indians; and that their hostilities, by certain excitements, against the people of the United States, operated to the same object, namely: the depression of the people of this nation. That, also, said Mr. R., appears to have operated in the time of the war I have been speaking of; during that war a powerful confederacy of Indian nations carried on a destructive war against the United States on the north-western frontier. The British Government retained the north-western posts, and erected and garrisoned another within the limits of the United States. The Indians carried on the war in their usual savage manner; murdering, scalping, and destroying. General Harmar was sent with a body of forces against them, but did not prevail. General St. Clair, with a larger body of troops, was ordered against them; he was defeated with great loss. General Wayne was ultimately sent against them with a more numerous army; and he defeated the Indians. The treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, between the United States and Great Britain, was made in November, 1794, by which Great Britain stipulated to surrender the north-western posts. In August, 1795, a treaty of peace was made at Greenville, between the United States and the Wyandots, Delawares, Shawanees, Ottawas, Chippewas, Patawatimies, Miamis, Eel Rivers, Weas, Kickapoos, Piankeshaws, and Kaskaskias—and so ended that Indian war; but not until a treaty had been made with Great Britain. I take notice of these past events first, said Mr. R., that the connection of the Indian war operations of the several Indian nations, and the influence of foreign agency may be observed, that the exciting causes be considered, in order to illustrate the subject under consideration, and that the Indian character may be understood.

The northern and southern nations of Indians engaged in the wars on the northwest and south-west frontiers, which, said Mr. R., I have been speaking of, had, in and by the first treaties made with them, respectively, after the Revolutionary war, acknowledged themselves to be under the protection of the United States of America, and of no other sovereign whatever. In making and carrying on war against the people of the United States, they renounced and abandoned that protection; they violated the treaties they had made with the United States, and put themselves out of their protection; the forfeiture might have been taken against them; but humanity, the consideration of their ignorance of the obligations of social compact and morality, and compassion for their miserable condition, prevailed; and, in pursuance thereof, the several treaties alluded to were made with them, and various other treaties, previous to the year 1811.

The Indian—rude, wild, and savage—ignorant of the principles of morality, of the doctrines of Christianity, and of the knowledge of the true God—is prone to superstition, to fanaticism, and to a vain desire of knowing future events, not within the view of man. In the year 1807, an Indian chief of the Shawanee nation, who has been named the Prophet, excited by foreign corruption, is said to have began to propagate his delusions among the northern Indian nations; and, of them, to form a strong confederacy against the United States. The influence of that Indian chief increased in that and succeeding years. Large quantities of goods were delivered to the Indians by British agents; and British emissaries excited them to war, insinuating that they would now be aided by their great father in driving back the Americans, and recovering the lands the Americans had taken from them. The United States were paying large annual subsidies to the Indian nations; but the influence of British corrupt agents, the distribution of goods, arms, and ammunition, and the declarations of the Indian fanatical prophets, prevailed against the peace of the Indians. In the year 1811, a confederacy of Indian nations was formed; and, in the month of November of that year, the battle of Tippecanoe was fought, in which the American army defeated the deluded, hostile Indians.

In the month of June, 1812, the Congress of the United States passed an act declaring that war be, and did exist, between the United Kingdoms of Great Britain and Ireland and the United States of America. The promulgation of that act excited more strenuous efforts of British agents and emissaries to instigate the Indians to continue the war.

In the month of August, 1811, the Shawanee chief, Tecumseh, brother to the fanatic prophet, passed down the Wabash River with a party of about six Shawanees, six Kickapoos, and six of some tribe far to the northwest, as they said, the name of which they refused to tell, on his way to the Creek nation. The object of his visit could not be mistaken—to excite the Creek and other southern nations of Indians to war against the United States, was his object. Indian fanatic prophets increased in the northern Indian nations. The Creek Indians had, soon after the visit of Tecumseh, their fanatic prophets also, inciting them to war, of whom Hillishajo, or Francis, appears to have been one. Strong suspicion is attached to six of the persons accompanying Tecumseh on his visit to the Creeks; they would not tell to what tribe they belonged. Who they were has not been perfectly ascertained. The effects of the visit of Tecumseh to the Creek nation soon became apparent. An infuriated fanaticism was propagated among them; they were taught to believe themselves invincible. The greatest part of them were hostile; they prepared for war, and soon after began their ravages on the frontier. They attacked Fort Mimms, took it, and massacred almost all the people who were in it. War with the Creek nation was inevitable.

The Executive of the United States had ordered fifteen hundred men from Georgia, and as many from Tennessee, to be called out in defence of the frontier. The fifteen hundred men from Tennessee were not raised previous to the meeting of the General Assembly of that State. That General Assembly convened at Nashville in September, 1813. The destruction at Fort Mimms and other ravages of the savages were known; and it was understood that a large force of them was preparing to attack the frontier settlements. The time was precious, the danger was imminent, and did not admit of delay. The southern frontier of Tennessee, including Madison county, is about four hundred miles long, without any fort or place of strength, and liable to the incursion of the savage. A partial success of the hostile Indians would have added to their force a large number of warriors from the neighboring nations of Indians. The General Assembly of Tennessee, sanctioned by the Constitution of the United States of America, immediately enacted a law to raise and complete, with the fifteen hundred men previously ordered, an effective force of five thousand men; and also a law to raise and appropriate $300,000, to pay and support the troops while in service. That army was raised with all possible despatch. General Jackson, who was Major General of militia in Tennessee, took the command. To prevent the ravages of the Indians on the frontiers, the troops poured out from Tennessee; and, expecting soon to meet the enemy and finish the war, they crossed Tennessee River, and commenced operations on the frontiers of the Creek nation. The war was carried on with various success, several battles were fought. The General with his intrepid troops approached the strong fortifications of the enemy at the Horse Shoe. He ordered an assault; the fortification was stormed; the battle raged hand to hand, within the fort; and ceased with the destruction of nearly all the Indian warriors in the fort. General Jackson afterwards marched, with part of his troops, to the Hickory Ground; and there, meeting with a large body of troops from Georgia, he left the country in their possession, and returned with his army to Tennessee. The proceedings of General Jackson with the army under his command, against the hostile Creeks, were approved, and the State of Tennessee was relieved, by the General Government, from payment of the expense. The hostile Creek Indians were beaten, but the war was not finished. In this war, the Cherokee Indians aided against the Creeks, and did good service. Soon after his return from the Creek nation, General Jackson was appointed a Brigadier General, with brevet of Major General; that was soon followed by being appointed a Major General in the armies of the United States. The Creek Indians wished for peace; General Jackson was appointed commissioner to treat with them; and, in the month of August, 1814, he concluded a treaty with the Creek nation. Hillishajo, or Francis, the fanatic prophet, and some more chiefs of that nation, did not attend the making of that treaty; they, with others of the hostile Creeks, retired towards Florida, from whence to carry on the war against the people of the United States.

The Seminoles, a part of the Creek nation, were party to the treaty of 1790; and David Francis, alias Meemagechee, appears to have signed it. The Seminoles had acknowledged themselves under the protection of the United States, and of no other sovereign whatever. Lands, in common with other tribes of the Creek nation, were allotted to them. Other treaties, as has been observed, were made with the Creek nation; one as late as November, 1805, and ratified in June following. Of the benefits stipulated for in these treaties, the Seminoles participated. In all disputes or wars between the United States and foreign powers, the Indian nations who had acknowledged themselves under the protection of the United States, ought to have continued neutral. They suffered themselves to be made the willing instruments of war against the United States, by the persuasion of emissaries of foreign nations, who trafficked in blood, whose goods were poison, whose friendship was destruction. In a letter from Governor Mitchell to Mr. Monroe, of September, 1812, he informs that the Governor of Augustine has had sufficient influence with the Indians residing in Florida, called the Seminoles, to induce them to fall upon the defenceless settlers on the St. Johns and St. Marys. On the St. Johns they had killed and scalped eight or ten persons; and on the Georgia side of St. Marys, they had killed and scalped one and wounded two more. Colonel Smith, in a letter dated September 22, 1812, informs Governor Mitchell that, on the 12th of that month, the escort with the provision wagons, under command of Captain Williams, was attacked by a party of Indians and negroes, to the number of fifty or sixty, from St. Augustine. Captain Williams's command consisted of a non-commissioned officer and nineteen privates, besides drivers. The wagons were lost; both the officers and six privates wounded, Captain Williams mortally, the non-commissioned officer killed. Colonel Williams, in December, in that year, marched with a volunteer corps from Tennessee to aid in defending the frontiers of Georgia from the incursions of the Seminole Indians. About that time, the movement of the Creek Indians, incited to war by their fanatics, was extensive. They would have war, and war came upon them; they put themselves out of the protection of the United States, by making war against them; and, by so doing, all the hostile Creeks and Seminoles who refused to agree to the treaty of August, 1814, made themselves outlaws; Hillishajo, and Hemathlemico, chiefs of the Creek nation, being of that number.

In August, 1814, a British force took possession of Pensacola and the Fort of Barancas. A Colonel Nicholls commanded the land force, part of which was a corps of colonial marines, in which George Woodbine was a captain, and Robert C. Ambrister a lieutenant. On the 29th of August, in that year, and about twenty days after the date of the treaty made with the Creek nation at Fort Jackson, Colonel Nicholls, who, it is presumed, had a knowledge of that treaty, issued his proclamation from Pensacola, inviting persons of every description to join and aid him to abolish (as he said) American usurpation in the country, and to put the lawful owners in possession; stating that he was at the head of a large body of Indians, well armed, disciplined, and commanded by British officers. On the 31st of that month he addressed a letter to Mr. Lafitte, informing him that he had arrived in the Floridas for the purpose of annoying the only enemy Great Britain had in the world. He continued not long at Pensacola and Barancas. General Jackson, having, on the 9th of that month, concluded the treaty with the Creeks, and approached Pensacola with an American force, compelled the invading British to evacuate Pensacola, and to abandon the Barancas, after having blown up the fortifications. After that, General Jackson retired with the army under his command from Pensacola, and hastened to New Orleans to resist the British at that place. Colonel Nicholls, after having been driven from Pensacola and Barancas, moved to Appalachicola, and erected his fort for the reception of hostile Indians and negroes, from whence he might sally out, with his motley crew of black, white, and red combatants, and annoy the defenceless frontiers of the United States.

Colonel Nicholls retained his post at Appalachicola several months after the ratification of the Treaty of Ghent. His correspondence with Colonel Hawkins, commencing on the 28th of April, 1815, shows that he did not consider that the peace made between the United States and Great Britain had put an end to his operations at his fort, or to his negotiation with the Indians against the United States; that he enclosed a copy of part of the ninth article of the Treaty of Ghent, stating that the Indians had accepted and signed it, and requested Colonel Hawkins to understand their territories to be as they stood in 1811; that they had signed a treaty of offensive and defensive alliance with Great Britain, as also one of commerce and navigation; that he was desired by the Indian chiefs to say to Colonel Hawkins, that they do not find that his citizens were evacuating their lands, according to the 9th article of the Treaty of Peace, but that they were fresh provisioning the forts. By a letter from General Gaines, of the 22d May, 1815, it appears that Colonel Nicholls was then at Appalachicola, with about 900 Indians and 450 negroes, under arms. Hillishajo, or Francis, and other chiefs of the Creek nation, with others who did not attend at the Treaty of Fort Jackson, who continued hostile, are presumed to be of that party, and, with Colonel Nicholls, exciting to continue the war.

After having instigated the Indians to continue the war, by inducing them to believe that, by the ninth article of the Treaty of Ghent, they were entitled to repossess the territory, as in 1811; and having furnished them with a large quantity of arms and ammunition to carry on the war, Colonel Nicholls departed for Great Britain, taking with him Hillishajo, the fanatic, and an address from hostile chiefs to the King of England. It appears by a letter of Colonel Hawkins, of the 28th of May, 1815, and by the letters of General Gaines, of the month of December, 1817, and of January, 1818, that hostilities were continued by the Indians; in the course of which, it appears that Edward Daniels, taken prisoner, was tarred and burnt alive; that Mrs. Garret and her two children were murdered—she and the eldest scalped; Lieutenant Scott and his party, in a boat, fired on—six men of thirty, and one woman of seven, escaped—four little children taken by the legs and their brains dashed out against the boat, with other murders, and ravages, and barbarities. The time had arrived when it was absolutely necessary for the United States to exert their power to put an end to the war. The salus populi, or, in other words, the safety of the people, the supreme, irrevocable law of all nations, demanded that this savage war, carried on by Indians out of the protection of the United States, and negroes, and continued to be excited by foreign emissaries, who had identified themselves with the savages, be terminated.

On the 26th of December, 1817, the Department of War addressed a letter to Major General Andrew Jackson, then at Nashville, Tennessee, ordering him to repair, with as little delay as practicable, to Fort Scott, and assume the immediate command of the forces in that quarter of the southern division; advising him of the strength of the forces there—that General Gaines estimated the strength of the Indians at 2,700; and to call on the Executives of the adjacent States, if, in his opinion, the troops of the United States were too few in number to beat the enemy; and to adopt the necessary measures to terminate a conflict which it has ever been the desire of the President, from considerations of humanity, to avoid, but which is now made necessary by their settled hostilities. On the 16th of January, 1818, the Secretary of War wrote to General Gaines, informing him that the honor of the United States requires that the war with the Seminoles should be terminated speedily, and with exemplary punishment for hostilities so unprovoked; and that orders were issued, directing the war to be carried on within the limits of Florida, should it be necessary to its speedy and effectual termination. These orders, I presume, have been received. That, as soon as it was known that he had repaired to Amelia Island, in obedience to orders, and it being uncertain how long he might be detained there, the state of things at Fort Scott made it necessary to order General Jackson to take command there. From his known promptitude, it is presumable his arrival may be soon expected. A letter from the Secretary at War, of the 29th January, 1818, to General Jackson, acknowledges the receipt of letters from him of the 12th and 13th of that month; and that the measures he had taken to bring an efficient force into the field were approbated; and expressing a confident hope that a speedy and successful termination of the Indian war will follow his exertions.

On the 20th of January, 1818, General Jackson wrote to the Secretary of War further information respecting the measures by him adopted to carry on the war, and that he would leave Nashville on the 22d of that month for Fort Scott, via Fort Hawkins. On the 6th of February, 1818, the Secretary of War wrote to General Jackson, (Fort Scott, Georgia,) acknowledging the receipt of his letter of the 20th ultimo, and acquainting him of the entire approbation of the President of all the measures he had adopted to terminate the war; that the honor of our army, as well as the interest of the country, requires that it should be terminated as soon as practicable. It appears that General Jackson was at Fort Hawkins on the 10th of February, 1818; at Hartford, in Georgia, on the 14th; at Fort Early on the 26th; and on the 25th of March, 1818, at Fort Gadsden, east bank of Appalachicola, where formerly Negro Fort stood. Having reached Fort Scott on the 9th, with the brigade of Georgia militia, 900 bayonets strong, and some friendly Creeks, when, on the morning of the 10th, he assumed the command—ordered the live stock to be slaughtered, and issued to the troops, with one quart of corn to each man, and the line of march to be taken up at twelve, meridian. Near St. Marks, on the 8th April, 1818, the General writes to the Secretary of War that he had defeated a negro and Indian force—pursued them through the Mickasukian towns; that the towns were consumed, and the greatest abundance of corn, cattle, &c., brought in; that Captain McKever had secured Francis, or Hillishajo, the great prophet, and Hemathlemico, an old Red Stick chief, and that Arbuthnot, a Scotchman, and suspected as an instigator of the war, was found in St. Marks; that there were found in the council-house of Kenhagu's town, the King of the Mickasukians, more than fifty fresh scalps, and in the centre of the square the old Red Stick's standard (a red pole) was erected, crowned with scalps, recognized, by the hair, as torn from the heads of the unfortunate companions of Scott; that Indians and negroes combined had demanded the surrender of St. Marks; that the Spanish garrison was too weak to defend it; that he had occupied it with an American garrison, and the commandant and garrison furnished with transportation to Pensacola. On the 9th of April, from camp sixteen miles from St. Marks, on march to Suwanee, the General wrote to the Secretary of War, "There is little room to doubt but what one of the chiefs found slain on the field in advance of the Mickasukian villages, was Kenhajee. Francis, or Hillishajo, and Hemathlemico, the prime instigators of this war, have been hung. The latter commanded the party who so inhumanly sacrificed Scott and his companions."

General Jackson was authorized by the supreme law of nature and nations, the law of self-defence, corresponding with the great national maxim, namely, the safety of the people is the supreme law, to enter the Spanish territory of Florida in pursuit of, and to destroy, hostile, murdering savages, not bound by any obligation, who were without the practice of any moral principle reciprocally obligatory on nations.

FRIDAY, January 29.

Seminole War.

The House resumed, in Committee of the Whole, (Mr. BASSETT in the chair,) the consideration of the report of the Military Committee, on the transactions of the Seminole war.

Mr. HOPKINSON, of Pennsylvania, addressed the House as follows:

Mr. Chairman, if, after the discussion this subject has undergone, I were to promise the committee to present it with entire novelty, I should promise that which it is not in my power to perform, and which would betray a presumption, of which, I trust, I am incapable. I have the hope, however, that I may be able to offer some principles in relation to it which have not yet been presented, and are entitled to some influence on the decision of the committee, and to make some new applications of principles already established.

The matters in controversy seem to me to obtain infinite importance, from the connection they have with the character of our country. We stand in a most peculiar and responsible situation in this respect. The nations of Europe, from their contiguity, may be said to form a family or an association of nations, controlled by and accountable to each other. They have alliances which all respect, ties which all must feel, balances and checks which all are interested to preserve, and rules of conduct in their mutual intercourse which all are made to obey. The American people, removed far from the rest of the civilized world, and placed beyond the control of the policy or force of Europe, have none of those means to keep them to the path of justice. They acknowledge no guide authorized to direct them but their own consciences, and feel no responsibility but to their God. This, sir, is a trying and a tempting situation, placing us on the highest ground of virtue, if we do not abuse it; but exposing us to infinite danger from the suggestions of pride, interest, and self-love. But, sir, let us not forget that we belong to the family of civilized nations, and be most forward to prove our devotion to those rules of conduct which the experience and wisdom of ages have established, as necessary for the peace and usefulness of all. Let us cherish those laws which increase the blessings of peace and mitigate the calamities of war.

The dangers which our country may apprehend from the encouragement of a military spirit in our people, have been eloquently portrayed on this occasion. It is undoubtedly true that a strong disposition of this sort has been manifested, and was rapidly rising, in the people of the United States; and a greater evil could hardly befall us than the consummation of its ascendency. There is something so infatuating in the pomp and triumphs of war, that a young and brave people who have known but little of its destructive miseries may require to be guarded against falling into the snare, and led to direct their energies to other and better objects. It is worthy of remark that, in the various ways in which the genius and powers of men display themselves, the military course is the only one eminently dangerous to his species. Genius in every other department, however dazzling and powerful, is never hurtful—is generally a blessing to the world. The stupendous genius of Newton elevated the dignity of man, and brought him nearer to his God; it gave him a path to walk in the firmament, and knowledge to hold converse with the stars. The erratic comet cannot elude his vigilance, nor the powerful sun disappoint his calculations. Yet, this genius, so mighty in the production of good, was harmless of the evil as a child. It never inflicted injury or pain on any thing that lives or feels. Shakspeare prepared an inexhaustible feast of instruction and delight for his own age and the ages to come; but he brought no tears into the world but those of fictitious woe, which the other end of his wand was always ready to cure. It is military genius alone that must be nourished with blood, and can find employment only in inflicting misery and death upon man.

The character and services of General Jackson have called forth eloquent eulogiums from various parts of the House. I have no disposition to depreciate them, although I think some of the praise bestowed upon them has been somewhat extravagant. I cannot think him the greatest commander this country has produced; much less is he the greatest general of the age; an age so productive of military wonders. He is unquestionably a man of undaunted courage, of indefatigable perseverance, of striking decision and celerity, and of great resources. If his private virtues, of which I know nothing, are equal to his public services, he is, assuredly, a man worthy of all estimation. These things will not influence my opinion or my vote, in the discussion and decision of questions of national law and public importance, which have no other connection with the character or services of General Jackson, than that they have arisen out of transactions in which he has been engaged.

We have seen, in this debate, a very laborious examination of books, for principles applicable to the questions in discussion; and authorities have been quoted, without end, on the several points. In truth, however, this is not the difficulty of the case; the principles of the laws of nations, which have relation to it, are very clear and unquestionable; and the inquiry should be into the facts and circumstances of this campaign. These being distinctly ascertained, the decision of the law upon them will be found at once. Indeed, it is the excellence of that system which is called the laws of nations, that there is little in it that is technical or arbitrary; the rule is, generally, that which the sound understanding and common sense of every man would suggest to him, if he had never read a line on the subject. My object will be to draw the attention of the committee to the prominent points of inquiry; to fix with precision the facts in relation to each, and show the principles of national law which ought to govern us in deciding upon them. General Jackson has been arraigned; first, for crossing the line separating the United States from Florida; second, for taking the fortress of St. Marks from the Spanish authorities; third, for taking Pensacola and Barancas; fourth, for the execution of Ambrister and Arbuthnot. I beg leave to premise that, in discussing a transaction in which so many distinct questions arise, it will necessarily happen that different gentlemen of the committee will agree upon some, and disagree upon others; and even when they come to the same result of approbation or disapprobation, it may be for reasons wholly different. This renders a particular explanation of the ground of opinion more necessary than in ordinary cases. In crossing the Florida line and entering upon the Spanish territory, General Jackson certainly violated the neutral and national rights of Spain, unless he can show it was done for reasons, and under circumstances, which, by the agreement of nations, or, in other words, by the laws of nations, justify it, and remove its offensive character. Several grounds of defence have been taken for this act, both by General Jackson and on this floor. And here I may remark, in relation to this part of the case, as well as some of the others, that it is unfortunate for a man, when he has done that which is really right and defensible, to stumble upon a bad reason for it. His reason will be successfully attacked, and he will appear to stand condemned, when, in truth, his injudicious defence only has been overthrown. So it has happened to the General. It has been said for him, that he was justified in crossing the Spanish line to attack the Indians, because Spain had, by her treaty, stipulated that she would restrain the Indians within her territory from hostilities against the United States; and that, not having done this, we had a right to pass into the territory to do that for her and ourselves which she was bound, but had failed to do. It is obvious, on the least reflection, that this defence can avail nothing. If Spain had failed to perform her treaties with the United States, it was a matter to be adjusted by the two Governments, and not by a Commander-in-chief, at the head of his army. Spain might give reasons for the failure satisfactory to this Government, and had a right to an opportunity to do so. But the conclusive view of this point is this: If the territory of Spain was violated or attacked, to compel her to perform her treaty stipulation, or to punish her for not doing so, or because she had not done so, the act connected with the object was undoubtedly an act of war; it placed us in a state of war, and changed our relations with Spain.

The United States are at war with certain tribes of Indians inhabiting the Spanish territory. I do not inquire, as some gentlemen have done, into the origin of this war, or decide who was the immediate aggressor. The commanding General, whose conduct we are now investigating, has nothing to do with this question. It is his duty to fight the battles of his country, and carry on the war according to the laws of his country. Those who send him into the field must answer for the war. I may say, however, that I presume the origin of this war is the same with all our Indian wars. It lies deep beyond the power of eradication, in the mighty wrongs we have heaped upon the miserable nations of these lands. I cannot refuse them my heartfelt sympathy. Reflect upon what they were, and look at them as they are. Great nations dwindled down into wandering tribes, and powerful kings degraded to beggarly chiefs. Once the sole possessors of immeasurable wilds, it could not have entered into their imagination that there was a force on earth to disturb their possessions and overthrow their power. It entered not into their imagination, that from beyond that great water, which to them was an impassable limit, there would come a race of beings to despoil them of their inheritance and sweep them from the earth. Three hundred years have rolled into the bosom of eternity since the white man put his foot on these silent shores; and every day, every hour, and every moment, has been marked with some act of cruelty and oppression. Imposing on the credulity or the ignorance of the aborigines, and overawing their fears by the use of instruments of death of inconceivable terror. The strangers gradually established themselves, increasing the work of destruction with the increase of their strength. The tide of civilization, for so we call it, fed from its inexhaustible sources in Europe, as well as by its own means of augmentation, swells rapidly and presses on the savage. He retreats from forest to forest, from mountain to mountain, hoping, at every remove, he has left enough for his invaders, and may enjoy in peace his new abode. But in vain; it is only in the grave, the last retreat of man, that he will find repose. He recedes before the swelling waters; the cry of his complaint becomes more distant and feeble, and soon will be heard no more. I hear, sir, of beneficent plans for civilizing the Indians, and securing their possessions to them. The great men who make these efforts will have the approbation of God and their own conscience; but this will be all their success. I consider the fate of the Indian as inevitably fixed. He must perish. The decree of extermination has long since gone forth; and the execution of it is in rapid progress. Avarice, sir, has counted their acres, and power their force; and avarice and power march on together to their destruction. You talk of the scalping-knife; what is it to the liquid poison you pour down the throats of these wretched beings? You declaim against the murderous tomahawk; what is it, in comparison with your arms, your discipline, your numbers? The contest is in vain; and equally vain are the efforts of a handful of benevolent men against such a combination of force, stimulated by avarice and the temptations of wealth. When, in the documents on your table, I see that, in this triumphant march of General Jackson, he meets, from time to time, (the only enemy he saw,) groups of old men and women, and children, gathering on the edge of a morass, their villages destroyed, their corn and provisions carried off, houseless in the depth of winter, looking for death alternately to famine and the sword, my heart sickens at a scene so charged with wretchedness. To rouse us from a sympathy so deep, so irresistible, we are told of the scalping-knife and the tomahawk; of our slaughtered women and children. We speak of these things as if women and children were unknown to the Indians—as if they have no such beings amongst them; no such near and dear relations; as if they belong only to us. It is not so. The poor Indian mother, crouching in her miserable wigwam, or resting under the broad canopy of heaven, presses her naked infant to her bosom with as true and fond emotion as the fairest in our land; and her heart is torn with as keen anguish if it perish in her sight.

In the fall of 1817, hostilities had broken out between the United States and the Seminole Indians, residing in Florida, and assumed appearances of danger and ferocity, requiring immediate and effectual suppression. On the 30th of November of that year, a boat, commanded by Lieutenant Scott, containing forty men, some women, and I believe some children, when ascending the Appalachicola River, was fired upon by a party of ambuscaded Indians, and the whole party killed, wounded, or taken prisoners. Previous to this occurrence, other murders and robberies had been perpetrated. It is said by General Gaines, in one of his talks, that the murderers and robbers had been demanded of the Indians, and refused; and that a council had been held by them at Mickasuky, at which war with the United States was determined upon. On the 15th December, 1817, our transports, passing up the river to reach our forts, were attacked from both shores, and placed in imminent danger. On the 9th of January, 1818, bodies of Indians, in the whole from eight to twelve hundred, were collecting on the Appalachicola, for the purpose of cutting off our supplies. From these facts it is obvious that war existed with as much formality and more activity than is usual with Indian hostilities. Such was the state of things in December, 1817, and the beginning of '18. In order to show that our Government was truly desirous to respect, even to an imaginary line, the sovereignty and neutrality of Spain, and ceased to do so only when circumstances made it necessary, and of course justifiable, it may be proper to look to the orders issued by the War Department on the 30th of October, 1817. In a letter of that date to General Gaines, he is told that the President approves of the march of the troops from Fort Montgomery to Fort Scott; that he flatters himself the appearance of this force will restrain the Indians, and induce them to make reparation for the murders they had committed. Should they, however, refuse to make reparation, "it is the wish of the President," says the Secretary, "that you should not, on that account, pass the line and make an attack upon them within the limits of Florida, until you shall have received further instructions from this department." We see in these orders a scrupulous attention to the neutral rights of Spain, and a very discriminating observance of the laws of nations. The two objects to be attained, were the restraint of the hostilities and depredations of the Indians, and to induce them to make reparation for those committed. For the attainment of them the President relies on the appearance of the force of our troops; but, should he be disappointed in this hope, he directs that the line shall not be passed, because reparation is refused, without further orders from the department. Now, whether we might pass the line for the purpose of restraining hostilities, would depend upon the nature and necessity of the case; but it is most clear that we have no such right merely to obtain reparation for past injuries, or to chastise the enemy for refusing it. The line is, therefore, accurately drawn by the President, according to the rules of national law. He forbids the passage peremptorily for a cause not justified by that law; and, as to the other object, directs that he shall be consulted before so important a step is taken. On the 26th December, when the order issued to General Jackson, to take command of the army, our situation was no longer so secure as in October preceding. The enemy had greatly increased in number; they had taken positions fatal to our garrisons, by cutting off all supplies from them; they had destroyed a considerable party of men going to those forts; they had attacked our transports, and manifested a determination to press the war with all their power and all their cruelty. The change of circumstances required a corresponding change in the measures of defence. On the 9th of December, a letter is addressed from the Executive to General Gaines, for his government. Fowltown had now been attacked and destroyed by General Gaines. The President again expresses the hope that this correction will induce the Indians to abstain from further depredations, and sue for peace. He refers the General to the letters of 30th October and 2d December, as manifesting his views, and directs that he should conform to them. At the same time he says, "Should the Indians assemble in force on the Spanish side of the line, and persevere in committing hostilities within the limits of the United States, you will, in that event, exercise a sound discretion as to the propriety of crossing the line, for the purpose of attacking them and breaking up their towns." This order, if carefully attended to, will evince the same desire in our Executive, not to tread on Spanish ground, but under circumstances justified by law. It is not to be done because the Indians assemble in force on the Spanish side, unless, in addition to this, they persevere in committing hostilities within the limits of the United States. That is, if the Spanish side of the line is used as a position from which they make their attacks, and a refuge in which they shelter themselves from our attacks, from pursuit and defeat, then you, exercising a sound discretion, may pass the line. Under such circumstances, it, in fact, becomes a necessary measure of preservation, and may, indeed, be considered rather as a defensive than an offensive operation. So far it is clear, to my understanding, that all the orders issued from the War Department are strictly warranted by national law, and exhibit a proper and scrupulous regard for the rights of Spain. I find, however, in a letter to General Gaines, of the 16th December, that which, in my opinion, cannot be thus justified; and I am at a loss to discover why the department abandoned the sure ground on which it stood for that which seems to me to be absolutely indefensible. In this letter the General is instructed, "Should the Seminole Indians still refuse to make reparation for their outrages and depredations on the citizens of the United States, it is the wish of the President that you consider yourself at liberty to march across the Florida line, and to attack them within its limits, should it be found necessary, unless they should shelter themselves under a Spanish fort. In the last event you will immediately notify this department." I have already shown, and it is unquestionable, that the necessity which justifies the violent invasion of a neutral country, must be to prevent, to avoid, to be relieved from, an injury or danger of high moment, and not to revenge a wrong, however atrocious, or obtain redress for depredations, however destructive. This distinction, so obvious and so just, has been carefully marked by the President in all his previous orders. Why it was disregarded in this letter I cannot say. On or about the 11th of March, 1818, General Jackson crossed the river, passed down on the east side, and arrived on the 16th at Fort Gadsden, which is within the Spanish line of Florida. Let us then shortly sum up the circumstances by which he must defend this measure, and compare them with the reasons Spain may justly urge against it; and, by a fair comparison between them, we shall be able to decide whether, by the law of nations, we stand justified or condemned for this intrusion upon neutral territory. We defend on these uncontradicted facts, that our enemy, in very considerable force, had assembled on or near the line separating the two countries, part of which line was a navigable river, the free passage of which was essential to our safety, as, without it, neither supplies, nor provisions, nor munitions of war, nor reinforcements of men, could be transported to our garrisons within our own territory, beset by the Indians, and in danger of falling into their hands, if deprived of this assistance. We defend on the obvious facility with which the enemy might make his destructive incursions into our country, and the impossibility of restraining him, if he is to find a shelter from pursuit and punishment the moment he repasses the line. We defend, in the third place, on the interminable nature of a war thus carried on with such an enemy; the enormous expense to the United States in this protracted hostility; the daily loss of valuable lives by disease and the sword; and the infinite loss and inconvenience of keeping our militia in the field, from their homes and business, when the means of terminating the conflict were so directly in their view and so entirely in their power. Such is the necessity under which we claim the right to enter the Spanish territory, without thereby changing our pacific relations with that power. What can Spain oppose to this to warrant her in refusing this passage to our troops, or in complaining of it as a hostile invasion of her rights? Positively nothing. No injury, no inconvenience did result, or could have resulted, to her from the act. Look at the situation of the country we entered; it was not a populous city, whose peace might be endangered and disturbed by the presence of an army; it was not through flourishing villages and cultivated farms we passed, where the property of the inhabitants might be pillaged or destroyed by the disorders of a large military force; but a mere waste and wilderness, on which the foot of civilized man had scarcely trod, in which the interest of the Spanish monarchy is but nominal, and of the existence of which the greater part of the Spanish people are utterly ignorant. Above all, and which is perhaps the first consideration in these cases, the permission of this passage, nor the taking of it, would not expose Spain to any danger from our enemy, or expose her to the danger of being brought into the war on account of it. I leave the crossing of the Spanish line on this justification, being well satisfied it is entirely consistent with the most rigid observance of neutral rights, as recognized and guarded by the laws of nations. I agree that permission should have been asked, if circumstances would have allowed; but the same necessity which justifies the measure, in this instance justifies the adoption of it without such request.

The occupation of St. Marks by the American troops followed the entrance into Florida, and is the next proceeding to be considered. It is admitted by our Government that stronger reasons must be found for taking possession of this fortress than for the mere entrance upon Spanish territory; that is, the necessity must be more urgent and powerful; still, however, it is but a stronger case under the same principle. The seizure of a post or fortress belonging to a neutral power is so high and hazardous an interference with the rights of property as well as sovereignty, that it calls for a corresponding justification. This is found in what Vattel calls extreme necessity; it must be indispensable for preservation from immediate destruction; this again is but the dictate of the common sense of mankind. The right of an individual in his house, is as perfect and inviolable as that of a nation in its forts; a man's house is emphatically called his castle, and as such protected by the law. But assuredly it would be no illegal violation of this sanctuary, if, pursued by an assassin, I should take refuge in my neighbor's dwelling; and forcibly too, if, under such circumstances, he would refuse or prevent me. The necessity here required must be immediate and extreme. It is not enough that the position taken will be a convenient means of annoyance to the enemy; a prevention of future danger; or an effective instrument for offensive or defensive operations in the war. No prospective advantage or danger will satisfy the law. Self-preservation; a deliverance from immediate, direct, and extreme peril, must be the end to be obtained by means so extreme. This is the principle; how does it apply to the occupation of St. Marks? Before I examine the facts in relation to this transaction, I beg leave to dispose of a justification set up for General Jackson, which I hold to be altogether untenable. It is said that Spain had by her treaty stipulated to restrain the Indians within her territory from hostile incursions into the United States; and that, not having done this, whether from inability or design, the right devolves upon us to enter the Spanish territory and do that for ourselves which she was bound, but has failed to do for us; and to take her forts in execution of this design. To this, I answer briefly, that, whatever cause of complaint this omission may have given to the United States against Spain; and whatever cause of war it might have afforded, if the complaint was not attended to and a satisfactory explanation given, yet it can give no authority to a military commander to commit an act of hostility, and involve his country in a war without its concurrence. It is for a higher and a safer power in our Government to judge when treaties have been broken, and what measures of redress should be resorted to against the delinquent. To invade the country of another, because a treaty has not been observed, is to punish for the delinquency; and, among nations, punishment can be inflicted only by war. Such an attempt cannot be made consistent with neutral relations; and we must always keep in mind, that, whatever the General has done, which is not consistent with these relations, which he had no right to change, he has done without authority. I may, however, use this failure on their part in support of the plea of necessity. It may be considered, in a degree, as both the cause and the evidence of the necessity. It is the cause, inasmuch as if Spain had performed her treaty stipulation and restrained her Indians, we should have no desire or necessity of entering her territory to prevent their hostile attacks upon us. It is the evidence, inasmuch as if the Indian force was really so formidable as to overpower the force of Spain, so that she was unable to restrain it on performance of her stipulation, it is not for her to say that the danger to us from this force was so inconsiderable and trifling as not to justify any strong measures on our part to guard against it. I come now to turn your attention to the facts and allegations relied upon for the capture of St. Marks. In General Jackson's letter of the 8th April, 1818, he tells us he left Fort Gadsden on the 26th March; that on the 1st April he was joined by McIntosh; and on the same day discovered a small party of Indians, which he dispersed; he continued the pursuit of them through the Mickasukey village, where he burnt three hundred houses. He then says, "as I had reason to believe a portion of the hostile Indians had fled to St. Marks, I directed my march to that fortress." He afterwards found the Indians and negroes had demanded the surrender of that fort; and that the Spanish garrison was too weak to defend it; and adds, that there were circumstances reported, producing a strong conviction on his mind, that, if not instigated by the Spanish authority, the Indians had received the means of carrying on the war from that quarter; and that St. Marks was necessary as a depot to insure success to his operations. These considerations determined General Jackson to occupy the fort. We here see several reasons urged in justification of this measure, some of which are good and some bad. While, therefore, I admit the justification, I desire to state the ground on which I rest it, lest I might be supposed to adopt all the reasons given for it. In this case the principle on which we approve or disapprove is every thing; as it is the principle, assumed and sanctioned by the House, which will govern future cases.

Three grounds are taken by the General: 1st, that the Spanish authorities in this quarter had instigated and supplied the enemy. If this fact were made out even stronger than it is by the evidence, I should not hold it to be a justification for the measure taken by the army, and, for the reason so often mentioned, that a capture on account would be a hostile capture; an act of war against Spain; would be inconsistent with our neutral relations with that power. It was, doubtless, a just cause of the most serious and determined complaint by our Government against Spain; it would be a just cause of war if Spain refused all reasonable satisfaction for the outrage: but both the cause and the expediency of such a war was to be decided, not by a military commander of our army, but by the Representatives of the people, with whom alone this high and vital power is intrusted. Still less, if possible, is the General justified by the second consideration suggested by him in his defence; that St. Marks was a necessary depot to insure success in his operations against our enemy. I will not abuse the patience of the committee by showing them that by no known law of nations, by no principle of common justice or common sense, can I take forcible possession of the property of another; can I violate his most sacred and essential rights, merely for my convenience, or to insure success in a contest to which he is not a party, and in which he has no concern. Such a doctrine is monstrous, and subversive of the very foundations of public and private rights. What, then, remains for his justification? It is this—that a surrender of this fortress had been demanded by our enemy; that the neutral power was confessedly too weak to resist the demand or prevent the execution of the menace with which it was accompanied, of taking forcible possession if refused. For the proof of this fact, I look not to dubious circumstances, or witnesses of doubtful credit. We have it in the unequivocal declarations of the Governor of Pensacola and the commandant of St. Marks. We have these declarations proved, not only by unexceptionable witnesses, but under the hand of the commandant in his letter of the 7th of April. When these officers of the Spanish authority were charged with giving aid and countenance and protection to our enemy, in violation both of the general and the treaty duties of Spain, they defend or excuse themselves by displaying the force and ferocity of the Indians; by their menaces to take possession of the fort, and the inability to prevent it. If these assertions are to make the apology, they must be taken to be true, and, if true, they may be used by both parties, they may serve to justify such proceedings on our part as are fairly justified by them. This, then, being the case, what is the principle of national law that should govern it? I hold it to be entirely clear, that, when a fort, or any other means of warfare, will, with reasonable certainty, fall into the hands of one of the belligerents, and be by him used against the other, the party thus endangered may prevent the evil, on the rights of self-defence, by taking even forcibly, the instrument from the neutral; and that this is, in point of law, no hostile attack upon the neutral, nor right to be considered by him as an act of war, or a breach of his neutral relation. If arms, artillery, munitions of war, belonging to a neutral, were about to be taken by our enemy, can anybody doubt we might prevent this evil (if the neutral could not) by seizing them ourselves; making afterwards proper satisfaction to the neutral. I know, sir, that I here come directly upon a transaction which made much clamor in the world, particularly in this part of it, when it occurred—I mean the seizure of the Danish fleet, lying at Copenhagen, by the British. Taking the state of the fact to be as I have represented, I cannot doubt of the justification of the act. It is the common sense of mankind. Let me put a familiar case. Two men are engaged in one of these avenues in mutual strife; it is the contest of death. One of them perceives a stranger passing by who has no concern whatever in the quarrel; who is a neutral. But, this stranger has in his hand a drawn sword, which the combatant certainly knows will be taken and used against him by his antagonist, unless he prevents it by seizing the sword himself. He knows the neutral cannot prevent it, if he will. Will any man say, that, in this situation, he would not be justified in disregarding, for a moment, and in a point comparatively insignificant, the rights of the stranger, and taking from him the weapon which he cannot retain, and which in the hands of his adversary might be fatal to him? I agree, sir, that the belligerent using this violence takes a high responsibility upon himself, and is bound to make out his justification in the manner I have stated, with great certainty and by unequivocal evidence. On what principle but this can our Government justify itself for taking and still holding Amelia Island? It had fallen into the possession, not, indeed, of a regular force, and civilized enemy, but of a gang of brigands, pirates, and fugitives from justice. From its local situation our country was exceedingly exposed to the lawless depredations of these robbers. Spain, the rightful owner of the soil, was unable to break up the nest and expel the murderers from it, or prevent the injuries which they were able to inflict upon us by the use of the Spanish territory. Assuredly, then, the most obvious principles of self-defence authorized us to deprive the enemy of this means of annoying us; to take from them, not from Spain, a position of which she has been unjustly deprived, and which was so dangerous to us. It was no violation of the neutral rights of Spain; there was nothing in it of which she could reasonably complain. The occupation of St. Marks by General Jackson stands on the same principles; the admission and declarations of the Spanish authorities commanding in the fort. One part of this transaction I confess, is not sufficiently explained. It appears that the commandant and garrison were transported to Pensacola; but it does not clearly appear whether this was done by the orders of the General, or in compliance with their own wishes. It needs not a word to satisfy the committee, that, when a belligerent does find himself under a necessity to appropriate to himself the rights and property of another, he must do it with all possible respect to those rights, and with as little inconvenience and injury as practicable to the neutral. He may not, therefore, in a case like the present, expel the neutral from his possession; he should hold out a joint occupation of the place, and hold it as inoffensively as the nature of his situation will allow. Upon this point, I do not find sufficient light in the testimony to justify or condemn the General. I shall trouble the committee no longer with the seizure of St. Marks, having explained the grounds on which alone it appears to me it can be defended consistently with our neutral relations with Spain.

I propose next to consider the case of Pensacola. The capture of this place, with the fort of Barancas, must be tried and tested by the principles I have already submitted to the committee. It must be defended either by showing it was necessary to preserve our army from some immediate, unjust, and extreme peril, or that there was such reasonable certainty as existed in the case of St. Marks, that, if not occupied by our troops, it would fall into the hands of our enemy, and by them be used as a means of annoyance against us. This brings us to a question of fact to be decided by the evidence. On the 7th of April General Jackson took possession of St. Marks. On the 20th of April he writes that the destruction of Bowlegstown, with the possession of St. Marks, will end the Indian war for the present; and, should it be renewed, the position taken will enable a small party to put it down. He states he is informed a few Red Sticks at Pensacola point were fed and supplied by the Governor of Pensacola; that he will reconnoitre there, and then return home for his health. On the 26th of April, he writes that he will proceed directly to Nashville. "My presence in this country can be no longer necessary." He expressly declares, that the Indians are scattered; cut off; and that "they no longer have the power, if they had the will, of again annoying our frontier." In another letter, written on the 5th of May, he says, the resistance of the enemy had been feeble; that it had been a war of movements and partial rencontres; that the Red Sticks had been severely convinced; and the Seminoles were too weak in numbers to believe they could maintain a war against the United States. In this same letter of the 5th of May, he gives the first intimation of an intention to occupy Pensacola. It has been stated, he says, the Indians have free access into Pensacola; are kept advised of our movements; supplied with munitions of war, and are collecting in that city to the amount of four or five hundred; that inroads from thence are made into Alabama, and eighteen settlers had been killed. If this is correct, says the General, Pensacola must be occupied by the American troops; the Governor treated according to his deserts, or as policy may dictate. The General then gives his "confirmed opinion" that, as long as Spain has not the power or the will to enforce the treaties by which she is bound to restrain the Indians, our frontier can have no security without occupying a cordon of posts along the seashore. Such are the facts and reasons by which the General defends the violent and hostile seizure of Pensacola and Barancas, and his subsequent proceedings respecting them. In these facts and reasons we must find that necessity which alone, by the law of nations, can justify measures so extraordinary. It would be a waste of time to make a particular analysis of the evidence to show how utterly insufficient it is to the purpose.

The war at an end; the enemy dispersed, exterminated, and broken down; having no longer the power, if he should have the will, to annoy us; the commanding General returning home, because his presence can no longer be necessary; the position taken being fully adequate to put down the war, should the foe have the temerity to renew it; and yet, with all this mass of facts testified by the General himself, and this confidence of opinion expressed by himself, we are to be told of necessities; of dangers; of inroads and murders, which shall justify us in one of the most high-handed measures that one nation can take against another. No, sir, these were not the motives; it was not because a few miserable, defeated, starving Red Sticks were fed by the Governor of Pensacola; it could not be because the enemy was kept advised from them of the movements of our army, after the war was over and all movement but towards their homes had ceased; it was not because the Indians had, as they always had, a free access into Pensacola, that our General chose to wrest by military force this place from the hands of its owner, in violation of the laws of civilized nations; and, being an act of war, in violation of the constitution of his country. It is not because Spain is not in a condition to insist upon her rights, or resent the violation of them, that the act is the more justified. The General did that which, in other circumstances, would have, rightfully, on the part of the offended nation, involved us in a war; and it will hardly be said such a power, under our constitution, is vested in any military commander. But, sir, the true motive of this bold step is exposed. The General has a confirmed opinion that, unless Spain performs her treaty with the United States, a cordon of posts along the seashore will be necessary; and he accordingly proceeds, without further consultation with his own Government, to occupy these posts. Here, then, we have a military officer undertaking to judge whether a treaty with a foreign power has been broken, and without inquiring what reason or excuse that power may have in explanation; without inquiring whether his own Government has been reasonably satisfied on the subject; without examining what course the policy and interests of his own country may dictate in such a case, he proceeds to apply, of his own will and authority, the remedy he deems most proper; that is, to wage immediate war on the other party; he takes into his hands the highest power the people can exercise themselves or grant to others—the power of putting the nation in jeopardy; of expending its blood and treasure, and involving it in the countless calamities of war. The people of the United States have intrusted this power only to their immediate representatives, and General Jackson has walked over our heads, and the heads of the people, in assuming it himself. This must not be.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kentucky, said that he concurred with those gentlemen who considered the questions involved in the resolutions as intrinsically of the first magnitude, and fully meriting the free discussion which they had received; but, he said, it was true that the House of Representatives could give importance to any question. Such was the character and station which this House, under the constitution, must always hold before the people, that every subject which excites interest and feeling here, will command the attention of the nation. In giving his opinions on the questions, he should only be anxious to give expression to those sentiments which he held, without stopping a moment to inquire whether they are consistent with those of gentlemen who voted with him. In examining the military transactions which gave rise to the debate, he acknowledged that he had felt an anxiety to find that the American officer was in the right; but the first consideration with him was, that in giving his opinions and his vote, he himself should be exactly right. On great political questions, it has been sometimes thought admissible to act from partisan feelings,—to express only those opinions which are sanctioned by party, and would conduce to success in the great end desired—but, in a case where the character of a high officer was involved, where our conduct should partake of judicial sacredness, it would disgrace a statesman to withhold any opinion because it differed from that of those with whom he voted.

The situation of Arbuthnot is different from that of Ambrister in one point; he was not found in the ranks of the enemy, but in a neutral fort. Most of the gentlemen who have supported the resolutions, admit that he had been previously an associate in the war, but contend that, as at the time of his capture he was a non-combatant, the analogy between his case and that of the Englishman is destroyed. The reason of the case certainly will not bear them out, and they have not produced any authority on the subject. It cannot be contended that if the General of the enemy was taken in a farm-house, either on his route from one wing of the army, to the other, or on a journey to his family, that he would not be a prisoner of war, although he might be entirely alone, and even destitute of arms. If Tecumseh, in the latter part of the war, had been captured in Canada, engaged in the work of a country laborer, would that fact alone have deprived him of his war character, and released him from its penalties? The true distinction is this: when an officer has resigned, or a soldier has been discharged, or either has in so effectual a way seceded, as to be no longer a member of the enemy's armament, then the military character ceases, and not before. No temporary absence will produce the end contended for; it must be an absence attended with circumstances clearly showing a permanent secession. Frequently the most effectual aid is given, by a partisan, who is absent, and who is physically a non-combatant, by advice and other modes of co-operation. In this case, where the previous association must be conceded, there are no circumstances which indicate a separation from the enemy. As far as any evidence arises from his situation in the fort, to which the enemy had constant access, it is altogether against him. There is a fact connected with this subject, which deserves consideration. Among civilized nations, only a small portion of the community is attached to the army, and of course the rules of war apply only to those who constitute it; the peasantry of the country is not subject to any of the penalties of the soldier; but among the Indians, there is no such distinction; among them none exists, except that which is produced by age and sex. Every man is a warrior. Every one, whom you take, is a prisoner, whether he be in arms or at rest. There is no military enrolment among them; if he belongs to the nation, he belongs to the army. This is certainly true, and is founded on habits invariably preserved by the Indians. Among us, and all European nations, that portion of the community engaged in husbandry, or in raising food for the army, is secured from the rules of war; but among the Indians, all the men fight, and the food is raised by the women, and, of course, this security from war is confined to them. If an Indian chief, found in the situation of Arbuthnot, would have been a prisoner of war, surely he was.

In a war with the Indians, who receive no heralds, and respect no flags, and with whom the massacre of prisoners is not an exception from their usual conduct, but the general practice itself, it cannot be required of General Jackson that he should have been guilty of the folly of sending to the Indians any individual of his army to demand satisfaction for that which was the common custom of the nation. The idea expressed in this resolution is contained in one passed in relation to the execution of Colonel Hayne, an American officer, although it is not conveyed in language so distinct: "Resolved, That the conduct of Major General Greene, in taking necessary measures of retaliation, be, and hereby is, approved." These resolutions clearly convey the opinion of the Old Congress, that the commanding officers of separate armies possessed this contested power by virtue of their commissions. Circumstances may be easily supposed, in which the utility of retaliation would be entirely lost, if this power must in every case be granted by the Legislature; in every war, which is to be concluded in a single campaign, (and this may be the character of many of the Indian wars,) if the officer did not possess it until he could refer the case to Congress, and procure the authority, the time would have passed at which it could avail him; the effect he would desire to produce, on the conduct of the enemy, would be lost, and the reference useless. This would always be the case where the seat of war was at a great distance from head-quarters. This view of the subject is strongly supported by the situation of an officer in a besieged town. Here all communication with his superiors is cut off, and if we deny to him this power of coercing his enemy to humanity, his situation is miserable indeed; his countrymen have failed to give him authority, and his enemies have deprived him of the means of acquiring it. If this power was lodged in the President, then there can be no difficulty, as General Jackson has received the subsequent sanction of his superior. But there is a letter of instruction, under which General Jackson might, if he were disposed, cover almost any thing, certainly every thing which he did. In the letter of the 16th January, from the War Department, there are these remarkable and extraordinary words: "The honor of the United States requires that the war with the Seminoles should be terminated speedily, and with exemplary punishment for hostilities so unprovoked." It is very difficult to ascertain the precise instructions which the Secretary meant that these words should convey. They cannot mean that the American officer should march rapidly, fight gallantly, and slay all who resisted in battle; all this required no order. It is certain that no authority has been exercised, which these words are not broad enough to convey. Mr. A. said he did not contend that the Secretary thought of such a case as had occurred, or that General Jackson wished to deduce his justification from it, but he would most confidently assert, that, if the officer were in the course of a trial driven to extremity, these words give him an ample patent.

Mr. A. said, that it was now manifest to the committee that he derived no part of General Jackson's authority from the sentence of the court-martial; his power was possessed without their interference, and might be exercised in direct opposition to it. It may then be demanded, why was it convened? This still produces no difficulty. It might be convenient to the General to have its opinion and advice; or to have its aid in ascertaining the facts. But you might go still farther, Mr. Chairman, and admit, that to convene the court was useless, and that General Jackson's conduct to it was indecorous and insulting, and still the question before us is not affected; his lawful authority was still the same. Any individual in private life may ask, and then reject, the advice of his friends; this indeed is very rude, but his right is undisputed. The commander of an army frequently convenes his officers to hear their opinions on the propriety of fighting or retreating, but no one ever doubted his authority to reject their advice. The order for convening the officers in this case, and the circumstances of their having proceeded under all the forms of a court, cannot change their character. If the General possesses the power without them, their sentence can be no more than advice.

It is evident, said Mr. A., from the reasons which I have assigned, that my ground of justification does not cover Pensacola. As the occupation of both posts is presented in the resolution for censure, he could not, in any event, vote for the general resolution; but he would not rest his vote on that ground; he would as promptly oppose the one as the other. Before he could give his assent to this proposition, it must be established that every difference of opinion authorized a vote of disapprobation. Before he proceeded to examine the case, he would make a reply to an observation which had been repeatedly made in the debate. It had been said that the passage of these resolutions would convey no censure directly on the officer; that his name is not mentioned. Gentlemen say that the first and third resolutions are merely preambles, or recitals of the mischief, which shows the necessity of adopting the others, and founding a law on them. But, Mr. Chairman, every vote which passes this House receives a part of its character from the debate which precedes it; and, after the manner of this debate, and the spirit which has marked it, it is in vain to say that the passage of these resolutions would not convey the highest censure.

SATURDAY, January 30.

Seminole War.

The House then proceeded to the order of the day, and again took up, in Committee of the Whole, the report of the Military Committee, on the subject of the Seminole war.

Mr. LOWNDES, of South Carolina, said, that before he entered into the consideration of the arguments on which he supposed that the determination of the resolutions before the committee should principally depend, he would advert, for a moment, to some observations made by the Speaker, in relation to the treaty of Fort Jackson. His absence from this country at the period of the treaty, and for some time after it, sufficiently accounted for his information being incorrect upon this topic. He had said that it would have been worthy the generosity of the Government to have given some consideration to the Indians, for the cessions of land which it obtained. The records of the country would show that this was the course actually pursued. After the ratification of the treaty of Fort Jackson, the journal of the commissioners who made it, was laid before the House of Representatives. It contained a declaration of the chiefs who signed the treaty, that they were not satisfied with its terms, although they would not withhold the signature which was insisted on. The same paper furnished the proof that the cessions in the treaty were not made with the free consent of the chiefs, and an exposition of the terms on which that consent would have been given. The House of Representatives, he believed, by a unanimous vote, passed a bill, which gave to the Indians the terms, with which, at the conferences at Fort Jackson, they had declared that they would be fully satisfied. This bill had become a law, and, if the conditions of the treaty had been such as it was harsh to exact, the Government, which gave a sum exceeding one hundred thousand dollars, as an equivalent for a cession which, by treaty, was to have been made without any equivalent, had pursued precisely the conduct which the Speaker had declared he could have wished.

Mr. L. would not say that the act was liberal and magnanimous. Such praise should be reserved for greater occasions. But it was just. Nor had he ever heard, nor did he believe, that the conduct of the United States, after the treaty of Fort Jackson, had given ground of complaint to the Creek nation, inhabiting within their boundaries. Fugitives, indeed, from the nation, unwilling or afraid to trust themselves among their countrymen, had sought refuge in Florida, but their flight did not divest the nation of the rights of negotiation and government. Nor did they pretend it. They sought only for personal safety, and, at the date of the Treaty of Ghent, there was no war between the United States and any part of the Creek nation.

Mr. L. said that he considered himself fortunate in having an opportunity of addressing the Chair, immediately after the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. ANDERSON,) who had just taken his seat. He did not concur, in general, in the conclusions which that gentleman had formed, but he should gladly follow his example, in abstaining from the discussions of questions which were not necessary to the decision of the resolutions before the committee. And upon questions of this sort more than half of the debate appeared to him to have turned.

There was no resolution before the committee declaring that the President was not authorized to direct the march of our troops into those parts of the Seminole country which lay beyond the boundary of the United States. He should not discuss the question. He unequivocally admitted the right.

There was no resolution before the committee declaring that the Government of the United States was not authorized, by the unfriendly conduct of Spain, to occupy Florida, or to resort to general hostilities. He would not discuss this question. He agreed with every member who had spoken, that Congress had the right to declare war against Spain, if it thought it expedient so to do.

But had General Jackson the right to take possession of St. Marks and Pensacola? Had the President of the United States the right? The rights of his subordinate officer were not greater than his own.

Gentlemen must recollect the deliberations upon this subject during the last session; the notice of a proposal by a member from Georgia for the seizure of Florida—the decision of the Committee of Foreign Relations against the expediency of seizing it—the acquiescence of the House in the opinion of their committee. If any man had suggested, during the last session, that Congress, by avoiding the determination of the question of occupying Florida, would have left it open to the decision of the President, or the General, the suggestion would have been heard with utter incredulity. If Congress could have believed that by their omission to act, the power of changing the pacific relations of the country would have been devolved upon any executive officer, he did not doubt that they would have directed, explicitly, what those relations should be. But who could have foreseen that the very circumstances which in March last were insufficient to give the sanction, even of political expediency, to the occupation of Florida, were soon after to be the principal constituents of a military necessity, which would justify a General in taking what the Congress of the United States had determined not to take?

The power of declaring war is given only to Congress. To employ the army of the nation for the purpose of taking possession by force of the territory, the towns, and even the forts of a foreign State, seems to fulfil every condition which can be necessary to constitute an act of war. If such an act be done by an officer who has authority to do it, it is war. It was war, then, if General Jackson was authorized by his office, or by the legal orders of the President, to take possession of Pensacola; and to say that he was authorized by neither, is at once to admit the truth of the position taken in the resolution. A necessity, indeed, which would make the act involuntary, would change its character of hostility; but he must reserve this topic of necessity for another part of his argument. It was not alone, however, the power of declaring war which was given to Congress; the power of employing force against the property or possessions of a foreign nation, under circumstances which do not amount to war, is also confided to the same authority.

The framers of the constitution did not repose that happy confidence in Executive or military officers which might have induced them to give to Congress only the right of proclaiming a solemn and general war, and to leave to the Executive or the military the right of engaging in partial hostilities. If the people of Pensacola, encouraged by the local government, had employed their ships in directly plundering our property, the principles of national law would justify the United States in giving to their citizens the indemnity which the capture of Spanish ships would afford. But by whom must this capture be authorized; by whom must letters of marque be issued—in other words, by whom must the employment of force against the property of a foreign nation, under circumstances which do not amount to war, be directed? By the Congress of the United States. And is there, then, plausibility in the argument which supposes that the President or the General may take, by force, the acknowledged territory of a foreign power, or even besiege and assault his forts—and this, under a constitution which, by the plainest words, reserves to the Legislature the exclusive power of authorizing the capture even of a schooner on the high seas?

Mr. L. considered it clear that the President had no right to authorize the capture of St. Marks and Pensacola. And the documents upon the table sufficiently proved that such was the view he had taken of his own powers. To have retained Pensacola, even until the meeting of Congress, would have been, he says, to have changed the relations between the two countries. To such a change (he adds) the power of the Executive is incompetent. To have retained Pensacola for a month or two, against the will of Spain, would have been war; the order for its restoration was therefore given, promptly, and without the slightest intimation of any change in the condition of the Indian enemy, or of our own army, which would make its retention less necessary or less justifiable than its original capture. Are we, then, to believe that, to have retained possession of Pensacola for a few months, against the will of Spain, would have been war, and that to have taken it by force, to have entered it by military capitulation, was not an act of war; that it did not even imply any change in the state of our foreign relations, to which the power of the Executive was incompetent?

Mr. L. had referred to the President's conviction of a want of authority on his part, to retain or to take Pensacola, with no view of substituting authority for argument: but by an ingenious construction of vague and general phrases, an attempt had been made to show that powers sufficiently large had been given to General Jackson to authorize the occupation of Pensacola. He did not wish to engage in this verbal criticism. A sufficient proof that the President did not design to give any power for occupying Pensacola, was found in this, that he did not consider himself authorized to give any. Argument, however, upon this subject, was as unnecessary as criticism. The gentleman from New York (Mr. STORRS) had proved, by the extracts which he had read from the President's message and from Mr. Adams's letter, that the occupation of St. Marks and Pensacola was without the authority of the Government, and on the responsibility of the commanding General.

The President, then, had no right to give an order for the occupation of the places in question, and he had given none. But he had given orders, the fair and obvious import of which forbade the occupation of St. Marks and Pensacola. If the Indians took shelter under a Spanish fort, the General was not to attack them, but to notify the Department of the fact. Now, he would ask the committee for a moment to suppose that the Indians, beaten and pursued through their swamps, had actually taken refuge under the guns of Pensacola. What would have been the situation of General Jackson? What his powers and duties? The very exigency foreseen, and provided for by the instructions of the War Department, would have occurred. He could not have attacked the Indians or the fort, because it sheltered them; could he have attacked both for other reasons? What would have been his letter of justification to the Secretary of War if he had done so? Sir, the very contingency has occurred which your letter has anticipated. The Indians have taken shelter under a Spanish fort. Not authorized on this account to have attacked them, I should have merely notified the Department of the fact. But other circumstances justified a different conduct. I found not merely that the Indians had taken shelter under a Spanish fort, but that when there the Spaniards gave them aid and comfort, and access and information, and ammunition and provision. On these grounds they became associates in the war. Must not the answer of the Executive Government to a letter of this sort have been that, in ordering no attack to be made upon Indians sheltered under a Spanish fort, the President had ordered that upon no evidence of association or connection between Indians and Spaniards, should the General undertake to attack the fort of a nation with which we were at peace; that the President well understood that Indians do not move with magazines and provisions, and all the equipage of war; that when he anticipated the event of their taking shelter under a Spanish fort, all those acts of communication, aid, and supply, were supplied, without which their shelter would have been decoy and destruction? If all the circumstances on which General Jackson rests his defence for occupying Pensacola, had been enforced by the much stronger circumstance of an embodied Indian force lying at the time under its walls, he would have disobeyed his instructions in attacking either the Indians or the fort. Does it come to this, that General Jackson was authorized to attack the fort because the Indians had not taken shelter under it?

But what occasion, it has been said, is there to do any thing on the subject? None; if General Jackson did not exceed the powers with which he was intrusted; but if he exerted one of the highest prerogatives of government which is confined to no less authority than the entire Legislature of the country, are we willing to employ our own powers when we think it right, and when we do not to let anybody else assume them? The character of General Jackson is said to be implicated in the vote which is proposed. The opinion of the world and of posterity will not be affected by that vote. There is nothing in the fact or the resolution to impeach his military glory or his patriotism. But the character of the country does not depend alone upon its military exploits. Its civil institutions, its liberty and laws, are elements of the national reputation quite as valuable. To suppress our disapprobation, if it were merited, would not raise the character of General Jackson, but would impair our own.

He could, indeed, suppose cases where power not given by the constitution might be assumed by an Executive officer rightly and necessarily; but he could suppose none in which this assumption should be passed over in silent acquiescence. Indemnity might be extended to the officer and justification to the act, but the absolute necessity, which could alone furnish that justification, should be recorded by the vigilant guardians of the constitution.

He should therefore vote without hesitation for the resolution disapproving the occupation of St. Marks and Pensacola. But upon the subjects of the other resolutions, his views differed from those of the gentlemen with whom he fully concurred in that of which he had been speaking hitherto.

As to the condemnation of Ambrister, he believed, that the power of military execution was inseparably connected with that of directing the military force of the State against an enemy. That enemy must be attacked. Who has the power of receiving their capitulation or surrender? of admitting them into the peace of the country? Not only the usages of war, but the principles of humanity and virtue, require that the unresisting enemy should be spared in general; but this obligation of mercy is not universal. It is not held to extend to those who have broken their parole; nor, by a much stronger reason, to those who make of war an indiscriminate massacre. The right of military execution was, indeed, at least as easily to be deduced from first principles, as that of execution for civil crimes. In neither case was wanton severity to be justified. The Executive Magistrate must decide whether mercy can be safely extended to the obdurate offender against municipal law, and the commanding General, whether quarter can be prudently given to the savage, who himself does not give it. He did not mean, however, to engage in the argument upon this topic, which had been very fully discussed, but merely to state the opinion that, in ordering the execution of Ambrister, against the advice of a council which he had summoned, General Jackson had not exceeded his military authority, although he had indeed assumed a high responsibility.

The case of Arbuthnot appeared to him different in its principles. He did not see how the right of military execution could be applied to any man, who was found under the protection of a nation with which we were at peace. He supposed it restricted to enemies taken in war, and limited both in time and place. Whether our occupation of St. Marks were friendly or hostile, he did not understand how its inhabitants, whether combatants or not, had become subject to military execution. Nor, though it were true, that an atrocious crime would otherwise have gone unpunished, did he admit that a military tribunal should be called in whenever it may be feared that justice would otherwise be disappointed of its victim. Mr. L. said that he had been struck with the indifference which had been displayed throughout the argument to what he deemed most important principles of national law; that the jurisdiction of crimes shall be confined to the nation in which they are committed, and that the Government which is injured must obtain its redress from the nation which permits them to pass unpunished. He knew no State more interested in the maintenance of these principles than the United States. They were, indeed, necessary to the independence of all nations.

Mr. L. said that he should not vote for either of the bills which it was proposed to bring in. For the bill which required the sanction of the President, in time of Indian war, to the execution of a captive, he objected, because, if this power should be lodged in an executive officer at all, in what officer it should be lodged must depend upon considerations only of expediency; and it was necessary to its prompt and useful exercise, that the decision of the General should not wait upon that of the President.

Where the troops of the United States cannot be marched beyond our boundary without committing an act of war against a nation with which we are at peace, he believed that the constitution now prohibits their march, unless by the authority of Congress. Mr. L. had no faith in the benefits of the supplementary law which was proposed. But there might be many cases in which troops might be properly marched beyond the United States without commencing war; either where war had been made against us by another nation, or where a territory, in our neighborhood, was abandoned by its Government. He could not willingly add to the evils of an act which he deeply regretted, by making it the occasion of an improvident law.

MONDAY, February 1.

Seminole War.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on this subject, Mr. BASSETT in the Chair.

Mr. H. NELSON resumed the remarks which he commenced on Saturday, and spoke about two hours in opposition to the resolutions of censure.

Mr. TYLER, of Virginia, said that he owed an apology to the committee for rising at so late a period of the debate to address it. He proposed to present a very brief sketch of the views he had taken on this interesting subject. At the onset, I close in, Mr. Chairman, with the position laid down by the gentleman who has just addressed you, (Mr. NELSON,) and say, that, however great may have been the services of General Jackson, I cannot consent to weigh those services against the constitution of the land. Other gentlemen will, no doubt, yield me the correctness of this position. Your liberties cannot be preserved by the fame of any man. The triumph of the hero may swell the pride of your country—elevate you in the estimation of foreign nations—give to you a character for chivalry and valor; but recollect, I beseech you, that the sheet anchor of our safety is to be found in the constitution of our country. Say that you ornament these walls with the trophies of victory—that the flags of conquered nations wave over your head, what avails these symbols of your glory if your constitution be destroyed? To this pillar then will I cling. Measures not men—and I beg gentlemen to recollect it, has ever been our favorite motto. Shall we abandon it now? Why do gentlemen point to the services of the hero in former wars? For his conduct there he has received a nation's plaudits, and won our gratitude. We come to other acts. If our motto be just, we must look alone to the act, not the actor. It is only then that we shall judge correctly. A Republic, sir, should substitute the Roman Manlius, and disapprove the conduct of her dearest son, if that son has erred. From what quarter do you expect your liberties to be successfully invaded? Not from the man whom you despise; against him you are always prepared to act—his example will not be dangerous. But, sir, you have more to fear from a nation's favorite; from him whose path has been a path of glory; who has won your gratitude and confidence—against his errors you have to guard, lest they should grow into precedents and become in the end the law of the land. It is the precedent growing out of the proceeding in this case that I wish to guard against. It is this consideration, and this only, which will induce me to disapprove the conduct of General Jackson.

Our sympathies have been appealed to in his behalf. There exists no cause for the appeal. Are we about, by this vote, to wither the laurels which bloom on his brow—to deprive him of character, of standing? No, sir, we arraign not his motives. On all hands it is conceded to his supporters that his motives were correct. Did we insist that he had intendedly violated the constitution and the law, then should we make a charge, which, if supported, would properly degrade him in the estimation of all good men. But we make no such charge—we disapprove only his acts. Is this a vote of censure of the odious character which it has been represented to be? Censure implies bad motives and bad acts. Say, if you please, that I have shot my arrow over the house and wounded my brother. He complains of my act, not my intentions, because he is aware they were innocent; but, although he neither upbraids nor censures me, the wound still festers in his side. Is there not even a wide distinction between a vote of censure, in the obvious acceptation of the term, and a vote of disapproval? Is there any thing more common than for an officer ordering a court-martial to disapprove the sentence of the court, and direct it to reconsider its opinion—and yet, was ever such disapproval esteemed a censure on the court? An inferior court gives an erroneous opinion; an appeal is taken to a superior tribunal; the opinion of the inferior court is reversed—was such reversal ever construed to imply a censure on the judge? You differ from me in opinion. You disapprove my premises and the deductions therefrom. Sir, was it ever heard of before, that this difference of opinion required us to regard each other as such objects of censure, as to interrupt our harmony or mutual respect and confidence? We do nothing here but combat the opinions and actions of the General, and if gentlemen will have it so, of the Executive. Shall we be denied the liberty of boldly and manfully expressing this difference of sentiment? Sir, I protest against this slavery of the mind. The body may be enchained and bowed to earth, but that ethereal essence resists your power and scoffs all efforts to enthral it.

What are the points of difference arising out of this case? Gentlemen justify the capture of St. Marks on the plea of necessity; we contend that no such necessity existed; and believing so, we disapprove the capture. We agree, in our premises, that the General would only have been authorized to seize a neutral post, in order either to save his army, or to guard the post against the imminent hazard of falling into the hands of his enemy. We call upon gentlemen for the proof of the existence of such necessity, or of such danger. The letter of the Governor of Pensacola, informing General Jackson that the garrison of St. Marks was too weak to defend itself against a hostile attack, and that the enemy had made demonstrations of an intention to seize it, will not justify him in having taken possession at the time he did. Before he approached, the danger had retired; no force was before it, nor within a great distance of it; nor had he any enemy in his rear, and his army was easily thrown between the fort and the foe. Sir, every document on your table goes to prove that the Indians were defeated, their forces broken, and that they had sought shelter and protection from the ruin and destruction which pursued them, in their swamps and hiding places. An attack on St. Marks was, therefore, rendered improbable. But admit, for the sake of argument, that this was not the case; nay, Mr. Chairman, to give to our opponents the strongest of all possible cases, let us imagine the Indians in possession of the fort—would your army have been in danger? Can any gentleman believe it? Sir, did you ever hear of an Indian using cannon in action? Their situation would, indeed, have been ludicrous. I submit it, in the spirit of candor, to gentlemen to say, if the General could more ardently have wished for any event, than that the enemy should have concentrated the whole of his forces at St. Marks, with the settled determination of holding the post. He would have been saved the fatigue of marching further; one action would have terminated the sufferings of his army; the defence would have been weak and unavailing, and a new spark of glory would have illumined the crest of the hero.

The remarks which I have made relative to the seizure of St. Marks, are now strongly applicable to that of Pensacola. It is in vain you tell me that the Governor was destitute of principle—had violated his neutrality—had given shelter to a poor, miserable, broken, and defeated foe—a foe, who, like the hunted beast of the forest, had held you but a moment at bay, and was then flying to his secret places, far from the haunts of civilized man, to hide himself from the desolating vengeance which pursued him. Sir, I carry you back to my first position. Congress, and not the General, was alone authorized to make war upon him. Will it be said, that necessity, which justifies all things, authorized its capture? Where is it to be found? Indians retreated to the town—were in possession of it, if gentlemen will ask the admission. We require that the General shall look to his orders. It is the very case they contemplate—he must report to the Executive. But a threat is made—you are braved to your teeth. The gauntlet of defiance is thrown—you are threatened with an attack—let it come on. The storm has no terror for the brave, nor can the frown of the Spaniard shake the soul of the hero. But there was no danger to be apprehended. The Governor had no force with which to make the attack. My honorable friend from Virginia, (Mr. BARBOUR,) in graduating the necessity of this case, states, that if the attack had been made, Jackson would have been justified in seizing Pensacola. True, his right to seize might have existed, but he could have held it only for a moment. The assailant vanquished, the General would have been compelled to have returned to him his armor.

As to the remaining points of inquiry, I shall be very brief. Sir, my only object is to present you what I esteem the strong points of these questions. I do not wish, even if I had the power, to perplex you with subtle and ingenious reasoning. My object is to meet the questions fairly—to encounter the arguments of honorable gentlemen with such force as I can, and to contribute, as far as my humble talents will permit me, in elucidating this interesting subject. If, Mr. Chairman, the capture of St. Marks was unauthorized, the execution of Arbuthnot must of necessity have been so. Spain was a neutral in the war. Her flag, therefore, for he was in St. Marks, protected Arbuthnot from your power. This is the principle for which we have never ceased to contend. The same principle prevails on the land and on the ocean. If this man had been on board a Spanish vessel, according to this rule, one of your naval officers would have had no authority to have dragged him from on board that vessel and punished him with death.

The execution of Ambrister and the two Indian chiefs I consider equally indefensible. Although the reasoning applicable to the case of Arbuthnot is not applicable to that of Ambrister, yet all the reasons which go to show the impropriety of the execution of the latter, apply also to the former. I shall not stop to inquire whether the court-martial was properly organized, or proceeded with due solemnity and form. This has already been sufficiently canvassed, and in my estimation constitutes only a secondary branch of inquiry. I reason from great principles recognized by the law of nations. That law recognizes but one reason cogent enough to authorize a General to put to death his prisoners. And that is, "where the safety of his men requires it." Was that safety implicated by suffering a wretch to live? Was the existence of his men or his army endangered in the life of a miserable vampire who had crawled from the sinks of European corruption, and had visited this western shore, either to exist in the commission of crime himself, or on the enormities of others? Or did the continuance of the lives of his Indian captives threaten discomfiture and overthrow? It cannot be pretended. The first was too insignificant to have excited such fears—the power of the last was broken, and all their efforts defeated. The rifle and tomahawk had been struck from their hands, and they were prisoners, defenceless and disarmed. Sir, would it not have better comported with your national character, if, instead of executing these captives, the General had said to them, "go, I give you your liberty: go to your few surviving warriors, and tell them that that nation against whose defenceless frontiers you have raised the murderous scalping-knife, with whom you have ever been at war, whose blood you have delighted to drink—that nation, so abused, so insulted, has no law to punish you: it restores you to your native forests, and has only to ask that you will abandon your enmities, and instruct your warriors how to respect her rights." I cannot but think that this would better have accorded with the principles of humanity and the laws of nations.

TUESDAY, February 2.

The Seminole War.

The House then again went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. SMITH of Maryland in the Chair, on this subject.

Mr. POINDEXTER spoke near three hours in support of his opinions, and in reply to gentlemen on the other side of the question.—His speech follows, entire.

Mr. POINDEXTER addressed the Chair as follows:

I rise, Mr. Chairman, under the influence of peculiar sensibility, to offer my sentiments on the subject before the committee. We are called upon to disrobe a veteran soldier of the well-earned laurels which encircle his brow, to tarnish his fame by severe reproaches, and hand down his name to posterity as the violator of the sacred instrument which constitutes the charter of our liberties, and of the benevolent dictates of humanity, by which this nation has ever been characterized and distinguished. Were the sacrifice of this highly meritorious citizen the only evil with which the proposed resolutions are fraught, I should derive some consolation from the reflection, that there is a redeeming spirit in the intelligence and patriotism of the great body of the people, capable of shielding him against the deleterious consequences meditated by the propositions on your table. But there is another, and more serious aspect, in which the adoption of these resolutions must be viewed; the direct and infallible tendency which they involve, of enfeebling the arm of this Government, in our pending negotiation with Spain; of putting ourselves in the wrong, and the Spanish Monarch in the right, on the interesting and delicate points which have so long agitated and endangered the peace of the two countries. I wish not to be understood as attributing to honorable gentlemen, who advocate the measure, such motives; they are, doubtless, actuated alone by a sense of duty. I speak of the effects which our proceedings are calculated to produce, without intending to cast the slightest imputation on those who entertain different opinions. Sir, do we not know with what delight and satisfaction the Minister of Spain looks on the efforts which are made on this floor to inculpate the Executive of the United States, for having committed against his immaculate master an act of hostility, in the entrance into Florida, and the temporary occupation of St. Marks and Pensacola? With what avidity and pleasure he peruses the able and eloquent arguments delivered in the popular branch of the Government, in support of the weighty allegations which he has already exhibited of the hostile and unwarrantable conduct of the commander of our army, during the late campaign against the Seminole Indians? And, sir, whatever may be the purity of intention, which I shall not presume to question, on the part of gentlemen who censure the course pursued by the commanding General, this debate will afford a valuable fund, on which Spain will not fail to draw, on all future occasions, to show that the pacific relations which she has endeavored to maintain, have been violated, without an adequate cause, by the United States. Shall we put it in her power to make this declaration to the civilized world, and establish the fact by a reference to the Journal of the House of Representatives? I hope and believe we shall not. Sir, the nature of our free institutions imperiously requires that, on all questions touching controversies with foreign powers, every Department of this Government should act in concert, and present to the opposite party one undivided, impenetrable front. The observance of this rule accords with every dictate of patriotism; and is the basis on which alone we can preserve a proper respect for our rights among the great family of nations. Internal divisions are often fatal to the liberties of the people; they never fail to inflict a deep wound on the national character; the lustre and purity of which it is our primary duty to preserve unsullied, to the latest posterity. Can it be necessary to call to the recollection of the committee the peculiar and delicate posture of our relations with Spain? A protracted and difficult negotiation, on the subject of boundary and spoliations, is still progressing between the Secretary of State and their accredited Minister, at this place; the result is yet extremely doubtful; it may, and I trust will, eventuate in a treaty satisfactory to the parties, on all the points in contest; but, if Spain should continue to reject the moderate and reasonable demands of this Government, the indisputable rights of this nation must and will be asserted and vindicated by a solemn appeal to arms. I ask if, in such a crisis, it is either wise or prudent to pronounce, in the face of the world, that we have been the aggressors, and that war in its most offensive and exceptionable sense has been already commenced by General Jackson, under the sanction of the President of the United States? I hazard nothing in affirming that such a departure from the established usages of nations is without a parallel in the history of any country, ancient or modern. Under whatever circumstances danger may threaten us from abroad, it is from this House that the energies of the people are to be aroused and put in motion; it is our province to sound the alarm, and give the impulse which stimulates every portion of the Union to a simultaneous and manly exertion of its physical strength, to avenge the insulted honor and violated interests of our country. We are the legitimate organ of public sentiment; and it is incumbent on us to animate and cherish a spirit of resistance to foreign encroachments among our constituents, by urging the justice of our cause, and the necessity of their vigorous co-operation in support of the constituted authorities, who are responsible to them for the faithful execution of the high and important duties with which they are intrusted. These are the means by which we shall perpetuate our Republican form of Government, and transmit its blessings to future generations. But we are required on the present occasion to forget the wrongs of which we have so long and so justly complained; to abandon, for a while, the lofty attitude of patriotism, and to tell the American people, in anticipation of a rupture with Spain, that it is a war of aggression on the part of their chief Executive Magistrate, commenced in Florida without proper authority; that the Spanish Government can consider it in no other light than premeditated, offensive war, made on them with a view of extending the territorial limits of the United States. The expression of these opinions, by this body, must cast a shade over the American name, which no lapse of time can obliterate; and, while we nerve the arm of the enemy, we shall approach the contest with an open denunciation against the President, who is charged with its prosecution to a speedy and favorable termination. He is denied the cheering consolation of Union, in the Government over which he has been called to preside, at a period of national peril, when every man ought to be invited to rally around the standard of his country. Sir, how is this most novel and extraordinary aberration from the legislative functions of the House attempted to be explained and justified? By gloomy pictures of a violated constitution; pathetic appeals to humanity, in favor of a barbarous and unrelenting foe; and lamentations over the blighted honor and magnanimity of the nation. I, too, am a conservator of the constitution; I venerate that stupendous fabric of human wisdom; I love my country, and will endeavor to rescue it from the odious imputations which have been so freely cast on it in the progress of this discussion. I admonish gentlemen, who manifest such ardent zeal to fortify the powers of this House against military usurpations, that they do not suffer that zeal to precipitate them into an error equally repugnant to a sound construction of the constitution. The report of the Committee on Military Affairs, taken in connection with the amendments proposed by the honorable member from Georgia, (Mr. COBB,) may be classed under two general divisions. 1st. Resolutions of censure, on the conduct of General Jackson, in Florida, for a violation of the orders of the President, and of the constitution; and for the unlawful execution of the incendiaries, Arbuthnot and Ambrister. 2d. Instructions to the committee to prepare and report two several bills, the object of which is to divest this nation of some of the most essential attributes of sovereignty. I shall pass over the latter branch of this subject without observation; believing, as I do, notwithstanding the high respect which I entertain for the mover, that it is not seriously the intention of honorable gentlemen, by an act of legislation, to abrogate the rights of this nation, founded on the universal law of nature and of nations. Self-denial, though sometimes an amiable quality in an individual member of society, when applied to the whole community, renders it obnoxious to insult and oppression, and is a voluntary degradation, below the rank of other sovereignties, to which no American ought ever to submit. Neutral rights, and the usages of war, are already well established and understood by all civilized powers; and it is not to be presumed that the interpolations which are proposed would be reciprocated, and constitute the basis of new principles of public law; we may prostrate our own dignity, and paralyze the energies of our country, but we shall find no nation so pusillanimous as to follow our disinterested example.

Considering, therefore, these propositions as merely nominal, intended only to enlarge the group, and give diversity to the picture, I shall leave them without further animadversion, and proceed to investigate the resolutions levelled at the fame, the honor, and reputation, of General Andrew Jackson; and, through him, at the President, under whose orders he acted, and by whom he has been sustained and vindicated. Sir, I hold it to be the indispensable duty of every tribunal, whether legislative or judicial, to examine with caution and circumspection into its jurisdiction and powers, on every question brought before it for adjudication; and this rule ought more particularly to be observed in cases involving personal rights and interests, where the party to be affected by the decision is not permitted to answer in his own defence. I ask, then, sir, has the House of Representatives, as a distinct and separate branch of Congress, the constitutional power to institute an inquiry into the conduct of a military officer, and to sentence him to be cashiered, suspended, or censured? I demand a satisfactory and explicit response to this interrogatory, founded on a reference to the constitution itself, and not on the undefined notions of expediency, in which gentlemen may indulge; and if it be not given, as I am very sure it cannot, we shall become the violators of that fair fabric of liberty, and erect a precedent more dangerous in its tendency, than the multiplied infractions which have been so vehemently alleged against General Jackson, admitting them all the force and latitude which the most enthusiastic censor could desire. Sir, it is high time to bring back this debate to first principles, and to test our jurisdiction over this case, by a recurrence to the structure of the Government of which we are a component part. Let us pluck the beam from our own eyes, before we seek to expel the mote which gentlemen seem to have discovered in the vision of General Jackson. The sages and patriots who established the foundation of this Republic have, with a wisdom and forecast bordering on inspiration, carefully marked and distributed the powers delegated in the constitution to the Federal Government among the several departments, Legislative, Executive, and Judiciary. No principle is better settled, or more generally conceded, than that the powers properly belonging to one of these departments ought not to be directly administered by either of the others. The violation of this maxim leads, by inevitable results, to the downfall of our Republican institutions, and the consolidation of all power in that branch which shall possess the strongest influence over the public mind. Upon the independent exercise of the powers confided to each department, uncontrolled, directly or indirectly, by the encroachments of either, depends the security of life, liberty, and property, and the stability of that constitution which is the pride of our country and the admiration of mankind. The honorable gentleman from Georgia has adverted to the opinions of the immortal author of the letters of Publius, the late Chief Magistrate of the United States; and the honorable Speaker has also invited our attention to that great constitutional lawyer. They triumphantly ask, what he would say on the present question, were he a member of this House? I will not follow the example of these gentlemen, by substituting declamation for historical truth, or vague surmises, and assumed premises, for record evidence; but, while I accord to the distinguished statesman and patriot, whose exertions so eminently contributed to the establishment of this Government, and whose exposition of its fundamental principles cannot be too highly appreciated, all the merit of a useful life, devoted to the public service, guided by wisdom, virtue, and integrity; I appeal with pleasure and confidence to his able pen in support of the position which I have advanced, and which I deem an important point in the case under consideration. In the view taken by Mr. Madison, of the "meaning of the mixim which requires a separation of the departments of power," he repels the arguments of the opponents to the adoption of the constitution, founded on the apprehension of Executive supremacy over the Legislative and Judiciary, which, it was contended, would ultimately render that branch the sole depository of power, and subject the people of this country to the despotic will of a single individual. Comparing the powers delegated to the Executive, with those granted to the Legislature, and the probable danger of an assumption by either of the functions appertaining to the other, he says:

"In a Government where numerous and extensive prerogatives are placed in the hands of a hereditary monarch, the Executive department is very justly regarded as the source of danger, and watched with all the jealousy which a zeal for liberty ought to inspire. In a democracy, where a multitude of people exercise in person the legislative functions, and are continually exposed, by their incapacity for regular deliberation and concerted measures, to the ambitious intrigues of their Executive Magistrates, tyranny may well be apprehended, on some favorable emergency, to start up in the same quarter. But, in a representative Republic, where the Executive Magistracy is carefully limited, both in the extent and duration of its power, and where the legislative power is exercised by an assembly, which is inspired, by a supposed influence over the people, with an intrepid confidence in its own strength; which is sufficiently numerous to feel all the passions which actuate a multitude, yet not so numerous as to be incapable of pursuing the objects of its passions, by means which reason prescribes; it is against the enterprising ambition of this department that the people ought to indulge all their jealousy, and exhaust all their precautions. The legislative department derives a superiority in our Government from other circumstances. Its constitutional powers being at once more extensive, and less susceptible of precise limits, it can, with the greater facility, mask, under complicated and indirect measures, the encroachments which it makes on the co-ordinate departments."

The correctness of the reasoning and predictions of this great and good man, who is called by the honorable Speaker the father of the constitution, has been often demonstrated in the practical operations of this body, and never more forcibly than on the present occasion. Scarcely a session of Congress passes without some effort to enlarge the scope of our powers by construction or analogy; and unless these systematic advances in this House to crush the co-ordinate departments, by an unlimited exercise of authority over all subjects involving the general welfare, be resisted with firmness and perseverance, they will, at no distant period, eventuate in the destruction of those salutary checks and balances so essential to the duration of our happy form of Government, and to the security of civil and political liberty. I deprecate every measure calculated to establish a precedent, which, in its effects, may lead to such dangerous consequences. An enlightened statesman has said that the concentrating all the powers of Government in the legislative body is of the very essence of despotism; and it is no alleviation that these powers will be exercised by a plurality of hands, and not by a single one. "An elective despotism was not the Government we fought for; but one which should not only be founded on free principles, but in which the powers of Government should be so divided and balanced among the several bodies of magistracy, as that no one could transcend their legal limits without being effectually checked and restrained by the others."

Sir, whenever these principles shall cease to be respected by the councils of this country, I shall consider the grand experiment which we have made in the administration of a government of limited powers, founded on a written instrument, in which they are specified and defined, as altogether abortive, and as affording strong proof of the regal maxim, that man is incapable of self-government. If honorable gentlemen mean any thing by the reverence which they profess to feel for the constitution, I conjure them to look to its provisions, and forbear to adopt a measure in direct violation both of its letter and spirit. By article 2d, section 2, it is provided that "the President shall be Commander-in-chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the militia of the several States, when called into actual service;" and by the 8th section of the 1st article, Congress is vested with power to "make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces." Congress has long since fulfilled this duty; rules and articles of war have been sanctioned, and have continued to govern the army from its organization up to the present time; in these the great principles of subordination and responsibility are graduated and established, from the Commander-in-chief down to the most petty officer and common soldier. The President is placed by his country at the head of its physical force, "to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrection, and repel invasion;" he is the ultimate tribunal to decide all questions touching the operations of the army, and the conduct of the officers who compose it. If there be any power, clearly and exclusively belonging to the Executive, it is that which appertains to the government of the Army and Navy of the United States. Our whole system of laws recognizes it; and until this extraordinary attempt to erect the House of Representatives into a court-martial, with a view to cast an indelible stain on the character of General Jackson, without a fair and impartial trial, in which he might confront his accusers and be heard in his defence, no instance can be shown, since the foundation of the Government, where the President has been interrupted in the full exercise of his legitimate authority over the military officers under his command. The abuse of this power, or the improper direction and application of the public forces, by the Chief Magistrate, or by any subordinate officer, with his privity and assent, in a manner, or for the accomplishment of objects dangerous to the liberties of the people, or subversive of the laws and constitution of the Union, will find a ready and suitable corrective in this House, by an application of its power to originate impeachment against the President, Vice President, and all civil officers, for treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors. In this sense only can we be regarded as the grand inquest of the nation, and not to the unlimited extent for which gentlemen have contended. The power to impeach the President is expressly delegated; all other civil officers are liable to the same scrutiny, and the total omission, in the article of the military department, is, to my mind, conclusive evidence that they were never intended to be subject to the control of Congress, except in the usual course of legislation, under the power to raise and support armies. And this opinion is strengthened by the clause of the constitution to which I have referred, directing Congress to provide for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces. The principle of official responsibility is to be found in every page of the constitution; not a vague, uncertain responsibility, but that which is unequivocal, certain, and definite. We are answerable, at stated periods, to the people by whom we have respectively been chosen. The President is accountable to the nation at large at the expiration of his term of service; and, in the mean time, we hold a salutary check over his ambition, if he evince such a disposition, by means of impeachment. In like manner the whole civil department may be punished for a wanton prostitution of their official functions. The military and naval officers who command our army and navy are responsible directly to the Executive, who is their chief, and, through him, indirectly, to the Representatives of the people. Every link in the chain is essential to the beauty and symmetry of the whole; and, if preserved unbroken, affords the most ample security against any usurpation of power without a prompt and efficient remedy to detect and restrain it. It is now proposed to make this House the focus of every power granted to the Federal Government; to mount the ramparts which separate the departments, and compel every man who holds a commission to bow with submission to the gigantic strength of this numerous assembly. Those whom we cannot impeach we will censure, and record their names as fit objects for the scorn and detestation of posterity. Already we hold the purse and the sword of the nation. All legislation must receive our concurrence, in connection with the President and Senate, before it has the force and effect of law. The treaty-making power may be controlled by us where an appropriation is required to fulfil the contract—the judiciary is at our feet, both in respect to the extent of its jurisdiction and the liability of its members to the summary process of impeachment—the President and heads of department, foreign ministers, and the whole catalogue of civil officers, stand in awe of our frowns, and may be crushed by the weight of our authority. I ask, then, sir, if the officers of the army and navy are rendered subservient to us as a censorial, inquisitorial body, whether it will not amount to the "very definition of despotism." Yes, sir, we shall, if these resolutions pass, bear testimony of the soundness of the political axiom, that it is "against this department that the people ought to indulge all their jealousy, and exhaust all their precautions." But the constitution, in this respect, has received a construction almost contemporaneously with its adoption. As early as the year 1792, a resolution was submitted, by a distinguished member from Virginia, in the House of Representatives, requesting the President to institute an inquiry into the causes of the defeat of the army under the command of Major General St. Clair. The agitation produced by that momentous disaster seemed to demand an investigation of the conduct of the commanding General. A great public calamity is always calculated to awaken feelings which, for a moment, usurp the empire of reason, and lead to excesses which sober reflection would condemn. It was not, therefore, wonderful, that a man of the soundest intellect, and most enlightened understanding, should have felt it his duty to call the attention of the President to a subject so deeply interesting to the country, and to request an inquiry into the causes of that signal and unfortunate defeat. The proposition was fully discussed, and finally rejected by a large majority, on the ground that it was an unwarrantable interference with the constitutional functions of the Chief Magistrate. The substance of the debate may be found in the newspapers of that day; and among those who objected to the measure are the names of Madison, Ames, Baldwin, and many others who participated in the formation of the constitution, and who were, consequently, better qualified to give to it a sound interpretation. A committee was subsequently appointed to inquire into the expenditure of the public money in that campaign, and other subjects of a general nature, connected with the legislative duties of Congress. Again: in the year 1810, a committee was raised to inquire into the conduct of General James Wilkinson, in relation to a variety of charges which had been publicly made against him; they were authorized to send for persons and papers. The General was notified of their sittings, allowed to attend in person before them, to cross-examine the witnesses, to confront his accusers, to exhibit evidence in his defence, and make such explanations as he might think necessary to a vindication of his conduct. The committee, after a very laborious investigation, simply reported the facts to the House, who resolved that the same be transmitted to the President of the United States. No opinion was expressed or intimated, as to the guilt or innocence of the General; no request was made of the President to institute a court-martial, but he was left to the exercise of his own discretion, unbiassed by the slightest indication of the impression which the development had made on the House of Representatives. The result, we all know, was, that a general court-martial was immediately convened, and General Wilkinson was honorably acquitted: both principle and precedent, therefore, combine in recommending a rejection of these resolutions, which claim for this House a power, not merely to request another department to perform a particular duty, but assume the right to adjudicate the case, and sentence an officer to irretrievable infamy, without a hearing, and without appeal, save only to his God and the purity of his own conscience.

Permit me, sir, to present to the view of the committee some of the unavoidable consequences which will flow from this premature and unauthorized proceeding. We announce to the President, and to the nation, that General Jackson, in the prosecution of the Seminole war, has violated his orders and broken the constitution of his country, and that, in the trial and execution of Arbuthnot and Ambrister, he has been guilty of the horrid crime of official murder. We, on the part of the whole people, become the informers, and thereby impose on the President, as commander-in-chief of the army, the indispensable obligation to adopt one of two alternatives—either to dismiss from the service that officer, under our denunciations, or to assemble a regular court-martial to investigate these charges, according to the forms prescribed in the laws enacted for the government of the army of the United States. The latter course, being the one best adapted to the attainment of justice, would, in all probability, be pursued. He details a court-martial, composed of high-minded military men; charges and specifications are exhibited; and the General, for the first time, is allowed to answer to them—guilty or not guilty. He is put on his trial, and at the very threshold he is informed that he has already been found guilty by the highest tribunal in the Union—the Representatives of the American people. He, nevertheless, proceeds in his defence, and is ultimately convicted, and cashiered. Would not history record such a conviction as the result of our prejudication of the case? Would not the whole world attribute the downfall of this man to the monstrous persecution and flagrant injustice of that ungrateful country which he had so nobly defended? Yes, sir, to the latest posterity we should be regarded as having passed an ex parte decree of condemnation, which the court-martial were bound to register, to secure themselves from similar animadversion. But let us suppose that, unawed by the imposing dictum which we shall have pronounced, the court-martial acquit the General of the several charges and specifications on which he has been arrested. We should then have the military of the country arrayed against this body: we, acting under the solemn obligation of our oaths, declare, that General Jackson has been guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors; we are enabled to tear from him his epaulettes; and, when tried by his peers, our opinions are scouted, and he is maintained in the high rank from which we would have degraded him. In such a controvery the only arbiter is force. Sir, take either horn of the dilemma, and we have abundant reason to shun the consequences which must follow the adoption of the proposed resolutions.

Our total inability to enforce the will of the majority, demonstrates most clearly the absence of the right to express that will; for, whatever any branch of the Government can constitutionally decide, the means necessary to carry its decision into execution can never be withheld or questioned. Sir, I have been not a little amused at the evasive contortions of honorable gentlemen, who, to avoid the perplexing difficulties by which they are enveloped, gravely affirm, that neither the report of the Military Committee, nor the resolutions respecting the seizure of the posts of St. Marks and Pensacola, and fortress of Barancas, contain a censure of General Jackson; that they are harmless, inoffensive expressions of opinion, upon the passing events relating to the state of the Union. I put it to those gentlemen—for the argument has been resorted to by all who have spoken—whether, if I were to address either of them in conversation, and say, in the language of the propositions before the committee, "Sir, you have violated the Constitution of the United States, and of course you are perjured. You have sentenced to death, and executed two of your fellow-men, without a fair trial, and contrary to all law, human and divine; consequently, your hands are stained with their blood;" would they calmly reply, that my expressions conveyed no censure on them, and were not repugnant to their feelings or character, nor inconsistent with contemporaneous assurances of my high respect and consideration? Common sense revolts at conclusions so ridiculous, drawn from such premises. Add to this the express charge of a violation of orders, which the President, it seems, is not competent to determine for himself, and I may venture to defy any gentleman to cover a military officer with more odious epithets, or more vindictive censure. No man, however elevated his station, can withstand the overwhelming force of such an assault on his reputation, coming from this august body, after mature and solemn deliberation. The exalted mind of General Jackson would prefer even death to this fatal blow, aimed at that which is more dear to him than life—his well-earned fame and irreproachable honor. Sir, the immortal Washington was charged with a violation of the constitution, in drawing money from the Treasury to pay the militia who served in the campaign against the insurgents in 1794, without an appropriation made by law: but at that day the secret of our power to censure had not been discovered, and the transaction passed without animadversion. It has remained for us to put in motion this new engine of inquisitorial crimination, and to wield it against a man whose arm was never extended but in defending the liberty and safety of his country against the complicated enemies by whom it has been assailed, and whose pure and unblemished patriotism, combined with his invincible valor, fortitude, and perseverance, have shed over his brow a resplendent ray of glory which neither clouds nor tempests can obscure, so long as virtue shall predominate over the envious and malignant passions of the human heart. Yes, sir, we are importuned to execrate the bloody deeds of the Seminole war, to chant requiems over the tombs of Arbuthnot and Ambrister, and to mourn over the wreck of our fallen constitution; and, in an instant, as if by enchantment, the horrid picture vanishes from our affrighted imaginations, and eludes even the grasp of keen-eyed malice; and we hear the moral integrity and innocence of all these transactions announced from the same lips which utter their condemnation. The motives and intentions of General Jackson are eulogized and applauded by his most inveterate accusers. All the errors ascribed to him, and for which honorable gentlemen are prepared to immolate his character, and render his name, hitherto so dear to his countrymen, odious and detestable, are attributed to the impetuous ardor of his zeal to promote the general good, and give peace and security to our defenceless frontier.

He fills a space in the public eye, and commands a portion of the affection and confidence of his fellow-citizens, too copious and extensive to be tolerated by the sharp-sighted politician, whose splendid eloquence fades and evaporates before the sunshine of renown, lighted up by the unparalleled achievements of the conqueror of the veterans of Wellington. These modern casuists endeavor to magnify an unintentional violation of the constitution into a crime of the blackest enormity, which can neither be extenuated nor forgiven. Are they willing to make this system of political ethics applicable to themselves, and to have their names specified on the Journal as culprits at the bar of an offended people, stamped with infamy and disgrace, if at any time they have, with the best intentions, given a vote, which, on a review of the subject, was found to conflict with some provision of the constitution? What member of this House can say, with certainty, that he has, on all occasions, construed the constitution correctly? And who among us would be satisfied to stake all his hopes and prospects on the issue of an investigation, which, disregarding all respect for the purity of the motive, should seek only to discover an inadvertent error, resulting from a defect of judgment in the attainment of objects identified with the best interests of the nation? Sir, if I mistake not, the honorable Speaker, and several other gentlemen, who have manifested great solicitude, and displayed a torrent of eloquence to urge the expediency of passing the proposed censure on the conduct of General Jackson, and who unhesitatingly admit the innocence of his intentions, would be placed in an unpleasant situation by the operation of the rule which they are anxious to prescribe in this case. A few short years past, these honorable gentlemen were the champions who resisted the renewal of the charter of the old Bank of the United States. At that day they held the original act of incorporation to be a usurpation of power, not delegated to Congress by the constitution, and to their exertions we were indebted for the downfall of that institution. The same distinguished members, at a subsequent period, acting under the high obligations of duty, and the solemnity of their oaths to support the Constitution of the United States, aided and assisted in establishing the mammoth bank, which now threatens to sweep with the besom of destruction every other moneyed institution in the nation into the gulf of ruin and bankruptcy. It will not be pretended that both these opposite opinions were correct; and yet I should be very sorry either to impugn the motives which actuated those gentlemen in the instances referred to, or to pass a censure on their conduct for an unintentional violation of the constitution, calculated to withdraw from them the confidence of their constituents. There was a time, Mr. Chairman, when the Republican phalanx in every quarter of the Union regarded the specification of powers in the constitution as the limitation of the grant, within which every department ought to be strictly confined. But at this day we are told, that this literal construction of the instrument is too narrow for the expanded views of an American statesman—mere "water gruel," insipid to the palate, and requiring the addition of a little fuel to give it energy and action to conduct this nation to the high destinies which await it. No power can be called for by an existing exigency, or a favorite system of policy, which, according to the doctrines now advanced, may not be found necessary and proper to carry into effect some one of the specified powers in the constitution. The flexible character of man, and the frailty of human nature, afford an ample apology for these oscillations, and wretched indeed would be our situation if crime consisted in error, unaccompanied by the pre-existing will to perpetuate it. No man who respects his feelings or his character would accept a public trust on such conditions. As well might we censure the Supreme Court for having given a decision which we deemed contrary to the constitution, and where no corruption could be alleged against the judges who pronounced it; which is an essential ingredient to constitute an offence for which a judicial officer is liable to impeachment. In such a case our censure might be retorted by an attachment for contempt, and the honorable Speaker, representing the majesty of the House, would be compelled to answer the charge by purgation, or otherwise, as the wisdom of the House should direct. I mention this to show the absurdity and inefficiency of every attempt to transcend the powers secured to us by the constitution. Sir, I am sick to loathing of this incongruous, novel, and impotent effort to wound the sensibility of a hero, who has sacrificed whatever of health or fortune he possessed, and staked his life in common with the soldier by whose side he fought, that our exposed and unprotected frontier might once more repose in peace and tranquillity, undisturbed by the midnight yell of the merciless savage.

The hero of New Orleans wanted not a petty Indian war to satiate his ambition, or add fresh laurels to the wreath already bequeathed to him by his country. It was a war of hardships, fatigues, and privations, in which for himself he had nothing to hope but the consolation of having accomplished the object for which he took the field, and of receiving the approbation of the President, to whom alone he was responsible for all the incidents of the campaign in which he participated. Of this reward, so well merited, and so freely bestowed, we now seek to rob him, by fulminating resolutions and vindictive eloquence, against what honorable gentlemen are pleased to call a patriotic unintentional violation of the constitution.

I aver, without the fear of contradiction, that the United States have, on all occasions, without a single exception to the contrary, acted on the defensive in the commencement of every war with our Indian neighbors; that they have never turned a deaf ear to the voice of conciliation; and we have abundant evidence that the late Seminole war was of a character similar, in all respects, to those which preceded it. The finger of British intrigue, and of Spanish duplicity and connivance, are visible from the very inception of these hostilities to their final termination. I will not detain the committee by entering into a methodical and critical examination of the documents, in the hands of every gentleman; showing the means employed to excite this war, the preparations made for its prosecution, and the guarantee of ultimate aid from the British Government to recover the lands for which the outlawed Creeks contended. They are voluminous and multifarious; many of them official, and all leading to the unavoidable conclusion, that nothing short of a restoration of these lands, upon the most humiliating terms, could avert the impending blow. I will endeavor to present a summary of the prominent occurrences, on which I may safely rest the vindication of this Government against the charge of aggression. The occupation of a strong military post on the Appalachicola, the asylum of fugitive slaves, of vagabonds, and banditti, of hostile Indians, and of all who would enlist under the English jack, or the bloody flag, is the first certain indication of the approaching rupture. It was the nucleus from which all the subsequent proceedings generated and matured. The Government of Spain tacitly acquiesced in this open violation of its neutral territory. Not even the redoubtable Don Jose Mazot was heard to complain, except for the seduction and employment of negroes belonging to Spanish subjects, in this tri-colored collection of outlaws and murderers. The demands made on the United States, as the sole condition on which peace could be preserved, and the objects contemplated in the erection of this Negro fort, are specifically announced by that prince of scoundrels, Colonel Edward Nicholls, in his several letters to Colonel Hawkins, then the Creek agent. This fellow sometimes styles himself "commander of the British forces in the Floridas," and at others "commander of His Britannic Majesty's forces in the Creek nation." And on one of his communications is endorsed "on His Britannic Majesty's service!" What forces had Great Britain in the Floridas, or in the Creek nation? At peace with Spain and the United States, by what authority could that Government station a military force within the territories of either? These extraordinary transactions, it is true, have been verbally disavowed, but they have never been explained in the manner called for by their mischievous tendency, and necessary to exempt the British Ministry from the well-grounded suspicion of a participation in them. On the 28th of April, 1815, Nicholls informed Colonel Hawkins that the chiefs had come to a determination "not to permit the least intercourse between their people and those of the United States. They have, in consequence, (said he,) ordered them to cease all communication, either directly or indirectly, with the territory or citizens of the United States." They further warned the citizens of the United States from entering the territory or communicating, directly or indirectly, with the Creek people; and they describe their territory to be as it stood in the year 1811. They add their adhesion to the Treaty of Ghent, as an independent ally of His Britannic Majesty. If a doubt exists as to the intent and meaning of this insolent letter, which was itself sufficient cause for hostile operations on our part, it is fully removed by a subsequent letter from the same individual, "commanding His Britannic Majesty's forces in the Creek nation," dated at the British post on the Appalachicola River, May 12th, 1815. He says, "I have ordered them (the Indians) to stand on the defensive, and have sent them a large supply of arms and ammunition, and told them to put to death, without mercy, any one molesting them." Again: "They have given their consent to await your answer before they take revenge; but, sir, they are impatient for it, and well armed, as the whole nation now is, and stored with ammunition and provisions, having a stronghold to retire upon in case of a superior force appearing." He likewise threatens the "good and innocent citizens on the frontier," and admonishes our agent "that they do not find that our citizens are evacuating their lands according to the ninth article of the Treaty of Ghent." After this undisguised exposition of their sine qua non, their means of annoyance, their security from attack by a superior force in the "stronghold," which the sagacity of their leader had provided, and their impudent threat of war and vengeance against "the good and innocent citizens on the frontier," what man, whose mind is free from the despotic sway of prejudice, can hesitate as to the settled determination of these Indians, to commence hostilities on the United States, whenever they should be ordered to strike by their good friend Colonel Nicholls? To ascertain with certainty how far they might depend on British protection, Nicholls and Hillishajo proceeded to London, with the famous address of all the chiefs to their good father, King George. This paper, of which Colonel Nicholls is both the hero and the author, breathes the same spirit of enmity to this country, which runs through the whole of his letters and correspondence. In order to recommend themselves to the favor of the king, they assure him that they "have fought and bled for him against the Americans; that they will truly keep the talks which his chief has given them, if he will be graciously pleased to continue his protection; that they are determined to cease having any communication with the Americans, and warn them to keep out of their nation." These talks, which they gave a pledge truly to keep, were to "put to death, without mercy, every American who should be found on the lands ceded by the Treaty of Fort Jackson." The deputation was received with every mark of politeness and attention. Hillishajo was honored by the Prince Regent with the rank of Brigadier General in His Majesty's service, and presented with a splendid suit of British uniform, together with a rifle, tomahawk, and scalping-knife, of British manufacture, with the royal arms engraven upon each of them. These circumstances attracted the attention of Mr. Adams, our Minister there, and several notes were addressed by him to Earl Bathurst and Lord Castlereagh, on the subject of the unwarrantable proceedings of Nicholls, in Florida, and of the address before noticed, which was called a treaty offensive and defensive. To these notes, no written reply was furnished; they carefully avoided a correspondence, in writing, relative to these transactions; and Lord Bathurst, when pressed by our Minister in a conversation, observed, "to tell you the truth, Colonel Nicholls is, I believe, a man of activity and spirit, but a very wild fellow." He sent him word that he had no authority to make a treaty offensive and defensive with these Indians, and that the Government would not make any such treaty. He declined seeing him on that project, but expressed his intention of having an interview with him on the affairs of Florida, generally. This guarded course of conduct, combined with subsequent events, go far to strengthen the belief that the proceedings of Nicholls on all the other points were not disapproved, although they could not receive the open approbation of the British Cabinet. That war was to be made on the United States by the Indians in Florida, and their white and black allies, is a fact established by such a crowd of testimony, that it would be difficult to select that which would be deemed most conclusive and satisfactory. I will select only one deposition, which is so well supported, and affords such precise information, that I beg leave to read it to the committee:

"The deposition of Samuel Jervais.

"Samuel Jervais being duly sworn, states, that he has been a sergeant of marines in the British service for thirteen years past; that, about a month ago, he left Appalachicola, where he had been stationed for several months; that the English Colonel, Nicholls, had promised the hostile Indians, at that place, a supply of arms and ammunition, a large quantity of which had been delivered to them a few days before his departure, and after the news of a peace between England and the United States being confirmed, had reached Appalachicola; that, among the articles delivered, were, of cannon four 12-pounders, one howitzer, and two cohorns, about three thousand stand of small arms, and near three thousand barrels of powder and ball; that the British left with the Indians between three and four hundred negroes, taken from the United States, principally from Louisiana; that the arms and ammunition were for the use of the Indians and negroes, for the purposes, as it was understood, of war with the United States; that the Indians were assured by the British commander that, according to the Treaty of Ghent, all the lands ceded by the Creeks in treaty with General Jackson, were to be restored; otherwise the Indians must fight for those lands, and that the British would, in a short time, assist them.

"L. JUDSON, J. P."

The evidence of this man is substantially sustained by Lieutenant Loomis, who so gallantly commanded the expedition which blew up the Negro Fort, and with it all the miserable miscreants who had sought refuge within its walls. Besides the letter of Lieutenant Loomis to Commodore Patterson, I am authorized by a naval officer of high respectability, to state that, at the time this fort was destroyed, there were in it eight hundred barrels of powder; three thousand stand of British muskets, packed in cases; equipments complete for five hundred dragoons; pistols, cutlasses, and carbines; four twenty-four pounders, taken from the British Frigate Cydnus, with the name of that ship on them; one field-piece, mounted; and two five-and-a-half inch brass howitzers. Such were the preparations made for the war, which was suspended only for the arrival of the red chief Hillishajo, and his companion Colonel Nicholls. The destruction of this "stronghold," on which the Indians might retire in case of discomfiture, and of the arms and ammunition which had been deposited there, induced Nicholls to procrastinate his return to Florida, and to appoint as his successor in the good work which he had begun, Alexander Arbuthnot, of the island of New Providence. This man made his appearance in Florida, in the character of an English trader, in the year 1817, and simultaneously the war-whoop resounded through the forests, and the blood of our citizens began to flow on the borders of Georgia and the Alabama territory. I shall presently take a closer view of the means resorted to by this infernal missionary to kindle the flame of war and vengeance among the deluded Seminoles and Red Sticks. It is enough on this part of the argument to show that they were successful, and that actual violence was committed on the "good and peaceable inhabitants of the frontier," in conformity with the menace of his predecessor, Nicholls; and that the United States were compelled to take up arms and chastise the savages, in their own defence, after repeated efforts to bring them to a sense of justice and of their own interests, by friendly talks and pacific remonstrances.

Need I ransack the documents on our files, to collect the evidence of the murders and robberies which preceded the determination of this Government to commence offensive operations against the Indians in Florida? They must be fresh in the recollection of every gentleman. They have been so often repeated by my honorable friends, that I will forbear the painful task of recounting them. The cruel massacre of aged mothers and helpless infancy were spread along the whole line of our Southern frontier in that quarter. The threatened war soon ripened into full maturity. The murders committed on our unoffending citizens were openly avowed, and justified under the hollow and unfounded pretence of retaliation for similar outrages alleged to have been practised by the Georgians on their people. As early as the 5th of February, 1817, the Governor of Georgia made a solemn appeal to the General Government, for the protection of the exposed settlements within the limits of the State over which he presided. He details circumstances calculated to leave no doubt of the hostile spirit of the savages, and of the active preparations which were making by Woodbine and Nicholls to carry their hellish designs into execution. Scenes of cruelty, at the recital of which humanity shudders, followed in succession; and still the Executive paused, and demanded the punishment only of the offenders. On the 24th of February, 1817, fifteen Indian warriors entered the peaceful dwelling of the unfortunate Garret, a citizen of Wayne county, in Georgia; finding in it only Mrs. Garret and her two infant children, the eldest of whom was three years old, and the other in its mother's arms, on whom she had bestowed her tender smiles and caresses for the short period of two months. The helpless condition of this family, their natural protector being absent, innocent and unoffending, alike incapable of inflicting or repelling injury and insult, surrounded by a band of armed ruffians, exhibited a picture of human misery and heart-rending distress, which might well have tamed the ferocity of the most bloody monster who ever trod the face of the habitable globe. But their cries and entreaties were unavailing: the unhappy mother was twice shot through the body, stabbed, and scalped; her two babes murdered; her house robbed of all the valuables which it contained; and, to complete the melancholy catastrophe, the lighted torch was applied to the building, where once they enjoyed the sweets of domestic comforts, and where now their mangled and lifeless forms lay prostrate, covered with the warm blood yet streaming from their hearts; and the flames which ascended to heaven, wafted their spirits into the presence of a just God, while, amidst the devouring element, their ashes mingled in one common grave! The mind which can contemplate with calm composure deeds of cruelty and barbarity like these, must be destitute of that refined sensibility which ennobles and dignifies our nature in all the social relations of life.

This act alone, independent of the black list which both preceeded and followed it, was open, unqualified war on the United States, unless the criminal perpetrators of these crimes, whose enormity resembles more the tales of fiction and romance, than the narrative of real unsophisticated truths, should receive the prompt and condign punishment which they so justly merited. General Gaines, in obedience to instructions, demanded the murderers, and admonished the chiefs and warriors of the consequences which would result from a refusal to comply with his demand. It was not only refused, but fresh outrages of a similar character were repeated, until the seizure and indiscriminate massacre of a boat's crew, under the command of Lieutenant Scott, put an end to all hope of conciliation, and the Secretary of War, by the direction of the President, ordered the commanding General to cross the Florida line, and terminate speedily this war, "with exemplary punishment for hostilities so unprovoked." The honor of the United States required that every drop of innocent blood which had been so wantonly shed, should be washed out by the most ample atonement; and, to effect this object, General Jackson was directed to assume the immediate command of the forces in that quarter of the southern division.

I trust, sir, I have said enough to satisfy the committee, that, on our part, the war was strictly defensive, entered into reluctantly, after every reasonable expedient to avoid it had been resorted to in vain.

Yes, sir, the territory of Florida is emphatically a country "open to all comers." The British found a hearty welcome there during the late war. The outlawed Creeks received the right hand of fellowship from Governor Mazot, and his retinue of official dignitaries; fugitive negroes and banditti are welcome guests, when associated in arms against the United States; and I am persuaded the devil himself would have received holy orders, had he made his appearance at Pensacola in the character of a foe to this country. We alone were excluded from the high privilege of meeting our enemies on that soil which was prostituted to every purpose which could in any manner subserve their views, and contribute to our annoyance. The fortress of Barancas was peaceably put into the possession of a British and Indian force, in our recent conflict with Great Britain. The negro fort was erected on the Appalachicola, with the avowed intention of war with the United States. The vilest reptiles in creation were collected to carry the nefarious projects of the incendiary Nicholls into execution, and not a murmur was heard, either from Pizarro or Mazot, or the Governor General of Havana. But the moment we send a force to suppress these hostile combinations, Spanish sensibility breaks through the cloud by which it had been concealed. Protests and manifestoes proclaim to the world the wrongs committed by this Government, in the violation of the territorial sovereignty of the adored Ferdinand. With a full knowledge of this fraudulent neutrality on the part of Spain, and of our rights as a nation, to the means of self-preservation, the President would have been unmindful of the high trust and confidence reposed in him, had he not ordered the army into Florida, to terminate the war, with "exemplary punishment for hostilities so unprovoked." The occupation of the posts of St. Marks and Pensacola, and the fortress of Barancas, was a necessary means of accomplishing the end for which General Jackson entered the Spanish territory. They rest on the same general principles, and, if a distinction is taken which would justify the one and condemn the other, it must be founded on a diversity of facts, in reference to the facilities and privileges granted by the authorities of Spain to the other belligerent. For there is a universal rule, to which there is an exception, that whatever a neutral power grants or refuses to one of the parties at war, she must in like manner grant or refuse to the other; and, if she departs from this strict line of impartiality, by favoring either to the injury of the other, the injured nation may do herself justice, and take by force what is unjustly denied to her.

Such is the law by which the conduct of all civilized nations is regulated and governed. It remains only for me to glance at the most prominent points in the evidence to show its application, and thereby rescue General Jackson from the imputation of having snatched from Congress the power delegated in the constitution to "declare war." I ask then, sir, did the Governors of St. Marks and Pensacola allow the Indians and negroes free access into their fortifications, and supply them with arms and ammunition to carry on the war in which they were engaged with the United States. To establish these facts, with regard to the former, I am perplexed with the difficulty of selecting that part of the testimony which might be deemed least susceptible of doubt or equivocation. The whole volume is full of details showing the abominable duplicity and perfidy of the treacherous Luengo. St. Marks was the council-house of the Indians, in which all their plans of operation were discussed, in concert with the commandant and his friend, Arbuthnot, between whom there existed the most perfect cordiality. St. Marks was, in all respects, substituted for the negro fort, which had been destroyed by the gunboats under the command of Lieutenant Loomis. To that place they retreated, immediately after this disaster befell them, and ever since they have made it the depot of plundered property, known to be so by Luengo himself, who even made contracts with the depredators for the beef, cattle, and other property which they might capture from the people of Georgia. Having been charged, by General Jackson, with conduct so contrary to the pacific relations existing between Spain and the United States, Luengo, in his defence, written at Pensacola, on the 18th of May, 1818, more than one month after the occupation of the post by the American troops, when all his powers of prevarication were taxed to exculpate himself from these charges, in reply to the information which had been communicated to the commanding General, that he had supplied the Indians and negroes with munitions of war, states: "I thought that I had convinced him of the contrary in my answer, in which I represented to him, that no one could better remove from his mind any unfavorable impression on this point than Mr. William Hambly, who, during his stay here, repeatedly interpreted to me the anxiety of the chiefs to obtain such supplies, and that he could also inform him that I uniformly counselled them to avoid the destruction which has overtaken them, and which I foresaw from the first." Now, sir, what is the evidence of Mr. Hambly, whose credibility is admitted by the Spanish commandant, and whose situation enabled him to give a full and precise statement of facts? The letter addressed by him, together with Edward Doyle, to General Jackson, exposes the transactions of St. Marks in so clear a light, that I beg leave to read it to the committee:

"William Hambly and E. Doyle to General Jackson.

FORT GADSDEN, May 2, 1818.

"SIR: We beg leave to submit to you the following facts. On the 13th December, 1817, we were violently torn from our settlement, on the Appalachicola River, by a number of Indians, headed by Chenubby, a chief of the Fowl-Town tribe, carried to Mickasuky, and delivered to Kenagee, King of the Mickasukians. Kenagee carried us to the Negro Towns, on the Suwanee, and thence to the Spanish fort St. Marks; to the commandant of which he delivered us as prisoners of war, captured under the orders of a Mr. Arbuthnot, reported to us as a British agent. At St. Marks we were treated as prisoners, and not permitted to wander beyond the walls of the garrison. While at that post, the ingress and egress of Indians hostile to the United States was unrestrained; and several councils were held; at one of which Kenagee, king of the Mickasukians; Francis or Hillis Hajo; Hemathlemico, the chief of the Autosses; and the chief of Kolemies, all of the old Red Stick party; and Jack Mealy, chief of the Ochewas, were present. When it was reported that these chiefs, and their warriors, were entering Fort St. Marks for the purpose of holding a council, Hambly represented to the commandant the impropriety of permitting such proceedings within the walls of a Spanish fortress, the officer of which was bound to preserve and enforce the treaties existing between the King of Spain and the United States; he replied to Hambly with some degree of warmth, observing that it was not in his power to prevent it. On the Indians coming into the fort, at their request we were confined. The council was held in the commandant's quarters. He, the commandant, was present, but strictly forbade the intrusion of any of the officers of the garrison. The Indians were in the habit of driving to Fort St. Marks, and disposing of cattle to the commandant and other Spanish officers. While at that post, three or four droves were brought in, acknowledged by the Indians to have been stolen from the citizens of the United States, and purchased by the Spanish officers. We were present at most of these contracts, and Hambly often referred to as an interpreter between the purchaser and seller. Chenubby, a Fowl-Town Indian, once applied to Hambly to mention to the commandant that he was about visiting the frontiers of Georgia, on a plundering expedition, and wished to know whether he would purchase the cattle brought in. A contract was entered into, and Chenubby, some time after, brought in, and disposed of, eleven head of cattle to the Spanish commandant of Fort St. Marks. These same cattle were those purchased by you, from the commandant, as his private property.

"WILLIAM HAMBLY,
"EDWARD DOYLE."

In support of the statement made by these men, I might refer to many others in the volume of documents which have been printed, on this subject. I will, however, dispense with a detailed view of them, and barely add an extract from a letter of Lieutenant Gadsden, whose reputation as a soldier and man of honor and veracity, places him above the reach of suspicion.

"J. Gadsden to General Jackson.

"FORT GADSDEN, May 3, 1818.

"SIR: In conversation with the commandant of Fort St. Marks, on the subject of having that work occupied by an American garrison, I had occasion to notice the aid and comfort that the hostile party of Indians had received, as reported, from him; that they had free access within the walls of his fort, and that it was well known no small supplies of ammunition had been received from that quarter. In reply, he stated that his conduct had been governed by policy; the defenceless state of his work, and the weakness of his garrison, compelled him to conciliate the friendship of the Indians, to supply their wants, and to grant what he had not the power to deny, and to throw open, with apparent willingness, the gates of his fortress, lest they should be forced by violence; that he had been repeatedly threatened by Indians and negroes, and that his security depended upon exhibiting an external friendship. Respectfully, yours, &c.

"JAMES GADSDEN, Aide-de-Camp."

From the testimony of these respectable witnesses, and many others to whom I think it unnecessary to refer, it is evident that the enemy had the unlimited use of this fort for all the purposes of war; that their stolen property was received, and contracted for by the commandant, knowing it to be such; and that they were supplied with arms and ammunition, and every other material, to enable them to continue their aggressions on the unprotected inhabitants of Georgia and the Alabama Territory. The only apology offered by the commandant for his unfriendly and unwarrantable conduct was, that he had been repeatedly threatened by the Indians and negroes, and that his security depended upon exhibiting an external friendship. It is immaterial whether we take the facts or the excuse, for either, unconnected with the other, will amount to a justification of General Jackson in taking forcible possession of that post. "To conduct prisoners, or convey stores, to a place of safety, are acts of war, consequently not to be done in a neutral country, and whoever would permit them would depart from the line of neutrality by favoring one of the parties." Again, "necessity may even authorize the temporary seizure of a neutral town, and putting a garrison therein with a view to cover ourselves from the enemy, or to prevent the execution of his designs against that town."—Vattel, 342–'4. The truth is, that our enemy was denied nothing which he asked, and we were refused the humble privilege of putting the place in a state of defence against an enemy who ought to have been considered common to Spain and the United States. In such a case, to have hesitated would have been pusillanimous and disgraceful in the commanding General. Passing from St. Marks to Pensacola, there is no substantial change either of principle or fact. General Jackson, it is true, at the date of his letter to the Secretary of War, from St. Marks, thought the war at an end. His health having been much impaired by the hardships and fatigues of the service in which he was engaged, he had determined to return to Nashville; but subsequent information, of which we have the most authentic proof, satisfied him that he had not yet effected the object of the campaign, The Indians, deprived of their accustomed resort at St. Marks, flew to Pensacola, where they had always been received with open arms by the Governor. Expeditions were fitted out, and massacres committed, by parties of hostile Indians, going directly from that place to the Escambia and Alabama.

I will not detain the committee by a reference to the correspondence and depositions at large, furnishing, as they do, indubitable evidence of the hostile disposition of the Governor of Pensacola, and of the aid given by him to the savages, for the express purpose of committing murders on the people of the United States. Thirty or forty witnesses, many of them subjects of His Catholic Majesty in Florida, and long resident there, testify to these facts. Provisions, arms, and munitions of war, were regularly issued to the Creeks and Seminoles, from the King's storehouse, during both wars in which we have been engaged with these tribes of Indians. Numerous bodies, of from two to five hundred Indians, driven from other parts of Florida, were seen in and near to Pensacola, but a few days after the approach of our army; they were armed and equipped for war by Governor Mazot. The leaden aprons were taken from the ordnance at the Barancas, and run into bullets, to obtain the necessary supply of that article. The massacre of Stokes's family, of travellers from Georgia to the Alabama, and of our frontier settlers in that quarter, may all be attributed to the free admission of the hostile Indians into Pensacola, and the assistance afforded them by the Spanish Governor. General Jackson was well informed of these circumstances, and saw in them certain indications that all his previous operations were worse than useless, if he returned without leaving an American garrison at Pensacola. He accordingly moved towards that town, after having discharged the Georgia militia, whose services were no longer necessary. He made Governor Mazot distinctly acquainted with his views, and the basis on which his conduct was founded; that he entered the territory of his Catholic Majesty, not as the enemy but as the friend of Spain, to inflict merited punishment on the common disturber of the peace of both countries; that he meant nothing more than to place an American force in Pensacola and the Barancas, which should be sufficient to guarantee the security of the United States from a protracted savage war. He never intimated an intention of disturbing either the civil or military authorities of Spain. In return, Governor Mazot protested against the entrance of the American commander into his territory, for any purpose; ordered him, in the name of the King, to depart forthwith, and threatened to repel force by force, if he persisted in his intentions. The well-known valor and intrepidity of General Jackson took fire at his insulting menace; he would have preferred an honorable grave, under the walls of the Spanish fort, to a cowardly, disgraceful retrograde, under the gasconading threat of this impotent instrument of a monarch, whose very name excites the smile of contempt throughout the civilized world. He moved directly to the town of Pensacola, and mark, I beseech you, sir, the conduct of Governor Mazot. The Indian warriors who were with him, and their families, were shipped in public vessels across the bay to the Island of Santa Rosa. He retired before the American army, who really intended to do him no violence, into the fortress of San Carlos de Barancas, where he permitted himself to tremble and equivocate for a day or two, and then, by his own request, the fort was delivered into the hands of General Jackson, and the Spanish troops, with this magnanimous Governor at their head, were transported to the Island of Cuba. We are told by honorable gentlemen, that this last measure gave to the transaction all the pomp and circumstance of war. That the Spanish troops were made prisoners of war, and forced to quit the country in which they were stationed under the protection of their sovereign. There would indeed be some plausibility in the conclusion, if the premises assumed were not destitute of foundation. Every proposal relating to the surrender of the fort came from Governor Mazot; it was by his own desire that vessels were provided for the transportation of the garrison, and the officers attached to the civil administration, and of the Alabama Chief Hopayhoal, and family, to the Havana. It was his own puerile resistance which gave to this affair the aspect of a capitulation. General Jackson never contemplated an act of hostility against Spain; his sole object was to give peace and security to his own country, and to guard against the renewal of hostilities by prohibiting the customary supplies which the Seminoles and Red Sticks received from this faithless, unprincipled Governor.

Mr. P. continued. Sir, said he, I have been mortified and disgusted at the sickly agonies and sympathetic effusions which have been so often repeated by honorable members on the subject of the trial and execution of the instigators of the Seminole war, Arbuthnot and Ambrister. Inflated appeals to our humanity and magnanimity have rung through this hall to excite our commiseration for these guilty men. They have failed to reach either my judgment or the feelings of my heart. My sympathies, thank God, are reserved for the bleeding and suffering citizens of my own country; and objects of that description, in abundance, are exhibited to our view in the narrative of events connected with the short but bloody career of these foreign incendiaries in Florida. The punishment inflicted on them was more than merited by the enormity of their crimes; the example, I trust, will be a salutary warning to British agents on the whole extent of our Indian frontier; and, if future outrages of the same kind should be practised, we owe it to the safety and honor of our country to retaliate on the offenders with the utmost rigor and severity, until the subjects of foreign nations shall be taught to dread our vengeance, if they do not respect our rights. Sir, it is not my intention to enter into a detailed argument on the various technical objections which have been resorted to by gentlemen skilled in the nicety of special pleading, to show that a count or an inuendo is wanting in the declaration, or that judgment has not been pronounced according to the forms in such case made and provided. Such trash may serve to supply the vacuum of empty declamation, but I can never consent to convert this great political theatre into a court of errors and appeals, sitting to scan the record and regulate the proceedings of inferior tribunals. My views are directed to measures in reference to their operation on the general welfare of my country, and, whenever that effect is produced, I would not retrace the step, unless the honor of the nation imperiously demanded the sacrifice. The proceedings of the special court convened by General Jackson on this occasion, have been fully and ably defended by honorable gentlemen whose profound knowledge of military science and the practical usages of war gives to their opinions and arguments the weight of authority, and supersedes the necessity of further investigation. If, indeed, errors in point of form were committed by the court, or if they misunderstood the powers vested in them by the order of the commanding General, it does not become the dignity of this House to ascribe these irregularities to General Jackson; it is to the general order we must look for a definition of the duties which the court were required to perform. They were instructed to "record the documents and testimony in the several cases, and their opinion as to the guilt or innocence of the prisoners, and what punishment, if any, should be inflicted." Call it, therefore, a court-martial, or by whatever other name you please, these were the powers conveyed to it, and no assumed title could enlarge the grant or substantially change its character. The opinion of the court was given in the form of a sentence and carried into execution, but the same result would have followed if there had been no departure from the literal import of the order. To cavil at such petty inaccuracies, where substantial justice has been done, is, I repeat it, unbecoming the dignity of the House of Representatives. That these perfidious miscreants met the fate which their conduct merited cannot be seriously doubted by any one. On the principle of reprisals it was lawful to execute them, and, as criminals of the highest grade, whose guilty hands involved a whole country in scenes of massacre and robbery, they fell just victims to the offended laws of nature and of nations. "Those who, without authority from their sovereign, exercise violence against an enemy and fall into that enemy's hands, have no right to expect the treatment due to prisoners of war; the enemy is justifiable in putting them to death as banditti." Again, "the violences committed by the subjects of one nation against those of another, without authority, are looked upon as robberies, and the perpetrators are excluded from the rights of lawful enemies;" and, also, "whatsoever offends the State, injures its rights, disturbs its tranquillity, or does it a prejudice, in any manner whatever, declares himself its enemy, and exposes himself to be justly punished for it." (Vattel, 162.) Sir, can any gentleman compare these principles of national law with the evidence in the trials of Arbuthnot and Ambrister, and seriously contend that they have suffered unjustly, and contrary to law; that they have been doomed to perish under the rod of military despotism? I frankly confess it would require a stubborn determination to persevere in error, which I do not possess, to draw conclusions so inconsistent with such premises. Some gentlemen have attempted to make a distinction between the guilt of these men. Ambrister, say they, was taken in arms; he commanded the negroes and Indians; led them into battle; was identified with them, and, therefore, deserved death. Arbuthnot, we are told, was a mere merchant, a dealer in the articles which the Indians were accustomed to purchase.

I have, in the preceding part of my remarks, had occasion to advert to the objects for which this man entered Florida, and the part which he took in exciting the Indians to war. If Nicholls was an innocent dealer in "the articles which the Indians were accustomed to purchase," so was Arbuthnot; their views were the same; they held the same language to the savages, and each gave a pledge of British aid, in case war should be waged for the recovery of the lands ceded by the Treaty of Fort Jackson. He frequently assured the chiefs that he had authority to correspond with his Majesty's Minister at Washington, with Governor Cameron, of New Providence, and the Governor General of Havana, on the subject of necessary supplies for carrying on the war; and that he was in possession of a letter from Earl Bathurst, which informed him that Mr. Bagot was instructed on that subject. On the back of a letter addressed by him to that Minister, he states the aggregate force embodied among the Indians and the positions at which they were posted, and requests a supply of arms and ammunition, specified in the following memorandum:

"A quantity of gunpowder, lead, muskets, and flints, sufficient to arm 1,000 to 2,000 men.

Muskets, 1,000; more smaller pieces, if possible.

10,000 flints; a proportion for rifle, put up separate.

50 casks gunpowder; a proportion for rifle.

2,000 knives, six to nine inch blade, good quality.

1,000 tomahawks; 100 lbs. vermilion.

2,000 lbs. lead, independent of ball for musket."

This paper speaks for itself; it cannot be misunderstood; and shows, most clearly, the participation of Arbuthnot in providing the means necessary to the prosecution of the Seminole war. He was the prime minister of the hostile Indians; had a full power of attorney to make talks, and act for them in all cases whatsoever; and if Ambrister, who was but a subordinate agent, was justly sentenced to suffer death, what excuse can be offered for the man who put the whole machinery of war, massacre, and robbery, in motion? Can it be said that he had not disturbed the tranquillity of the United States? I presume it cannot, and, of course, according to the maxims of public law, to which I have referred, he had "declared himself our enemy, and exposed himself to be justly punished." It is unnecessary for me to enlarge the discussion on the right of the commanding General to retaliate on the enemy for the acts of cruelty and barbarity which were practised in the progress of this war. Honorable gentlemen, who controvert the right, have shown no instance in which it was denied, either in Europe or America; and, in support of it, we have the examples of Washington and many other general officers, who fought in the war of the Revolution. Yes, sir, General Jackson had the right to inflict punishment on these outlaws. I rejoice that he exercised that right; and, if we do not paralyze and destroy the good effects of the act, it will contribute, in no small degree, to the future peace and security of our frontier. But the honorable Speaker has said that we have no right to practise retaliation on the Indians; that we have foreborne to do so from the earliest settlement of the country, and that it has become the common law of the land, which we are bound not to violate. Sir, from what source does the gentleman derive the principle that a right, inherent in the nature of man, which he inhales with his first breath—which "grows with his growth and strengthens with his strength"—which has the fiat of God for its sanction, and is incorporated in the code of all the nations of the earth, becomes extinct with regard to those who may forbear to exercise it, from motives of policy or humanity, for any number of years? That a common law is thereby entailed on the American people, to the latest generations, by which they are required to bend beneath the tomahawk and scalping-knife of the savage, and submit to every cruelty and enormity, without the privilege of retaliating on the enemy the wrongs and injuries we have suffered by his wanton transgression of the rules of civilized warfare? We have, it is true, tolerated much of the inhuman conduct of the aborigines towards our frontier inhabitants. We have endeavored to teach them, by examples of humanity and magnanimity, the blessings and advantages of civilization; but instances are not wanting of the most severe retaliation on these monsters for their deeds of barbarity. If, however, there was not a solitary case on record, of the exercise of the right, it remains inviolate and inviolable. No community has the power to relinquish it and bind posterity in the chains of slavish non-resistance. The gentleman's common law will not do for the freemen of the United States; it is unique and absurd. Sir, if the committee will pardon the digression, this novel idea of common law reminds me of an occurrence which is said to have happened in the early period of the settlement of the present polite and flourishing State of Kentucky: A man, in personal combat, deprived his antagonist of the sight of an eye by a practice familiar at that day, called gouging; the offender was prosecuted and indicted for the outrage; he employed counsel to defend him, to whom he confessed the fact. Well, sir, said the lawyer, what shall I say in your defence? Why, sir, said he, tell them it is the custom of the country! And I presume if the honorable Speaker had presided on the trial, he would have said, "Gentlemen of the jury, it is the common law of Kentucky, and you will find a verdict for the defendant." But, sir, to be serious, let me bring the case home to the honorable Speaker himself. Suppose a band of these barbarians, stimulated and excited by some British incendiary, should, at the hour of midnight, when all nature is wrapt in darkness and repose, sound the infernal yell, and enter the dwelling of that honorable gentleman, and in his presence pierce to the heart the wife of his bosom and the beloved and tender infant in her arms—objects so dear to a husband and a father—would he calmly fold his arms and say, well, 'tis hard! but it is the common law of the country, and I must submit! No, sir; his manly spirit would burn with indignant rage, and never slumber till the hand of retributive justice had avenged his wrongs.

"Mercy to him who shows it, is the rule,
And righteous limitation of the act,
By which Heaven moves in pardoning guilty man;
And he that shows none, being ripe in years,
And conscious of the outrage he commits,
Shall seek it, and not find it, in his turn."

I have no compassion for such monsters as Arbuthnot and Ambrister; their own country is ashamed to complain of their fate; the British Minister here has disavowed their conduct and abandoned their cause; and we, sir, are the residuary legatees of all the grief and sorrow felt on the face of the globe, for these two fallen murderers and robbers! For I call him a murderer who incites to murder.

Mr. Chairman, I am not the eulogist of any man; I shall not attempt the panegyric of General Jackson; but if a grateful country might be allowed to speak of his merits—

Louisiana would say, "You have defended our capital against the veteran troops of the enemy, by whom it would have been sacked, and our dwellings enveloped in flames over the heads of our beloved families."

Georgia: "You have given peace to our defenceless frontier, and chastised our ferocious savage foe, and the perfidious incendiaries and felons by whom they were excited and counselled to the perpetration of their cruel deeds. You have opened additional territory to our rich and growing population, which they may now enjoy in peace and tranquillity."

Alabama and Mississippi: "You have protected us in the time of our infancy, and in the moment of great national peril, against the inexorable Red Sticks and their allies; you have compelled them to relinquish the possession of our lands, and ere long we shall strengthen into full manhood, under the smiles of a beneficent Providence."

The whole Western Country: "You have preserved the great emporium of our vast commerce from the grasp of a powerful enemy; you have maintained for our use the free navigation of the Mississippi, at the hazard of your life, health, and fortune."

The Nation at large: "You have given glory and renown to the arms of your country throughout the civilized world, and have taught the tyrants of the earth the salutary lesson, that, in the defence of their soil and independence, freemen are invincible."

History will transmit these truths to generations yet unborn, and should the propositions on your table be adopted, we, the Representatives of the people, subjoin: "Yes, most noble and valorous Captain, you have achieved all this for your country; we bow down under the weight of the obligations which we owe you, and as some small testimonial of your claim to the confidence and consideration of your fellow-citizens, we, in their name, present you the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That you, Major General Andrew Jackson, have violated the constitution which you have sworn to support, and disobeyed the orders of your superior, the Commander-in-chief of the Army and Navy of the United States.

"Resolved, That you, Major General Andrew Jackson, have violated the laws of your country and the sacred principles of humanity, and thereby prostrated the national character, in the trial and execution of Alexander Arbuthnot and Robert C. Ambrister, for the trifling and unimportant crime of exciting the savages to murder the defenceless citizens of the United States.

"Accept, we pray you, sir, of these resolves; go down to your grave in sorrow, and congratulate yourself that you have not served this great Republic in vain!"

Greece had her Miltiades, Rome her Bellisarius, Carthage her Hannibal, and "may we, Mr. Chairman, profit by the example!" Sir, if honorable gentlemen are so extremely solicitous to record their opinions of this distinguished General, let us erect a tablet in the centre of our Capitol square: let his bust designate the purpose: thither let each man repair, and engrave the feelings of his heart. And, sir, whatever may be the opinions of others, for one I should not hesitate to say, in the language of the sage of Monticello, "Honor and gratitude to him who has filled the measure of his country's glory!"

WEDNESDAY, February 3.

Seminole War.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, (Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, in the chair,) on the subject of the Seminole war.

Mr. WALKER, of Kentucky, rose and said: Mr. Chairman, I do not rise to enter into a discussion upon a subject that has called forth the wisdom, learning, and eloquence of this committee; I only wish to express my reasons for the vote which I am about to give upon this question, and to show that I have no fears for any future consequences which may arise from that vote to my country.

If it were possible for me to be persuaded that the friends to the mode of prosecuting and terminating the Seminolian war were less solicitous for the honor and dignity of our country, or less anxious for its future prosperity and happiness, than those gentlemen who disapprove of our General's conduct in that war, from the solemn dignity of the manner, from the deservedly high standing of the man, and the immense importance Mr. Speaker has attached to the matter, I might be persuaded that I was in error, and might give a different vote on the subject; I might be convinced that I was as far beneath him in common sense and mere love of country, as he is above me in elevation of station, or in the omnipotent powers of eloquence. But, sir, there are some subjects on which good common sense, years of experience and observation, may shed as clear a light as all the pages of ancient or modern history, and may so anchor the judgment that learning, eloquence, and acknowledged merit, all combined, cannot weigh the anchor, or drag it from its moorings; and this, sir, in my poor opinion, is one of those deep-rooted subjects. I will not attempt to speak of Grotius, Puffendorff, Vattel, Martens, or any other writers on the law of nations, or of our own constitution, nor yet will I attempt to lead this committee to believe that I have a correct knowledge of the ancient Republics of Greece or Rome; but, from the little light I have received upon the history of those republics, I will endeavor to show that we have no cause of fear from some future Philip, Cæsar, Cromwell, or Bonaparte; we, to be sure, resemble them in some leading characteristics, and in name, but not in every thing; they knew nothing of a fair representative council, such as ours, which is certainly the chain cable of our political ship; a fair representative Government they never had an idea of, or if they had, like some of my unfortunate friends, too, in South America, they were afraid to try the experiment.* Their laws, I am told, were enacted by universal suffrage, or, more properly speaking, by that portion of the people that casualty or design might have convened at the time they were under consideration; it is, therefore, reasonable to suppose that the citizens who lived remote from the metropolitan cities had but little share in their legislation; hence one great cause of their decline. In populous countries and large cities, where the greater portion of the people are wretchedly poor, profoundly ignorant, and darkly superstitious, where the sum of their knowledge was acquired from the mouths of their public speakers, it is perfectly rational to believe that an ingenious, eloquent orator, could catch them by the ears, and a successful splendid hero could lead them to the sacrifice of all that should be held most dear to man; nor is it matter of astonishment to the reflecting mind, that our late republican sister, now poor bleeding France, should have followed the fate of the old republics; emerging, as she did, from the darkness of chaos, suddenly into the bright blaze of heaven-born liberty, her eyes were dazzled with the brilliance, her brain was intoxicated with the multiplicity of novel ideas that burst upon it, and before she could recover her sober senses, before her legislators could establish the plan for the permanent security of her rights, the demon of discord erected his crest and diffused his poison among her counsellors, who had also to conquer the habits of ages before her people were capable of enjoying rational liberty; the lands of the country, too, from which true independence always sprouts, were in the hands of the aristocratic few, to whom the great body of the people had, for centuries, been bound by the iron hand of necessity or of power. Thus situated, it is not wonderful that the successful hero, the ambitious, artful statesman, should have prostrated all their rights. Quite the reverse from this situation was our happy Republic at the commencement of her existence; the soil of the country was apportioned among her numerous hardy sons, whose arms were able to defend it. Religious and civil liberty was the contemplation of our European fathers when they first came to America; it was the darling theme of their sons until the day they unfurled the banner, and proclaimed to the astonished world that they were free. Free we are, and free we will be, until land monopolies shall have swallowed up the soil as the banks are about to swallow our portable treasure; we must be ground down to extreme poverty, ignorance, its concomitant, and to cap the climax, superstition, too, must give her detested aid, before we can lose our liberties. In fact, Mr. Chairman, we must be reduced to the miserable, abject state of the poor subjects of monarchs, before we can lose our liberties. If ever our rights are lost, moneyed aristocracies and land monopolies will be the corner stones on which the edifice will be erected that will sweep them all. My fears from them are, in truth, much greater than from the sound discretion in our commander in the execution of an order given him by our beloved Chief Magistrate, and which order, if not executed in the manner it was, the objects of the campaign would have been infallibly lost. Certainly, it was our President's intentions, when he gave the orders, to put our women and children at rest from the apprehension of being scalped and burnt. If General Jackson had returned from the Florida line, is there a woman in Georgia, or a child in Alabama, that does not know that Arbuthnot and Ambrister would have excited their myrmidons to the repetition of those deeds, at the thought of which the blood curdles and runs cold with horror. Much has been said, many dreadful apprehensions have been suggested, from the consequence of our full approbation of our General's conduct; for my poor part, I hope I shall never be afraid of giving to merit its due meed. From my own reading of our constitution, as well as the sound arguments I have heard, I am most perfectly convinced that the President's orders were strictly constitutional, and that their execution was perfectly reconcilable with the laws of nations, as was shown by the gentleman from Virginia, and by my friend and colleague,* and produced the most desirable effects to our distressed frontier settlers.

If General Wayne, in 1794, had had force sufficient when he defeated the Indians on the Miami of the Lakes, and had have exercised his sound discretion, as General Jackson has done, our Owens and Daviess, our Allen and Simpson, my friend Captain Lewis, and the gallant, generous Hart, might this day have been living monuments of their country's genius, greatness, and goodness, and thousands of our dear disconsolate widowed sisters would now be pressing their new-born babes to their breasts, and receiving the benign smiles of their affectionate husbands, instead of making humble application here, through their benevolent friend, my soldier colleague, (Colonel JOHNSON,) for some poor pittance wherewith to raise their fatherless children; for we should have had no war; no soldiers would have fallen. Yes, sir, if General Wayne had caught the British incendiaries that were with the Indian army, (which he could have done with the assistance of cannon,) and given them to the tree, demolished Major Campbell's fort, and in the ruins buried every British officer and soldier, he would have done a praiseworthy deed, without an infraction of the laws of nations;† the blood-stained British lion would roar, but he would not fight; the conscious murderers of our wives and dear smiling babes would have shrunk appalled when they saw their husbands, sons, and brothers, determined on just revenge.

No war would we have had; our honest, generous, and brave sailors would never have been impressed and ignominiously whipped to try to make them fight against their country's friends; nor would our merchants have been despoiled of their pelf; we would have had no war, no apprehensions of the necessity of an armed force to guard against the efforts of British intrigue, no blue lights or Hartford conventions; the table of your Committee of Claims would never have groaned under the weight of petitions for relief of officers from the pressure of heavy judgments given against them, by what is called courts of justice, too, for the faithful execution of a legal military order; and, what is more to be deplored than all, the shameful capitulation of Alexandria we never should have heard of, nor the conflagration of our Capitol in this city, which bears the name of the illustrious WASHINGTON. Oh, Genius of History, if from thy chaste page thou would'st wipe those foul blots from our character, the laurels of the late British war, like those of the Seminole war, would forever bloom upon thy records without an adverse shade!

Mr. Chairman, until I am convinced that sound sense, some little reading, and close attention to the sound, learned, and eloquent arguments I have heard, will not qualify me to give a just opinion upon the subject, I shall be most decidedly opposed to the resolutions under discussion, and make free to say that the Military Committee has made a most unmilitary report.

Sir, until I am persuaded that I should be reprehensible in hot pursuit to follow the murderers of wife and children to the house of their accessories, on whosesoever ground it might stand, and drag them forth to instant punishment, I shall continue to thank and praise the man who has saved their lives or revenged their deaths.

Mr. Chairman, I felicitate myself, I congratulate my country, that our people better understand their rights than those of the old Republics, and have a more equal distribution of property than they had; that this honorable House is composed of, if not brighter, at least stronger materials than the legislative councils of Greece and Rome; if it was not, this day we might be led to record a vote at which the crowned heads in Europe indeed might chuckle; more cause would they have to chuckle than when they heard of Jackson's Creek treaty.* Much greater cause would our friends in Europe have of woe and bitter lamentation, to fold their desponding arms, and droop the melancholy head, than when they heard of our extinguishing the Indian title to a little slip of land.

To see us sacrifice our General, who shamefully defeated old England's chosen glorious bands, would make the Prince Regent's Ministers rejoice; to sacrifice our General would quiet the manes of the execrable Ambrister, and no doubt please Arbuthnot's honorable correspondent in this city;† to dismiss our General, who pursued the nurtured robbers of our people and murderers of our innocent children into Pensacola, would no doubt excite a grin from His Catholic Majesty's Minister near this metropolis. The sacrifice that we should make to a mistaken idea of patriotism and humanity, would be by him attributed to our fears of foreign force, for the poor soul knows nothing about the milk of human kindness that so abundantly flows in every freeman's breast. Deprived of our General, (for he thinks we have got but one,) he will again renew the Spanish claim to all the lands from the head to the mouth of the Mississippi; and if we did not forthwith surrender them, he would threaten us with the vengeance dire of his potent royal master. These, sir, will be the valuable results of our agreement with the honorable committee on military matters; this sacrifice, the honorable committee shows, will be made upon very slight presumption, that the General had, in the execution of a military order, a little exceeded a strictly literal construction. I think it conceded by all the honorable speakers upon this question, that, in their various opinions of necessity consists alone their discordant opinions upon this subject. Then, let us ask, who is the better judge of an important military movement? The gentleman at home, in peace and safety, feasting on all the luxuries of every clime, his children, like blessed seraphs, playing about him, his wife, too, sweet, soft, intelligent, all-accomplished, and beautiful too, as much as his fond wishes could have, whose humane ear was never pierced with the distant sound of the dreadful savage yell; whose charitable heart never had occasion to extend her munificent hand to the relief of woes inflicted by a barbarian band of ruthless sons of the wood, or the hardy weather-beaten General in the field, combating all the difficulties necessarily accompanying savage warfare; is that all, sir? No—subsisting himself and all his army on kind nature's spontaneous gifts, an all-important object to his country before his eye, which must be effected by a given day, or himself and army starves. Who is the best judge in such a case—the brave, aged, experienced General, at the head of the army, or the young, sweet-smelling, powdered beau of a drawing room? No doubt here. Then why not, in the name of propriety, leave to your General's own discretion the exercise of open orders, and not attempt to find fault where we cannot, from our situations, form a correct judgment of the necessities that lead to certain acts?

A word to my dear, good old mother, Virginia, and then I am done. With heartfelt pleasure did I see one of her favored sons, (Mr. TYLER,) of the younger brood, exhibit upon this occasion the true patriot soul; from his firm, expressive countenance, and bright, intelligent eye, I read the triumph of his soul, I saw that his devotion to his country had obtained a conquest over his filial affections. I thought I saw his heart weep blood when his eye said, Behold, my country, here is your Brutus; like the elder Brutus, I would condemn my own son for a breach of public law—like the younger, I would stab my father to save my country. I envy such feelings; they are almost too exalted for mortal man; yet I am sure he had them. But I implore my friend to recollect, that if there had been a hook on which to hang a doubt of the guilt of the son of the elder Brutus, that his act would have been thought most horrid. That if it was not well known that Cæsar was indeed ambitious, the younger Brutus would have committed a most detested crime. I hope his reflections on the subject will guard him against passing sentence against his brother, without the most incontestable proofs that his country is thereby to be relieved from most imminent danger. Let not this ardent zeal for the preservation of our constitution impel him to leap over its sacred walls, and horribly trespass upon its most valuable provisions. Is not the security of our reputation among the greatest objects of the constitution? If we condemn our General's conduct because, indeed, we cannot exactly think like him, will we not severely trespass on his feelings? You all do know what Shakspeare says about the value of a good name: "Reputation dear, my lord, is the immediate jewel of the soul," &c. Every member of this House, every lady in the gallery, and gentleman too, I hope, have read and highly approve his sentiments.

If reputation be so dear to every one among us, how high indeed must it be rated by him, whose bread, whose meat, whose life itself, hangs upon his fair won fame. I am happy, sir, to tell my friend, the honorable member from Philadelphia, that I shall never fear that the keen prying sense of squint-eyed suspicion will ever find a spider's egg among the leaves, much less a serpent, entwined about the branches of the full-grown wreath of laurels that adorns my General's brow. No, sir; Jackson's laurels can never scatter the seed that may hatch some future Tarquin, to wound the tender breast of some chaste Lucretia.

Seminole War.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, (Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, in the chair,) on the subject of the Seminole war.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Penn., observed, that, in entering into the investigation of this subject, he should not inquire whether motives of feeling and compassion should induce us to palliate and excuse the conduct of General Jackson and the President, and whether it were right or wrong. If innocent blood had been shed, or the laws and constitution of the country grossly violated, neither the exalted character nor eminent services of the persons implicated ought to exempt them from the censure of this House. But, on a careful examination of all the evidence and documents submitted to us, he was fully of the opinion expressed by his friend from Kentucky, the chairman of the Military Committee, (Mr. JOHNSON,) that General Jackson, in the wilds of Florida, better understood the laws of nations, and the constitution of his country, than gentlemen in this House, who had been so long discussing the propriety of his conduct.

To come to a correct conclusion on the trial and execution of Arbuthnot and Ambrister, it would be well to inquire who they were, and their business and employment in Florida. Arbuthnot was the agent of Nicholls and Woodbine, to excite dissensions among the Indians, to make them dissatisfied with the treaty of Fort Jackson, induce them by force to reclaim the lands ceded to us by that treaty, and the British and Spanish Governments to become parties. By a special power of attorney he became the general agent of all the Indians hostile to us, and was the instigator of all their inroads upon our Southern border. He pretended to be there for trade, but this was a mere pretence. Examine his letter to Governor Cameron, "I beg leave to represent to your excellency the necessity of my again returning to the Indian nation, with the deputies from the chiefs, and as my trouble and expense can only be defrayed by permission to take goods to dispose among them, I pray your excellency will be pleased to grant such a letter or license as prevents me being captured in case of meeting any Spanish cruiser on the coast of Florida." He was not the advocate for peaceful measures; his letter to General Mitchell justifies the murders of the frontier inhabitants. Speaking of the Indians, he says, "If, in the height of their rage, they committed any excesses, you will overlook them, as the just ebullitions of an indignant spirit against an invading foe." To further ascertain his true character, and that of his agency and trade, I beg the committee to examine his letter to Mr. Bagot. The bill of goods that this humane trader and innocent and injured man ordered to be sent to him, was "2,000 knives, blades from six to nine inches in length, of a good quality—1,000 tomahawks.' This was Arbuthnot; and these facts appear from letters in his own handwriting.

Ambrister was a pretended patriot; the agent of McGregor and Woodbine. He came to Florida to command the runaway negroes of Georgia, slaves who had absconded from their masters, and were organized by him to return to our country, and visit it with all the horrors of a savage negro war. He came to Florida on their business, and to see them righted. According to the testimony of John J. Arbuthnot, "about the 3d of March the prisoner Ambrister came with a body of negroes, partly armed, to his father's store on Suwanee River, and told the witness that he had come to do justice to the country, by taking the goods, and distributing them among the negroes and Indians, which the witness saw the prisoner do; and that the prisoner said to him, that he had come to the country on Woodbine's business, to see the negroes righted. The witness has further known the prisoner to give orders to the negroes; and that, at his suggestion, a party was sent from Suwanee to meet the Americans, to give them battle." Peter B. Cook testified, that, "some time in March, the prisoner Ambrister took Arbuthnot's schooner, and with an armed party of negroes, twenty-four in number, set out to take Arbuthnot's goods, &c. The prisoner was sent by Woodbine to Tampa, to see about those negroes he had left there." Ambrister, in a letter to Nicholls, says, "There is about three hundred blacks at this place, a few of our Bluff people, (alluding to the negro fort on Prospect Bluff;) they beg me to say they depend on your promises, and expect you all on the way out. They have stuck to the cause, and will always depend on the faith of you," &c. The prisoner, Ambrister, according to the testimony of Jacob Hannon, "took possession of the schooner Chance, with an armed party of negroes, and stated his intention of taking St. Marks. While the prisoner was on board, he had complete command of the negroes, who considered him as their captain."

He boasts that three hundred negroes have stuck to the cause—the cause of Indians attacking the defenceless inhabitants of our frontiers; negroes fighting against their masters; and all joining in horrid butchery and murder; Ambrister leading them in the field, Arbuthnot their agent, adviser, commissary, quarter-master, store-keeper—secure in a Spanish post, concerting all their plans, and directing all their operations.

Gentlemen may differ as to the manner in which we consider Indians, whether as a nation, or as occupants of the soil, with a qualified right of ownership; but, as to negroes, there can be but one opinion. In Georgia they are slaves, property not merely personal but political, property of the highest description, which we are bound by the constitution to protect, and to restore to their owners. These negroes could acquire no new right by absconding into Florida, and, however numerous their assemblage may be, we cannot acknowledge them as thus acquiring any national character. As between them and us they were still slaves; and their owners, the Georgia militia, who were with General Jackson, had a right to consider and treat them not as a nation entitled to the protection of the rules of civilized warfare. They were, in fact, suppressing an insurrection of slaves, aided by an Indian force, all assembled and armed for purposes hostile to the country. One white man is found at their head, fighting and leading them on; another exciting, and supplying them with the means of destruction. These men cannot complain if they are put on a footing with those with whom they thus associate. They cannot expect to raise this compound mass to their own level, but must be satisfied to sink to theirs. Arbuthnot's own opinion of himself is entitled to some weight. In his letter of 3d March, 1817, he says: "The Lower Creeks seem to wish to live peaceably, and quietly, and in good friendship with the others, but there are some designing and ill-minded persons, self-interested, who are endeavoring to create quarrels between the Upper and Lower Creek Indians, contrary to their interests, their happiness, and welfare. Such people belong to no nation, and ought not to be countenanced by any government." He did excite this war, and thus, by his own account, belongs to no nation. What then is he, but an outlaw and a pirate, placed beyond the protection of civilized society? Thus we find General Jackson and Arbuthnot agree as to him, and, as to Ambrister, I will willingly leave it to be decided whether he was less an outlaw than the runaway brigands whom he commanded.

The greater part of the hostile Indians were the Creeks, who had been outlawed by their people. To call a gregarious collection of this kind, composed of outlawed Indians and runaway negroes a nation, and give them national attributes, is idle. Neither mass was so by themselves, and their union for a common object could not change the character of the constituent parts. A better or more appropriate name could not be given to them as a mass, or as individuals, than outlaws and pirates. They were so in fact, and, whatever rights we had against any, we had against all, whether black, white, or red.

Arbuthnot was near the scene of operations, aiding and abetting, an accessory before the fact. An attempt is made to distinguish his case from Ambrister's, because he was a non-combatant. But to me it seems, that the man who, as the agent, commissary, and quarter-master, directed and planned the operations of this assemblage, and directly supplied them with the means, is as much a combatant as one who actually bore arms in the field. Thus were these men completely identified with the Indians and negroes, and, being found in this situation by General Jackson, he practised towards them not the right of retaliation, which is punishing the innocent for the guilty, but applied to them what is admitted and conceded to be the established law of nations; to treat those with whom we are at war as they treat us. Indians put their prisoners to death, and in this war they did not spare women and children; the brains of the latter were dashed out on the sides of the boat, after the massacre of Lieutenant Scott and party, and I think it can hardly be contended that we were bound to extend to these savages, to runaway slaves, or white incendiaries, the humane rules of modern civilized warfare. Their execution was only the exercise of an acknowledged right in us.

In distinguishing between the moral depravity of the ignorant Indian, who, in roasting his prisoner and murdering the mother and the infant, follows the customs of his fathers, and as he thinks, the dictates of his religion; and the white man, who, forgetting the mild customs of his nation, and deaf to the benignant dictates of the Christian religion, instigates, aids, and abets the Indian and negro to the horrid butchery of innocence, I think all must agree that the one who sins against light and knowledge is infinitely more criminal. The guilt is in the heart that plots and not the hand that executes, as was most forcibly expressed by a gentleman from Virginia. Not in the musket, but in him who directs it. If ——, who was present and assisted at the burning of the unfortunate Colonel Crawford, had been taken by our troops, and executed; if, on that day, so proud and yet so fatal for Kentucky, when, after the battle of the river Raisin, there was a barbarous massacre of her captive soldiers, it had been true, as was alleged, that a British officer, high in command, abetted and connived at the murders, and he had been taken and executed, would his fate have been more lamented than that of the poor savage, whom they encouraged? In executing Arbuthnot and Ambrister, it is not charged against General Jackson that he had shed innocent blood. The facts were admitted; their guilt was established; one threw himself on the mercy of the court, the other rested his defence on the rules of evidence. The charge is, that the guilty have not been punished according to the forms of law, and that the constitution and laws of the country have been violated in their trial and execution. I think that neither have any bearing on the case of these men. They were found and executed out of the territorial limits of the United States, where our laws or constitution have no operation, except as between us and our citizens, and where none other could claim their benefit and protection. If the rights of an American citizen had been violated by an American officer, he must answer to our laws for an abuse of an authority which he derived under them. These men were not our citizens, not bound by our laws; they owed us no allegiance, and were entitled to no protection. The General claimed no power to punish them under our laws. He knew that legislation was necessarily confined to the boundary of the Sovereign; that on the ocean, where each nation has concurrent jurisdiction, or in the territory of any other where it is exclusive, our laws could not give us any power over the citizens of other Governments, or within their boundaries. All that we could claim or exercise, in either case, is by the laws and usages of nations. Our legislation cannot extend or annul this code. We may, indeed, prescribe the mode in which our officers shall execute the powers which the laws of nations give us over the persons, territory, or property of others, but cannot extend our jurisdiction over either, or give it in cases where those laws are silent. In advocating the resolution which requires some legislative rule on this subject, gentlemen seem to forget these principles—we have no power—we should encroach on the rights of other nations. As we cannot, therefore, give ourselves any new powers by any act of legislation, I trust gentlemen will see the bad policy and the injustice we should do ourselves by adopting any rule not to be found in national law. If we take from our officers the powers which that law gives them, we go to war on unequal terms, with our hands tied, so that we shall not be at liberty to treat our enemy as they treat us. Our officers could neither retaliate nor punish for the most atrocious outrages on humanity. Innocent blood would forever flow. Indian wars would never cease. Foreign emissaries would always hang on our borders, and escape with impunity. The law of nations and of war gives the General power over his prisoners. The old practice was to put them to death; and that still exists, when the consent of the belligerents has not adopted a different rule. Civilized nations govern themselves by the laws of humanity; but our savages have not yet learned them. War, with them, has lost none of its horrors or cruelties. It surely cannot be pretended that we are bound by a rule which they do not respect; that we cannot, by retaliation or by just punishment, revenge for past or prevent future murders; or that where we take white men who have served in civilized armies and know their usages, and yet aid and instigate the most dreadful savage war, we may not treat them as we might the savages or negroes whom they command and lead on. By the laws and uniform practice of civilized nations, this power is in the commanding General. In the case of Captain Asgill, the old Congress resolved that it was in every commander of a detachment. This was a strong case. He was about to be executed for the crimes of another. We have never, by any law, prohibited to a commanding officer the exercise of this power, and it therefore remains with him.

Bank of the United States.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a memorial of William Jones, late President of the Bank of the United States, containing an exposition of the views and motives which have regulated his official conduct, and submitting his case to the wisdom and justice of Congress, in the full confidence that his reputation will not be subjected to obloquy, by inferences alike repugnant to his principles and to the whole tenor of his private and public life; which was read and ordered to lie on the table.

Seminole War.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. BASSETT in the chair, on this subject.

Mr. FLOYD, of Virginia, rose and said, that he saw the impatience of the House, and knew they were anxious to dispose of the resolutions which had been so many days the subject of discussion; consequently, he would not detain them—though, having failed in several attempts to get the floor at an earlier period of the debate, he had entirely declined making any remarks whatever—that he then rose more with a view of expressing an opinion, and of presenting a few facts, which had escaped the observation of other gentlemen, than any desire or intention of entering upon the subject at large.

I have, said he, considered the resolutions, with all the attention I was capable of giving them; and, if I had believed the measures pursued unconstitutional in themselves or barbarous, or unjust in their execution, I should have revisited them upon the perpetrators with a heavy vengeance; but, so far from this, my inquiry has led me to believe they are, and can be, maintained, upon every principle of justice, and the long-established usages of this Government. And, sir, said Mr. F., it is with not a little surprise I hear the advocates of these resolutions disagreeing among themselves—scarce any two holding the same opinion.

The honorable Committee on Military Affairs have had all the documents relative to the Seminole war before them for weeks, and at last seized upon the objectionable point, and reported a resolution disapproving the trial and execution of Alexander Arbuthnot and Robert C. Ambrister. There was an end to answer, and this not being broad enough, other resolutions are offered, as amendments, to enlarge the chance of obtaining some success. One gentleman takes strong ground, and insists that the war was produced by us; that it was an aggression on our part, and all the proceedings resulting from it were unjust and unconstitutional. One other gentleman does not quite believe the war was waged by us, but believes the whole of the resolutions ought to obtain—that General Jackson is censurable throughout. One other admits the justice of the sentence of Arbuthnot and Ambrister, but vehemently condemns the capture of St. Marks and Pensacola. Again—it is admitted that the execution of these men was just and proper, and so with the capture of St. Marks; yet there is no justification in the affair of Pensacola. One other honorable gentleman finds nothing to excuse but the execution of Ambrister. Last of all, the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. FULLER,) calls the war an aggression on our part; that it was unconstitutional; that its prosecution was unjust; the capture of St. Marks, Pensacola, and the Barancas, an infraction of the constitution—a war with Spain; the execution of these incendiaries a violation of the law of nations; and has even gone so far as to justify the erection of the negro fort, for the reason that Spain was too weak to prevent it.

Now, sir, if the honorable committee, in their calm retirement, a thousand miles from the scene of action, and months after it happened, could have discovered, from the documents, any "absolute necessity" for the execution of these wretched men, we have a right to infer that such a report would not have been framed by them; but the General, who was there encompassed by enemies, death, and devastation, judged wrong, and deserves the heavy censures of his country. There has been so much said upon this subject, such various and conflicting opinion among the advocates of the propositions, all diverging from the long-established maxims and usages of this Government, that I am unwilling to pursue them, without first inquiring what has been the course pursued by preceding Administrations, under similar circumstances.

In reverting to the transactions of this Government, it will be found, that, so long ago as the year 1789, difficulties and war with the Indian tribes took place; and the then President, WASHINGTON, felt himself authorized in taking measures to defend the people of the South and West from their hostile incursions, and advised Congress, at their next session, of the steps he had taken. That Congress thought the measures highly commendable and proper.

In the year 1790, we find the same Washington complaining grievously of hostile irruptions of certain banditti of Indians northwest of the Ohio, aided by some on the Wabash; that the country was no longer in safety on that whole frontier. He ordered one of the generals to march an army against them, which army was composed of the troops of the United States, combined with such draughts of the militia as were deemed sufficient. When this communication was made, no murmur was heard.

In 1791 difficulties and war with the Indians beyond the Ohio again commenced; troops were ordered to march against them, and Congress was informed that some of the expeditions had been crowned with success; that in other instances the troops were then in the field, the issue at that time not known. Congress again approved. Another proof of this sanctioned method of conducting this species of war, is given us in the transactions of the year 1792, when the Indians beyond the Ohio were in arms; the Chickamagas to the south had come to an open rupture. Troops were assembled, and put in training for a vigorous campaign; this, too, with a perfect knowledge of Congress, who complained not of any violation of right, or usurpation of power.

Were I to mention that the President of the United States, in the year 1793, used every possible means in his power to avoid war with the Indians, but, finding them fruitless and unavailing, ordered an army to march and act offensively, I should say no more than is known to every gentleman in this House; and I presume I should likewise say no more than is known to them, were I to say when the communication was made to Congress they approved the procedure. Whence, sir, I may be authorized in asserting, that no other opinions have ever been entertained of the correctness of the mode of conducting Indian hostilities, from the origin of the constitution to the present time, than those which directed in the late contest; which ought at least to be some apology with those who think the constitution has been disregarded in the commencement of hostilities. And how a different opinion came now to be entertained, though we have passed through some years of sorrowful experience, is more than I can conjecture.

That a doubt on this subject existed for a short time, with one member of the Government, is admitted; but that doubt was dissipated when the true situation of the Indians came to be considered. The United States, feeling liberty, and actuated by principles of benevolence alone, extended to these people every privilege, and all the rights of an independent nation, which could be done consistent with their own safety, and the condition in which themselves were left by the long course of European policy under which they had suffered. And I presume it is not doubted that, in the war of the Revolution, when these United States took up arms against Great Britain, and conquered the country from her, comprised within the limits assigned to us by the Treaty of Peace in 1783, they likewise conquered those Indians who were the allies of England, bloody and revengeful then, as upon a more recent occasion; full as much so as the most sanguinary Briton could desire. I am much surprised to hear gentlemen now talk of concessions—their rights and independence. Were these concessions complete? Was it ever supposed by any to be so, or ever intended to be so? We are now told, as a proof of their independence, that we make treaties with them. This is the first time I have heard the doctrine, though, without doubt, many weighty reasons have led to that conclusion. The United States have always observed that ceremony, and permitted treaties to be made with different tribes, as one of the best means of conciliating their favor, and maintaining our peaceful relations undisturbed; as they have never been permitted to treat with any but the United States, or some Indian tribe. But, say gentlemen, they declare war, and are not guilty of treason in doing so. Was it not rather because they were totally incapable of appreciating the restraints of civilized men, that they were, in this respect, permitted to fangle their own destinies? Have not the United States ever claimed jurisdiction over their country, as contained within the limits of the Union? And when a proposition was made at Ghent to place it on a different footing, some gentlemen then felt great indignation at the idea. None will doubt, I imagine, the laws of the United States having always been in force throughout their country; the laws of the Indians only extending to Indians within their assigned territory. If we go back, with the gentleman from New York, to the discovery of this continent by Europeans, when it was chartered away by the monarchs of that country, down to the present time, we find they neither are, nor ever have been, independent.

But, sir, granting the question in as full and as broad an extent as gentlemen might desire, can it be presumed the forces of the Republic are to remain idle spectators—see hostile incursions take place—men, women, and children, put to death, without marching to defend them, until Congress shall authorize them to protect the helpless, and secure themselves? Suppose that power, with which we are doomed, at no very distant day, again to contend with, in the bloody field of death, should unexpectedly as it will be when it does come, declare war against us: is the President to permit the ships of war and the forces to lie idle, until Congress can be convened from all parts of this Union to declare war in turn? Yet this is the effect of that doctrine. This constitution is not of such leaden materials; it never was intended; it cannot abridge the first great clause of the constitution of man himself, written upon his heart by the hand of Omnipotence—"preserve yourself." The wisdom of this instrument is acknowledged; the feelings of the hoary sages of the Revolution, blanched in the field, amid embattled legions, is appreciated; and the doctrines of liberty, moulded into form, in this instrument, will be preserved; and to pursue, at this day, a course which themselves pursued, ought to screen us from the charge of dangerous innovation, or usurpation of power. I would ask, who there is among us that does not recollect the disasters of General St. Clair, and the anxiety of every individual for the success of General Wayne? And who is there that does not recollect the joyous enthusiasm at the news of his victory, which ran, like an electric stream, from one end of this continent to the other? This, I believe, was about the year 1794; and, too, at the instance of the Executive. I believe, likewise, that it was about this time that troubles harassed us at the South—an Indian war having been excited by De Carondelet, who was at that time Governor of Louisiana. At all events, there was strong grounds to suspect him for those hostilities. And for their expenses in the prosecution of this war, I believe it is, that the State of Georgia yet claims a debt due her from the United States of perhaps $129,000. And, could I recollect the arguments of the honorable gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. COBB,) at the last session of Congress, when he advocated the Georgia claim with so much ability and zeal, I would use them on the present occasion, with perfect confidence of success, at all events of gaining at least one proselyte. All was constitutional then—Executive power was all.

But, Mr. Chairman, I demand if Congress have not, or, rather, I ought to say, have not we, ourselves, sanctioned this war, to as great and full an extent as ever Congress sanctioned an Indian war? And why is that an evil now, which, at the last session, was encouraged, and might have been prevented? Was not the President harassed the whole of last session, with continual calls from this House? Did they not call on him to know what General Jackson was about? What measures he had taken to put an end to the Seminole war? Did they not require the orders which had been given to General Jackson to be communicated to them? And were they not communicated? Surely all this must have apprised them of the nature of the military operations on the Florida frontier? Nay, more, did they not require information relative to the manner in which that army was supplied? And the feelings created by the disclosure of the contractor's conduct on that occasion will not, in a long time, be forgotten. To say nothing of the pay of the Georgia militia in that army having been increased from five to eight dollars, at the instance and management of the gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. COBB.) At all events, I recollect his pressing through this House a resolution to that effect in April last.

Now, sir, after these numerous acts of approval; after granting money, providing men, increasing their pay; inspecting the orders of the President to your generals—with time to act, and a knowledge of all, a measure of this kind, and a report of that nature, was not to be expected from this House as the reward of fidelity and zeal.

If there is censure anywhere, it is due to Congress for not having performed their duty; as the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. HOPKINSON) admits, that, if there had been in existence such a law as the one contemplated by these resolutions, he unquestionably believes General Jackson had never executed Arbuthnot and Ambrister, or captured the Spanish fortresses; and yet that gentleman would censure this General for doing an act which he would not have done had such a law been in existence, and that such a law has never been enacted, cannot be any part of General Jackson's concern. Let Congress themselves account for this deficiency, which has, in the opinion of gentlemen, caused such violence to the constitution.

Mr. Chairman, was it right to pass the Florida line? At the last session I do not recollect to have heard a dissenting voice; though it was manifest then that the Executive paused and reflected, and reflected much, before the Secretary of War issued the order requiring General Gaines to march his army into the Spanish territory; and then only upon the recurrence of new outrages. These orders were as well known then as at this time; these outrages did occur; and, sir, I must think, then was the time for this House to act; then was the time to interpose, to have preserved the constitution. But, at that time, all these measures were pursued, as the only efficient mode of putting an end to the war. All were then energetically disposed to put an end to those hostilities which harassed Georgia and Alabama with murder and desolation. All were then disposed to do themselves that justice which, by the law of nations and nature, they had a right to do. As the well-known impotence of Spain almost precluded the hope of her maintaining her authority in that country, much less fulfilling her treaty obligations, which was manifest from her not having herself undertaken to subdue her Indians making this war upon us, some gentlemen thought the order to General Gaines slow and inefficient, which required him to halt his army, and not to attack the enemy under the fort of St. Marks until he reported to the Department of War, and received orders how to proceed; believing, from the nature of the treaty of 1795, Spain to be, in that respect, an ally of the United States.

I will not insist, as has been done by gentlemen who advocate the same side with myself, that the orders of General Gaines were not binding upon General Jackson, believing, as I do, that an order issued to an officer is binding upon the next who takes command, though of a higher rank, provided that order had been issued by their common superior. But it appears, from the documents, that General Jackson received an order of subsequent date, from the War Department, to conduct the war in Florida "in the manner he might think best." Certainly the Secretary could not have meant any thing more than that he was to conduct the war in the manner he should think most conformable to the law of nations. Considering the peculiar condition of all the parties, they could not mean any thing else. Then the inquiry is, has he done so?

On assuming the command at Fort Scott, this General soon fixed on a plan for his future operations; and, in the course of his march, penetrating into Florida to find the enemy's town, he encamped at Prospect Bluff, on the old site of Negro Fort. Finding it so entirely convenient as a place of deposit, he erects Fort Gadsden, contrary to every principle of justice, in the opinion of some gentlemen, who justify the erection of Negro Fort, because Spain was not able to prevent it, and call that an outrage which destroyed it, though there were many hundred stand of arms, much powder, cannon, &c., there, manifestly destined to be used against the United States; and the burning alive of a prisoner, and the massacre of a boat's crew, might be thought by some a confirmation of that belief.

It was from this place General Jackson wrote to Governor Mazot, with all that frank and open manner to be expected from an American officer, who was executing the orders of his Government, in prosecuting a war which we had been engaged in through the inability of Spain to wage, and in the termination of which both countries were equally concerned, informing him, in the most explicit terms, of his friendly intentions, and only asks that provisions might be permitted to ascend the Escambia to Fort Crawford. Was it the part of a neutral nation to refuse that passage, when perhaps the lives of part of his troops depended upon those supplies? Was that the course Spain ought to have taken to fulfil her stipulations? Under such circumstances, the law of nations will justify force.

Hearing that the hostile Indians were embodied at a town called Mickasuky, his march was directed that way, where a battle ensued—the issue, success. And notwithstanding my honorable colleague (Mr. MERCER) thinks the accounts of those terrible massacres all vanish to nothing upon examining into the subject, there was found in this village a war pole, decorated with fresh scalps, recognized by the hair as torn from the heads of Lieutenant Scott and his party; and in the house of Kenhajo, the chief of that town, were found more than fifty others!

After this battle, it is ascertained that the enemy had departed, whilst one party directed their march to Suwanee, the other to the fort of St. Marks. It was then Captain Call, a gentleman I am not acquainted with, but on inquiry I learn from every source that he is esteemed a man of honor, and a brave and excellent officer—it was then he informed General Jackson of the message of the Governor of Pensacola. That the fort of St. Marks was weak; that demands had been made upon it for munitions of war by the negroes and Indians; that he entertained strong fears for the safety of the fort, as they had threatened to seize it in case of refusal. Moreover, it appears from the documents—proof, I think, sufficient of itself to justify the capture of that post—that the Indians did obtain ammunition and arms at that place; that councils of war were held in it by the enemy, and in the quarters of the Spanish commander; that the property plundered from the citizens of Georgia was sold there; that Luengo did permit the clothes taken from Scott's party to be sold to the Spanish soldiery; and even contracts were made for the purchase of property that was to be plundered from Georgia. Now, I ask, if prudence, justice, self-defence, did not demand the capture of St. Marks? Surely, the Governor of Pensacola's message, if it means any thing, was an invitation to take possession of it, even perhaps to prevent a development of their nefarious conduct.

After these operations, General Jackson determined to put an end to the war, by giving battle to the negro and Indian forces concentrated at the Suwanee towns, and, after innumerable difficulties, arrived at that place, and defeated those who had not availed themselves of the philanthropic disinterestedness of Mr. Arbuthnot, who, it seems, had advised his friend Bowlegs, by express from St. Marks, of the number and movements of Jackson's army; and, too, with a knowledge of the Spanish officer. This duty performed, he returned to St. Marks, through the wilderness, in five days, a distance of more than one hundred miles, with a firm persuasion that the war was at an end, and in a few days returned to Fort Gadsden, on his way home. Why did he not return home? Here he was informed that Fort Crawford was in great distress for the want of provisions, which the Governor of Pensacola had prevented from going to them, by enormous exactions; that the negroes and Indians had possession of that place; that a party had been pursued within sight of it by a detachment from Fort Crawford, and defeated, the fugitives taking refuge in that town; that the place was no longer under the control of the Spanish power; that many murders had been committed in Alabama by bands who went from that post, and returned to it, with their booty and scalps. Can it be supposed, under these circumstances, any place is to be regarded as neutral? It is of little consequence to the sufferers, whether it proceeds from inability to maintain its authority, or an unwillingness to do so. The effect is the same. To take possession of a post from which he has been annoyed by his enemy, is justice, and is conformable to the law of nations. Surely, if his enemy is sheltered by a fortress, and from it munitions of war obtained, inroads and murders planned and executed, and a return to that place safe, to commence anew these scenes; it is difficult to conceive why the opposite party is not entitled to the same indulgence. The Governor of Pensacola does not deny this feebleness, though he refuses positively to surrender the post; in which he is right, as he, too, has to account to a superior officer for his conduct. The inquiry then is, why did General Jackson take it? The same answer may be given which was given for the capture of St. Marks. Are these things true? The Spanish superior authorities think so; the Spanish King himself thinks so. Then it was no war on the part of General Jackson, but the assertion of a right, resulting to us from the law of nations. So it has been considered by all but our own constitution; which, whilst it secures our liberty within, it would seem takes away our rights from without.

Much has been said of the trial of Arbuthnot and Ambrister; and, as I have already said, after weeks of consideration, the Committee on Military Affairs could not find any thing to censure but the execution of these two British agents and incendiaries. The one, bold and hardened in guilt, plead guilty to the charges; the other expects escape from his diplomatic skill. We are perfectly astonished, on examining the documents, to find them persevering for a long time in maturing their schemes of murder, and making arrangements to effect their plans, in procuring arms and placing them in the hands of the merciless savages, in stimulating them to commence this war, in all its horrors, and fall like a flood of fire on our whole frontier, sweeping away all, both innocence and age. More arms, of every description, are sought for; knives, flints, and tomahawks, in alarming quantities. To crush the lawless banditti of Indians and rebellious slaves, who observe no law, human or divine, urged to murder, indiscriminately, men, women, and children, burn, plunder, and destroy, without distinction, without remorse, by these relentless fiends, General Jackson is ordered into the field. Yet, for the destruction of these unhappy men, are the Representatives of the people of this great Republic called on, by that extraordinary report of the committee, to censure their General; and that, too, for not showing mercy to those who knew no mercy, and whose hands were smoking with the blood of hundreds of their countrymen! This General who, in the day of adversity, stood like a rock of adamant, and breasted the tempestuous waves of a doubtful war; a war which had shook from their base the massy columns of the Hall where it was declared, and razed the Capitol to its foundation stone, whilst frenzied fear bewildered all it met, and red-eyed hate rolled with Satanic smile upon the Administration of your country; he it was who raised a reputation to your arms and to your country, bright and more bright as the storm lulled away.

Even now again, almost upon the instant, that gentlemen defies all, and challenges history to produce one single example, and then adds, there was none. I will not, Mr. Chairman, question the prowess of the Kentuckians; I believe they are brave, independent, hospitable, and magnanimous, and all things that gentlemen could wish them. I am proud at all times to hear of their deeds of valor. Yet this thing called bravery, I believe, is pretty equally diffused through the great mass of men, and, under similar circumstances, there would be found but little difference; brave officers will always make brave men. Though what is said of this conspicuous State cannot be doubted, as all who have conversed with them know they are independent; all who have travelled in that State doubtless have partaken of their hospitality. And that they behaved well at the battle of Tippecanoe, I do not doubt; that they behaved bravely at the battle of the River Raisin I will not doubt; that they behaved gallantly at the battle of the Thames I cannot doubt. But, sir, there was retaliation, and most conspicuous, in that State. In one instance, well known, when a party of Indians had committed depredations and murders, were followed by Colonel Lyne, known to be a brave and active officer, by some chance of war one of the warriors fell into his hands, and was hanged upon the next tree. The most striking instance, however, is one which my friend from Ohio (Mr. HARRISON) has just brought to my recollection—that, when that great General and best of men, George Rogers Clark, was on that celebrated campaign in which he stormed a whole chain of British posts on the Wabash and Kaskaskias, he captured the town of St. Vincennes; whilst in the town, the well-known noise was heard in the neighborhood, which informed the inhabitants that a war party was then returned with scalps. Clark immediately despatched some of his soldiers and took them prisoners. When the mischief they had done was ascertained, he ordered them to be taken in view of the British fort, and told to ask protection from their good father, George the Third, and in that place were all instantly put to death. In those days there were numerous instances of individuals who had lost a relation by the Indians, taking their rifles, and going in search of the enemy, even in their own country, and killing one. At that time they called it "taking satisfaction;" of course it might not be retaliation.

If I were to declare an opinion as to the horrors and cruelty of all our Indian wars, I would unhesitatingly say, to British agents all is attributable; nor can I now feel this sickly sorrow for them. But, in those gloomy days the honorable gentleman from Kentucky speaks of, the machinations of these agents wrung with agony and pain the bosom of many a gallant man in that country with apprehensions for the consequences. Children at school, in the hours of play, were butchered, at the instigation of those agents; murder on every road, and death in every path; all went armed to their daily avocations. Sir, the friend of my boyhood, the honorable chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, ought to tell of early times there, and of Indian wars and British agents, though at that time he was only of such an age as to know the danger, and rejoice when the sun went down without seeing the mangled corse of a murdered friend brought into the fort. The melancholy transactions of the Seminole war are but faint rehearsals of thousands and thousands of such acts in the West. And, even at this day, the name of British agent or trader, for they are synonymous, will create a sudden start of horror in the widowed mother of a family, as it tears open all the sluices of her grief, which time had soothed, but could not destroy. The children were hushed to silence by the terrible names of Simon Girty and McKee. Could those incendiaries have been taken in those days, every voice would have pronounced their doom. Not only individuals in that country, but whole families, were swept away; many who had rendered brilliant services to their country, are now only known to those who feel a kindred sorrow; and if a gallant deed has faintly pierced the terrible night which overhangs their fame, should cause a stranger to ask where they are now, or where their children, echo mocks the inquiry, and retorts the question.

Unquestionably, sir, there are many rights incident to a state of war; that, when hostilities have commenced, and an enemy every hour in view, it is difficult for a deliberative body like this to seize upon an abstract principle, and apply it, at that particular place or moment, and say what was or was not necessary for their General to do. He knows the obligation he owes to the constitution of his country and the authorities of the State, and knows what, by the law of nations, he may do when surrounded by war and desolation, his enemy near at hand, and retiring into a neutral country. He has a right to follow, that neutral power not prohibiting the entry of his enemy; his country, to say the least, rightfully becomes the theatre of war. Nor is it easy to conceive this feverish discontent at the death of men who rightfully died; and, whatever may be thought of it here, in the sunshine of peace, and the whirl of gay daylight, the people there consider it a blessing, and no doubt has already saved the lives of many hundreds of our citizens. Nor can it be well understood why these executions should be deemed cruel, when with them are associated the deeds for which they suffered. Whilst recollection paints the horrors of death in all its terrible forms—the scalps, fresh bleeding, torn from our countrymen, placed upon a pole, becoming the subject of hellish mirth; the helpless female butchered whilst kneeling and suing for mercy; the toothless little infant snatched from its mother's bosom, and its brains dashed out against a tree—its body thrown on the ground, there lies quivering in death. Sir, amid scenes like these, and the enemy at hand, to talk of delays is to deride the mandates of nature and of nature's God.

It has been further remarked by an honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. HOPKINSON,) that of all the genius in the world there is none dangerous to the community but a military one. Newton's genius was so great that it seemed to hold converse with the stars; the erratic comet in its course could not escape him, and, I believe, even threw light upon the sun—yet this was harmless. Shakspeare, the great source of pleasure and instruction to ages, past, present, and to come, was perfectly innocent in all its operations. The honorable Speaker says, too, should we not cling to the constitution, and preserve it by passing these resolutions, that the day is close at hand when some daring chieftain, after another splendid victory, will strut in his gaudy costume, casting a look of approbation as he walks between obedient rows of admiring vassals, and seize upon your liberties; and then the hills rising round your Capitol will be covered with the gorgeous palaces of a pampered noblesse; and then tells us, in words which sound very much like Patrick Henry's, that Rome had her Cæsar, Britain her Cromwell, France her Napoleon, and may we profit by the example. Napoleon! If I were to express myself with an enthusiasm not my own, I would say when nature made the world, she next made the spirit of that great man, and then she rested. I saw, or thought I saw, the impression those dangers of military men seemed to make upon the House, and believe I am about to hazard an opinion, new in a degree, and very opposite to that of both these honorable gentlemen, which is, that no government has ever yet been destroyed by a successful military chieftain. I appeal to history to support me, if my construction be right. If I recollect the words of the historian, "Cæsar, having less reputation, like a wise champion, retired to a distance, for exercise, whilst the two great factions preyed upon the liberties of Rome; when every contest for place or power, was decided in the forum by the sword, and stained the Capitol with blood." Then, not till then, did Cæsar return to Rome, which, ever since the wars of Marius and Sylla, had known no liberty. Nor is the overthrow of the British Government attributable to Cromwell; the speeches of Parliament produced the revolution, and the treachery of members. When all was in commotion, by canting and preaching, Cromwell secured the stronger party and became the Protector. Nor can the French revolution be attributed to any thing but to the insincerity of the orators in the States General, and to none in a higher degree than that greatest of orators, and worst of men, Mirabeau. If, in after times, as in all other revolutions, Napoleon secured the stronger party, and swayed the Government, it cannot be said he overturned it. Did not every distinguished man in France rule as long as he was popular with the stronger party; and did he not cease to rule as soon as he lost his popularity? This was no reproach to professedly politicians, though in a military man, possessing power by the same means, it subjects him to the charge of using his military power to overthrow the Government of his country; and by none more than disappointed orators, who had contributed to the downfall of many successive administrations, with a hope of one day possessing it themselves. If I recollect the history right, the only instance of the overthrow of a regular government was by an ambitious statesman, one of the Dukes of Venice, who boldly seized upon the powers, declared the then Senators Senators for life, and their children after them. This, I am inclined to believe, is the source of their nobility, the only patent they have for rank. Moreover, I believe it would be correct to say these men, the most conspicuous military destroyers of their country, were all created by the times. No, Mr. Chairman, our liberties are not to be endangered by a successful chieftain, returning to us with his gaudy costume, even after a hundred victories of New Orleans. It is here, in this Capitol, on this floor, that our liberty is to be sacrificed, and that by the hollow, treacherous eloquence of some ambitious, proud, aspiring demagogue. And if, in times to come, we should hear a favorite officer, who has exhausted his constitution in defence of his country—throwing wreaths of victory at her feet—charged with violations of her liberty, let us inquire whether the sternness of his virtues is not his greatest blemish. If history gives an account of a military chief's returning to his country, and overthrowing its settled institutions, it has, at this time, escaped my recollection.

Mr. ERVIN addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Chairman: I am sorry it has fallen to my lot to be so late in debate on this question. From my own feelings, I am persuaded the committee is exhausted, and unwilling to bestow its attention, anticipating a want of capacity in any member to throw any new light upon this interesting subject. A sense of duty, however, has determined me to express to you the opinion which I entertain in relation to it, in doing which, I anticipate the same indulgent attention which you have accorded to other gentlemen. Before entering upon its discussion, I feel it a duty which I owe to the people and myself, to express my extreme regret, that so much of our time has been appropriated to its discussion, whilst other subjects of practical utility, and great public importance, have awaited our attention. Experience, sir, has long since taught me the inutility of the expression of legislative opinion upon abstract questions; because, whatever may be the result of their deliberations, and the opinion expressed, it can have no binding efficacy in determining the discretion of subsequent legislatures. At the last session of Congress, much sensibility was felt because the President of the United States expressed his opinion and determination on a subject which he anticipated would engage the attention of Congress. Although the correctness of the motive, in that case, was known and appreciated, fears were entertained, lest, if indulged and continued on the part of the Executive, and acquiesced in by Congress, a precedent would be formed which might tend to limit legislative discretion. If the informal expression of this opinion, on a subject of which he had concurrent jurisdiction, was deemed incorrect, what opinion will be formed of the character of the expression of an opinion in relation to a military officer, not by the Congress of the United States, but by the House of Representatives, over whom, even in their capacity as the impeaching power, they have no jurisdiction? For, as the House of Representatives, the only power given to it by the constitution (and without which it has no power) is a power to judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members, and to punish or expel a member. In giving a construction to the constitution, which I am sworn to support, I cannot, and will not, suffer my mind to be deluded by the imposing idea of the House of Representatives being "the grand inquest of the nation." I have just enumerated its powers in its separate capacity, and contend, that the exercise of any power beyond that enumeration is assumed, but not delegated. Courts of inquiry and courts-martial are the proper and legal correctives of error or criminality in the military, which, if neglected to be applied by the President, in cases requiring it, he is responsible.

Again, sir, the sovereign authority ought never to speak, but when it can command; and ought never to command, but when it can compel obedience. In this case, the officer may lie securely intrenched behind Executive protection, your resolves to the contrary notwithstanding; and a departure from this principle ought never to be indulged, unless in approbation of splendid achievements, by land or by water, which will have the happy effect of increasing the moral power or force of the nation.

The treaty of Fort Jackson, in August, 1814, which is said to have been the cause of the late Indian war, has been adverted to in terms of disapprobation and severe animadversion. "The United States demand—the United States demand"—expressions used in that treaty, are thought too dictatorial.

Mr. Chairman, what age or country ever saw it otherwise than that the conqueror should dictate terms of peace; and, in this case, circumstances imperiously required it. For, in the midst of peace, whilst we were endeavoring to extend to the Indians the advantages of civilization, supplying them with implements of husbandry, and paying them an annual tribute for their friendship, and just at the time when we had engaged in war with a powerful and warlike nation, forgetful of those acts of kindness, they joined our enemy, and commenced a war of extermination against our helpless women and children. Pity still drops a tear at the remembrance of the conflagration of upwards of three hundred men, women and children in Fort Mimms in 1813, and the winds still sigh over the fields and repeat the dying groans of our brave countrymen, who were inhumanly butchered in cold blood by the Indians after they had capitulated at the River Raisin. The whole frontier of Tennessee and Georgia was threatened with ruin and desolation from savage barbarity until the hero of New Orleans appeared upon the theatre of action, and, by triumphing at Talladega, Tullushatcha, Emuckfaw, and Tohopeka, taught that unhappy deluded people, that, although we were engaged in a foreign war, we were still able to avenge savage insults, and repel savage injuries. And will any one, after these facts and atrocities being presented to him, pretend to say, that it was unjust or unwise for the conqueror to cause them to be removed from the proximity of a neighboring nation, from whence they were continually goaded on to acts of violence and deeds of murder; or to dictate such terms of peace as were best calculated to prevent the repetition of similar scenes, and give security to our southern frontier? I hope not. Your General, as one of the commissioners on the part of the United States to make that treaty, acted correctly. The laws of nations declare, "that an equitable conqueror, deaf to the suggestions of ambition and avarice, will make a just estimate of what is due to him, and will retain no more of the enemy's property than what is precisely sufficient to furnish the equivalent. But, if he has to do with a perfidious, restless, and dangerous enemy, he will, by way of punishment, deprive him of some of his towns or provinces, and keep them to serve as a barrier to his own dominions." Notwithstanding the treaty of August, 1814, which was depended on as effecting peace between us and those savages; notwithstanding the treaty of peace between this country and Great Britain, which also was expected to have produced the same happy effect, they remained still hostile; notwithstanding all your triumphs over them, they were beaten, but not conquered; they were scattered, but not annihilated; they rallied again, and were afforded shelter and protection in East and West Florida, Spanish neutral—neutral, did I say?—Spanish hostile territory.

Mr. Chairman: I care not for professions of neutrality; they shall not impose upon my credulity; give me the evidence of facts which are not to be biassed by fear, or influenced by hope; and, if we are to be determined, or to judge by them, Spain was not neutral. I said, sir, that the Indians were suffered to settle in the Spanish territory, in the neighborhood of Pensacola, in West Florida, and on the river Appalachicola, and on a creek called Yellow Water, in East Florida, and there in silence brooded over imaginary evils, and meditated bloody vengeance. Two civilized barbarians, Ambrister and Arbuthnot, foreign emissaries, once more lighted up the torch of war, and let loose upon us those infuriated barbarians. In 1816, a boat's crew was murdered, and an American citizen was tarred, feathered, and burnt to death. On the 30th of November, 1817, Lieutenant Scott and fifty persons, consisting of men, women, and children, were inhumanly murdered, except a very few who were wounded, but effected their escape. On the 13th or 14th of March, 1818, two whole families on the Federal road, in the Alabama Territory, were put to death. The next day, five men, riding along a road, were fired upon, three killed and two wounded. Terror and dismay pervaded the whole country.

Mr. Chairman: War in its mildest form is dreadful; but what force of eloquence—what power of description, can give an adequate idea of Indian warfare? It is a war of extermination: like the lava of Etna, fear marches before it. Like the storm of the desert, ruin and desolation lead up its dreadful rear. Did you ever, sir, meet a man returning alone from your southern frontier, who had moved there with a large family? With sorrow in his face, and tears in his eyes, he begins the mournful tale, but is unable to proceed—his feelings deny him utterance. Mr. Chairman: Have you not a family? Do you not love them? Is it not for them that you wish to live? Is it not for them that you would dare to die? The glad day, sir, will soon arrive, when you will return home, and behold again the wife of your youth, and your children, the objects of your affection. He too once had a family, but now they are gone; he will never see them more. The night was gloomy; her husband, her protector, was far away; the pale moon hid her face behind the clouds; the winds blew; the tempest howled; trembling she pressed to her bosom the tender objects of their mutual love. At length destruction came: the yell of the savage awoke the sleep of the cradle; fire and the tomahawk without, horror and dismay within; the tender infant lifts up its arms for protection, and receives the stroke of death, and the shrieks of the distracted mother are hushed in everlasting silence. O! sir, suspect no deception; it is not the pencilling of fancy; it is history, faithful history, written in characters of blood along your whole southern frontier.

But, sir, it is said that General Jackson, in causing Arbuthnot and Ambrister to be executed, acted incorrectly, and even his reasoning has been considered wrong. I disclaim, Mr. Chairman, having any thing to do with his reasoning, and if, upon investigation, I find his conduct correct, I shall be satisfied. I would do great injustice to my feelings, sir, notwithstanding the criminality of the conduct of those men, did I not express my extreme regret that they were executed. Thinking, however, as I do, that General Jackson had the power, as commander, to put them to death, and having exerted that power, no doubt as he thought for the good of his country, I acquiesce. There is no evidence that they were spies, in which case they ought to have been tried by a court-martial, furnished with the grounds of their accusation, and confronted with the witnesses. They were foreigners, without our territory, owed this Government no allegiance, either local or general, and could therefore not be put to death for high treason. And our courts for the punishment of crimes on land could not take cognizance of their acts, however criminal, because they were perpetrated in a foreign country and out of their jurisdiction. Nor were they put to death to satiate cruelty or gratify a malignant spirit of revenge, but as subjects of retaliation, and, in terrorem, to prevent other foreigners from identifying themselves with the Indians and exciting them to murder and rapine. This power, in every age, has belonged and appertained to the commanding General; he commands the commencement of destruction, and, in modern warfare, stays the carnage at the cessation of resistance; but, in ancient times, if he pleased, not until there was no one left to resist. When war became less sanguinary, the vanquished were made prisoners and led into slavery:—chained, they followed in the train, to swell the pomp and triumph of the victor; and their lives, although spared, were always supposed to be forfeited, and at the mercy of the commanding officer, under circumstances of imperious necessity. Upon this principle was the bloody massacre of the prisoners justified, who, upon the false alarm after the battle of Agincourt were ordered to be executed by Henry the Fifth, the pink of courtesy and delight of chivalry; and from this principle, disguise it as you may, is derived the power to put an innocent prisoner to death by way of retaliation. The law of nations considers your enemies in your power, not merely as prisoners, but as hostages for the correct treatment of your countrymen in the power of your enemies. By the laws of civilized modern warfare, women and children are exempt from destruction, which, if denied to them, you are perfectly justifiable to retaliate upon the Indians, or those who identify themselves with them, so as to prevent its repetition. This power of retaliation was assumed by General

Washington, in the Revolutionary war, in the case of Captain Asgill; and when the same power was assumed by General Greene, to the south, on account of the execution of the gallant Hayne, the then Congress acquiesced in the assumption of such power, by each of those great men. But the honorable Speaker says, "the right of retaliation is an attribute of sovereignty, and comprehended in the war-making power," and that because Congress has, in the rules and articles of war, provided a tribunal for the trial of spies, they have the power to prescribe the rule or mode of trial in cases of retaliation. Again, that no man could be executed in this free country, without two things being shown: first, that the law condemns him to death; secondly, that his death is pronounced by that tribunal which is authorized by law to try him.

After Mr. ERVIN had concluded his speech, the House yet being in Committee of the Whole—

The question was taken on the adoption of the following resolution, reported by the Committee on Military Affairs:

"Resolved, That the House of Representatives of the United States disapproves the proceedings in the trial and execution of Alexander Arbuthnot and Robert C. Ambrister."

And decided in the negative—ayes 54, noes 90.

The question was then put on agreeing to the first resolution proposed by Mr. COBB, as follows:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to prepare and report a bill to this House, prohibiting, in time of peace, or in time of war, with any Indian tribe or tribes only, the execution of any captive, taken by the Army of the United States, without the approbation of such execution by the President."

And decided in the negative—ayes 57, noes 98.

The question was then taken on the second resolution offered by Mr. COBB, which he modified to read as follows:

"Resolved, That the late seizure of the Spanish posts of Pensacola and St. Carlos de Barancas, in West Florida, by the Army of the United States, was contrary to the Constitution of the United States."

And decided in the negative, also—ayes 65, noes 91.

The question was then taken on the third and last resolution proposed by Mr. COBB, as follows:

"Resolved, That the same committee be also instructed to prepare and report a bill prohibiting the march of the Army of the United States, or any corps thereof, into any foreign territory, without the previous authorization of Congress, except it be in the case of fresh pursuit of a defeated enemy of the United States, taking refuge within such foreign territory."

And decided in the negative—ayes 42.

The Committee of the Whole then rose and reported their proceedings to the House, and the question being stated on concurring with the Committee of the Whole in their disagreement to the resolution reported by the Military Committee—

Mr. POINDEXTER, with the view, and with that view alone, of obtaining a vote directly on concurrence with the Committee of the Whole in their report, called for the previous question.

The House agreed to take the previous question—ayes 95; and,

The question being pronounced from the Chair, "Shall the main question be now put?"

Mr. SPENCER, upon this question, called for the yeas and nays, which were refused; and

The House having agreed to take the main question, of concurring with the Committee of the Whole in their disagreement to the resolution reported by the Military Committee,

Mr. HARRISON called for a division of the question—conceiving the cases of Arbuthnot and Ambrister to be very distinct, and marked by circumstances so different, as to permit the approval of one and censure of the other.

The trial, sentence, and execution of Arbuthnot were, he said, in his opinion, perfectly correct; and, although he would not agree to censure any one concerned, when their motives were as pure as he was certain they were on this occasion, especially when he had no doubt but both men deserved death; yet, being called upon to say whether the execution of Ambrister was right or wrong, as he differed in opinion from General Jackson as to his powers over the court, he was obliged to say that it was wrong. It was an honest difference of opinion, he said, and was not intended to convey any censure upon that officer.

The question was then taken on concurring with the Committee of the Whole in their disagreement to the first branch of the resolution, viz: "That this House disapproves of the trial and execution of Alexander Arbuthnot," and decided in the affirmative, by yeas and nays, 108—62.

The question was then taken on concurring with the Committee of the Whole, in its disagreement to the second part of the resolution, viz: "That this House disapproves of the trial and execution of Robert C. Ambrister," and decided also in the affirmative, by yeas and nays, 107—63.

So the House concurred with the Committee of the Whole in rejecting the resolution of censure reported by the Military Committee.

Mr. COBB then moved the adoption of the second resolution, offered by him in Committee of the Whole, as modified, in the following words:

Resolved, That the late seizure of the Spanish posts of Pensacola, and St. Carlos de Barancas, in West Florida, by the Army of the United States, was contrary to the Constitution of the United States.

The question was then taken on the resolution proposed by Mr. COBB, and decided in the negative as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Abbot, Adams, Allen, Austin, Ball, Bayley, Beecher, Bloomfield, Burwell, Cobb, Colston, Cook, Crawford, Culbreth, Cushman, Edwards, Ellicott, Fuller, Gilbert, Harrison, Herbert, Hopkinson, Huntington, Irving of N. Y., Johnson of Va., Lewis, Lincoln, Lowndes, W. Maclay, W. P. Maclay, Mason of Rhode Island, Mercer, Mills, Robert Moore, Mosely, J. Nelson, T. M. Nelson, Ogden, Pawling, Pegram, Pindall, Pitkin, Pleasants, Reed, Rice, Robertson, Ruggles, Schuyler, Sherwood, Silsbee, Simkins, Slocumb, J. S. Smith, Speed, Spencer, Stewart of North Carolina, Storrs, Strong, Stuart of Maryland, Terrell, Terry, Trimble, Tucker of Virginia, Tyler, Westerlo, Whitman, Williams of Connecticut, Williams of North Carolina, Wilson of Massachusetts, and Wilson of Pennsylvania—70.

NAYS.—Messrs. Anderson of Kentucky, Baldwin, Barbour of Virginia, Barber of Ohio, Bassett, Bateman, Bennett Blount, Boden, Bryan, Butler of Louisiana, Campbell, Clagett, Comstock, Crafts, Cruger, Davidson, Desha, Drake, Ervin of South Carolina, Floyd, Folger, Gage, Garnett, Hale, Hall of Delaware, Hall of North Carolina, Hasbrouck, Hendricks, Herkimer, Herrick, Heister, Hitchcock, Hogg, Holmes, Hostetter, Hubbard, Hunter, Johnson of Kentucky, Jones, Kinsey, Kirtland, Lawyer, Linn, Little, Livermore, McLane of Delaware, McLean of Illinois, McCoy, Marchand, Marr, Mason of Massachusetts, Merrill, Middleton, Samuel Moore, Morton, Murray, H. Nelson, Nesbitt, New, Newton, Ogle, Orr, Owen, Palmer, Parrot, Patterson, Peter, Poindexter, Porter, Quarles, Rhea, Rich, Richards, Ringgold, Rogers, Sampson, Savage, Scudder, Sergeant, Settle, Seybert, Shaw, S. Smith, Bal. Smith, Alexander Smyth, Southard, Strother, Tarr, Taylor, Tompkins, Tucker of South Carolina, Upham, Walker of North Carolina, Walker of Kentucky, Wallace, Wendover, Whiteside, Wilkin, and Williams of New York—100.

And then the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, February 11.

A new member, to wit, from North Carolina, CHARLES FISHER, elected to supply the vacancy occasioned by the death of George Mumford, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat.

SATURDAY, February 13.

Missouri State Government—Restriction of Slavery.

The House then, on motion of Mr. SCOTT, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, (Mr. SMITH, of Maryland in the chair,) on the bills to enable the people of the Territories of Missouri and Alabama to form State Governments.

The bill relating to the Missouri Territory was the first in order, and the first taken up.

The committee were busily occupied until half past 4 o'clock, in maturing the details of this bill, and discussing propositions for its amendment; in which Messrs. SCOTT, ROBERTSON, MILLS, HARRISON, ANDERSON of Kentucky, DESHA, TALLMADGE, CLAY, and BARBOUR, participated.

In the course of the consideration, Mr TALLMADGE moved an amendment, substantially to limit the existence of slavery in the new State, by declaring all free who should be born in the Territory after its admission into the Union, and providing for the gradual emancipation of those now held in bondage.

This motion gave rise to an interesting and pretty wide debate, in which the proposition was supported by the mover, and by Messrs. LIVERMORE and MILLS, and was opposed by Messrs. CLAY, (Speaker,) BARBOUR, and PINDALL; but before any question was taken, the committee rose, and the House adjourned.*

MONDAY, February 15.

Missouri State Government—Restriction on the State.

The House having again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, (Mr. SMITH of Maryland in the chair,) on the bill to authorize the people of the Missouri Territory to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of the same into the Union—

The question being on the proposition of Mr. TALLMADGE to amend the bill by adding to it the following proviso:

* This was the commencement of the great Missouri agitation which was settled by the compromise. No two words have been more confounded of late than these of the restriction and compromise—so much so that some of the eminent speakers of the time have had their speeches against the restriction quoted as being against the compromise—of which they were zealous advocates. Though often confounded, no two measures could be more opposite in the nature and effects. The restriction was to operate upon a State—the compromise on territory. The restriction was to prevent the State of Missouri from admitting slavery—the compromise was to admit slavery there, and to divide the rest of Louisiana about equally between free and slave soil. The restriction came from the North—the compromise from the South. The restriction raised the storm—the compromise allayed it. And all this may be seen in the debates on the subject, now made accessible to the community by this abridgment. Since it has come into vogue to decry the compromise, much inapplicable testimony has been brought against it; among the rest a letter from Mr Madison to Mr. Robert Walsh, of Philadelphia, of date November 27th, 1819. That letter has been published in a handsome quarto volume (of Mr. Madison's letters) by Mr. James C. McGuire, of Washington City—a publication not made for sale, or to subserve a purpose, but for presents to friends. It is a great mistake in the understanding of that letter, and a wide misapplication of its close and masterly reasoning, to understand it as applying to the compromise. On looking at it, it will be seen that its whole tenor applies to the restriction on the State; that the word compromise is not in it; that it was written the year before the compromise, and at the very moment—the eve of the meeting of Congress, the session of 1819-'20—when the attempted restriction had occasioned the loss of the State bill the session before, and when the restriction question was wearing its direst aspect.

"And provided, That the further introduction of slavery or involuntary servitude be prohibited, except for the punishment of crimes, whereof the party shall have been fully convicted; and that all children born within the said State, after the admission thereof into the Union, shall be free at the age of twenty-five years:"

The debate which commenced on Saturday was to-day resumed on this proposition; which was supported by Mr. TAYLOR, Mr. MILLS, Mr. LIVERMORE, and Mr. FULLER; and opposed by Mr. BARBOUR, Mr. PINDALL, Mr. CLAY, and Mr. HOLMES.

This debate (which was quite interesting) involved two questions; one of right, the other of expediency. Both were supported by the advocates of the amendment, and generally opposed by its opponents. On the one hand, it was contended that Congress had no right to prescribe to any State the details of its government, any further than that it should be republican in its form; that such a power would be nugatory, if exercised, since, once admitted into the Union, the people of any State have the unquestioned right to amend their constitution of government, &c.

On the other hand, it was as strongly contended that Congress had the right to annex conditions to the admission of any new State into the Union; that slavery was incompatible with our Republican institutions, &c.

Besides the above gentlemen, Mr. HARRISON and Mr. HENDRICKS spoke on points incidentally introduced into the debate.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, spoke as follows:

Mr. Chairman, if the few citizens who now inhabit the territory of Missouri were alone interested in the decision of this question, I should content myself with voting in favor of the amendment, without occupying for a moment the attention of the committee. But the fact is far otherwise: those whom we shall authorize to set in motion the machine of free government beyond the Mississippi, will, in many respects, decide the destiny of millions. Cast your eye on that majestic river which gives name to the Territory, for the admission of which into the Union we are about to provide; trace its meanderings through fertile regions for more than two thousand miles; cross the Stony Mountains, and descend the navigable waters which empty into the Western ocean; contemplate the States hereafter to unfurl their banners over this fair portion of America, the successive generations of freemen who there shall adorn the arts, enlarge the circle of science, and improve the condition of our species. Having taken this survey, you will be able, in some measure, to appreciate the importance of the subject before us. Our votes this day will determine whether the high destinies of this region, and of these generations, shall be fulfilled, or whether we shall defeat them by permitting slavery, with all its baleful consequences, to inherit the land. Let the magnitude of this question plead my apology, while I briefly address a few considerations to the sober judgment of patriots and statesmen.

I will not now stop to examine the policy of extending our settlements into the wilderness, with the astonishing rapidity which has marked their progress, leaving within our ancient borders an extensive country, unsubdued by the hand of man. This inquiry, although intimately connected with the subject, would too much extend the range of discussion at this late period of the session. I, however, cannot forbear reminding gentlemen, that but few years have elapsed since the opinion was often expressed, and earnestly inculcated by our wisest and best men, that no locations ought to be made beyond the Mississippi, until the original States and Territories should acquire a population of considerable compactness and strength; and that our military posts should not be pushed forward faster than was necessary to protect the frontier settlements. A policy embracing more enlarged ideas, and more magnificent projects, appears to have succeeded. We now talk of forts at the mouth of the Yellow Stone, and military establishments some fifteen or twenty hundred miles in the Indian country, as objects of reasonable and easy achievement. An honorable member from Virginia has this morning presented a petition from sundry inhabitants of that State, praying of Congress permission to settle on Columbia River, between the Rocky Mountains and the Pacific Ocean, probably intending to introduce slavery into the remotest verge of republican territory. I pass over these subjects, however momentous, and well deserving the attention of Congress, and come directly to the points in issue.

First. Has Congress power to require of Missouri a constitutional prohibition against the further introduction of slavery, as a condition of her admission into the Union?

Second. If the power exist, is it wise to exercise it?

Congress has no power unless it be expressly granted by the constitution, or necessary to the execution of some power clearly delegated. What, then, are the grants made to Congress in relation to the Territories? The third section of the fourth article declares, that "the Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory, or other property, belonging to the United States." It would be difficult to devise a more comprehensive grant of power. The whole subject is put at the disposal of Congress, as well as the right of judging what regulations are proper to be made, as the power of making them is clearly granted. Until admitted into the Union, this political society is a territory; all the preliminary steps relating to its admission are territorial regulations. Hence, in all such cases, Congress has exercised the power of determining by whom the constitution should be made, how its framers should be elected, when and where they should meet, and what propositions should be submitted to their decision. After its formation, the Congress examine its provisions, and, if approved, admit the State into the Union, in pursuance of a power delegated by the same section of the constitution, in the following words: "New States may be admitted by the Congress into the Union." This grant of power is evidently alternative; its exercise is committed to the sound discretion of Congress; no injustice is done by declining it. But if Congress has the power of altogether refusing to admit new States, much more has it the power of prescribing such conditions of admission as may be judged reasonable. The exercise of this power, until now, has never been questioned. The act of 1802, under which Ohio was admitted into the Union, prescribed the condition that its constitution should not be repugnant to the ordinance of 1787. The sixth article of that ordinance declares, "there shall be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude in the said territory, otherwise than in the punishment of crimes whereof the party shall have been duly convicted." The same condition was imposed by Congress on the people of Indiana and Illinois. These States have all complied with it, and framed constitutions excluding slavery. Missouri lies in the same latitude. Its soil, productions, and climate are the same, and the same principles of government should be applied to it.

But it is said that, by the treaty of 1803, with the French Republic, Congress is restrained from imposing this condition. The third article is quoted as containing the prohibition. It is in the following words: "The inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be incorporated in the Union of the United States, and admitted as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States, and, in the mean time, they shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and the religion which they profess." The inhabitants of the ceded territory, when transferred from the protection of the French Republic, in regard to the United States, would have stood in the relation of aliens. The object of the article doubtless was to provide for their admission to the rights of citizens, and their incorporation into the American family. The treaty made no provision for the erection of new States in the ceded territory. That was a question of national policy, properly reserved for the decision of those to whom the constitution had committed the power. The framers of the treaty well knew that the President and Senate could not bind Congress to admit new States into the Union. The unconstitutional doctrine had not then been broached, that the President and Senate could not only purchase a West India island or an African principality, but also impose upon Congress an obligation to make it an independent State, and admit it into the Union. If the President and Senate can, by treaty, change the Constitution of the United States, and rob Congress of a power clearly delegated, the doctrine may be true, but otherwise, it is false. The treaty, therefore, has no operation on the question in debate. Its requirements, however, have been faithfully fulfilled. In 1804, the laws of the United States were extended to that territory. The protection afforded by the Federal Constitution was guaranteed to its inhabitants. They were thus "incorporated in the Union," and secured in the enjoyment of their rights. The treaty stipulation being thus executed, "as soon as possible," it remained a question for the future determination of Congress, whether the Government should remain territorial or become that of an independent State. In 1811, this question was decided in relation to that part of the territory which then embraced nearly all the population, and to acquire which, alone, the treaty had been made. A law was passed to enable the people of the Territory of Orleans to form a constitution and State government, and to provide for its admission into the Union. Did Congress then doubt its power to annex conditions to such admission? No, sir, far from it. The government of Orleans had always been administered according to the principles of the civil law. The common law, so highly valued in other parts of our country, was not recognized there. Trial by jury was unknown to the inhabitants. Instead of a privilege, they considered its introduction an odious departure from their ancient administration of justice. Left to themselves, they never would have introduced it. Congress, however, knowing these things, made it a condition of their admission into the Union, that trial by jury should be secured to the citizen by a constitutional provision.

Even the language of the Territory was required to be changed, as a condition of its admission. The inhabitants were wholly French and Spanish. Theirs were the only languages generally spoken, or even understood. But Congress required from them a constitutional provision, that their legislative and judicial proceedings should be conducted in the English language. They were not left at liberty to determine this point for themselves. From these facts, it appears that Congress, at that day, acted from a conviction that it possessed the power of prescribing the conditions of their admission into the Union.

Gentlemen have said the amendment is in violation of the treaty, because it impairs the property of a master in his slave. Is it then pretended, that, notwithstanding the declaration in our bill of rights, "that all men are created equal," one individual can have a vested property not only in the flesh and blood of his fellow man, but also in generations not yet called into existence? Can it be believed that the supreme Legislature has no power to provide rules and regulations for ameliorating the condition of future ages? And this, too, when the constitution itself has vested in Congress full sovereignty, by authorizing the enactment of whatever law it may deem conducive to the welfare of the country. The sovereignty of Congress in relation to the States, is limited by specific grants—but, in regard to the Territories, it is unlimited. Missouri was purchased with our money, and, until incorporated into the family of States, it may be sold for money. Can it then be maintained, that although we have the power to dispose of the whole Territory, we have no right to provide against the further increase of slavery within its limits? That, although we may change the political relations of its free citizens by transferring their country to a foreign power, we cannot provide for the gradual abolition of slavery within its limits, nor establish those civil regulations which naturally flow from self-evident truth? No, sir, it cannot; the practice of nations and the common sense of mankind have long since decided these questions.

Having proved, as I apprehend, our right to legislate in the manner proposed, I proceed to illustrate the propriety of exercising it. And here I might rest satisfied with reminding my opponents of their own declarations on the subject of slavery. How often, and how eloquently, have they deplored its existence among them? What willingness, nay, what solicitude have they not manifested to be relieved from this burden? How have they wept over the unfortunate policy that first introduced slaves into this country! How have they disclaimed the guilt and shame of that original sin, and thrown it back upon their ancestors! I have with pleasure heard these avowals of regret, and confided in their sincerity; I have hoped to see its effects in the advancement of the cause of humanity. Gentlemen have now an opportunity of putting their principles into practice; if they have tried slavery and found it a curse; if they desire to dissipate the gloom with which it covers their land; I call upon them to exclude it from the Territory in question; plant not its seeds in this uncorrupt soil; let not our children, looking back to the proceedings of this day, say of them, as they have been constrained to speak of their fathers, "we wish their decision had been different; we regret the existence of this unfortunate population among us; but we found them here: we know not what to do with them; it is our misfortune, we must bear it with patience."

History will record the decision of this day as exerting its influence for centuries to come over the population of half our continent. If we reject the amendment, and suffer this evil, now easily eradicated, to strike its roots so deep in the soil that it can never be removed, shall we not furnish some apology for doubting our sincerity, when we deplore its existence—shall we not expose ourselves to the same kind of censure which was pronounced by the Saviour of mankind upon the Scribes and Pharisees, who builded the tombs of the prophets and garnished the sepulchres of the righteous, and said, if they had lived in the days of their fathers, they would not have been partakers with them in the blood of the prophets, while they manifested a spirit which clearly proved them the legitimate descendants of those who killed the prophets, and thus filled up the measure of their fathers' iniquity?

Mr. Chairman, one of the gentlemen from Kentucky (Mr. CLAY) has pressed into his service the cause of humanity. He has pathetically urged us to withdraw our amendment and suffer this unfortunate population to be dispersed over the country. He says they will be better fed, clothed, and sheltered, and their whole condition will be greatly improved. Sir, true humanity disowns his invocation. The humanity to which he appeals is base coin; it is counterfeit, it is that humanity which seeks to palliate disease by the application of nostrums, which scatter its seeds through the whole system—which saves a finger to day, but amputates the arm to-morrow. Sir, my heart responds to the call of humanity; I will zealously unite in any practicable means of bettering the condition of this oppressed people. I am ready to appropriate a territory to their use, and to aid them in settling it—but I am not willing, I never will consent to declare the whole country west of the Mississippi a market overt for human flesh. In vain will you enact severe laws against the importation of slaves, if you create for them an additional demand, by opening the western world to their employment. While a negro man is bought in Africa for a few gewgaws or a bottle of whiskey, and sold at New Orleans for twelve or fifteen hundred dollars, avarice will stimulate to the violation of your laws. Notwithstanding the penalties and confiscations denounced in your statutes and actually enforced on all detected offenders, the slave trade continues—a vigilant execution of the laws may diminish it, but, while you increase the demand and offer so great temptation to the cupidity of unprincipled men, they will encounter every peril in the prosecution of this unhallowed traffic. The gentleman from Kentucky has intimated his willingness, in addition to the existing penalties upon transgression, to discourage this inhuman commerce by declaring the imported slave to be free. This provision, if established, would in theory provide some remedy for the evil, but in practice it would be found altogether inoperative. A slave is smuggled into the country and by law becomes free; but the fact of importation must be established by witnesses in a court of justice. In non-slaveholding States, all men are presumed free, until the contrary be proved; but, where slavery is established, all black men are presumed slaves, until they are proved free. This presumption alone would generally present to the slave an insuperable obstacle to the successful prosecution of his claim—he moreover would be poor, unfriended, ignorant of our language, and under the watchful eye of those whose interest it would be to allow no communication of his wrongs where redress could be obtained. The right of freedom might exist, but he would find it impracticable to enforce it, and he probably would have occasion to feel that every effort to break his chains only increase their weight and render his condition the more intolerable.

To the objection that this amendment will, if adopted, diminish the value of a species of property in one portion of the Union, and thereby operate unequally, I reply, that if, by depriving slaveholders of the Missouri market, the business of raising slaves should become less profitable, it would be an effect incidentally produced, but is not the object of the measure. The law prohibiting the importation of foreign slaves was not passed for the purpose of enhancing the value of those then in the country, but that effect has been incidentally produced in a very great degree. So now the exclusion of slavery from Missouri may operate, in some measure, to retard a further advance of prices; but, surely, when gentlemen consider the present demand for their labor, and the extent of country in Louisiana, Mississippi, and Alabama, requiring a supply, they ought not to oppose their exclusion from the territory in question. It is further objected, that the amendment is calculated to disfranchise our brethren of the South, by discouraging their emigration to the country west of the Mississippi. If it were proposed to discriminate between citizens of the different sections of our Union, and allow a Pennsylvanian to hold slaves there while the power was denied to a Virginian, the objection might very properly be made; but, when we place all on an equal footing, denying to all what we deny to one, I am unable to discover the injustice or inequality of which honorable gentlemen have thought proper to complain. The description of emigrants may be affected in some measure, by the amendment in question. If slavery shall be tolerated, the country will be settled by rich planters, with their slaves; if it shall be rejected, the emigrants will chiefly consist of the poorer and more laborious classes of society. If it be true that the prosperity and happiness of a country ought to constitute the grand object of its legislators, I cannot hesitate for a moment which species of population deserves most to be encouraged by the laws we may pass. Gentlemen, in their zeal to oppose the amendment, appear to have considered but one side of the case. If the rejection of slavery will tend to discourage emigration from the South, will not its admission have the same effect in relation to the North and East? Whence came the people who, with a rapidity never before witnessed, have changed the wilderness between the Ohio and Mississippi into fruitful fields; who have erected there, in a period almost too short for the credibility of future ages, three of the freest and most flourishing States in our Union? They came from the eastern hive; from that source of population which, in the same time, has added more than one hundred thousand inhabitants to my native State, and furnished seamen for a large portion of the navigation of the world; seamen who have unfurled your banner in every port to which the enterprise of man has gained admittance, and who, though poor themselves, have drawn rich treasures for the nation from the bosom of the deep. Do you believe that these people will settle in a country where they must take rank with negro slaves? Having neither the ability nor will to hold slaves themselves, they labor cheerfully while labor is honorable; make it disgraceful, they will despise it. You cannot degrade it more effectually than by establishing a system whereby it shall be performed principally by slaves. The business in which they are generally engaged, be it what it may, soon becomes debased in public estimation. It is considered low, and unfit for freemen. I cannot better illustrate this truth than by referring to a remark of the honorable gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. CLAY.) I have often admired the liberality of his sentiments. He is governed by no vulgar prejudices; yet with what abhorrence did he speak of the performance, by your wives and daughters, of those domestic offices which he was pleased to call servile! What comparison did he make between the "black slaves" of Kentucky and the "white slaves" of the North; and how instantly did he strike a balance in favor of the condition of the former! If such opinions and expressions, even in the ardor of debate, can fall from that honorable gentleman, what ideas do you suppose are entertained of laboring men by the majority of slaveholders? A gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BARBOUR) replies they are treated with confidence and esteem, and their rights are respected. Sir, I did not imagine they were put out of the protection of law. Their persons and property are doubtless secure from violence, or, if injured, the courts of justice are open for their redress. But, in a country like this, where the people are sovereign, and every citizen is entitled to equal rights, the mere exemption from flagrant wrong is no great privilege. In this country, no class of freemen should be excluded, either by law, or by the ostracism of public opinion, more powerful than law, from competing for offices and political distinctions. Sir, a humane master will respect the rights of his slave, and, if worthy, will honor him with confidence and esteem. And this same measure, I apprehend, is dealt out, in slaveholding States, to the laboring class of their white population. But whom of that class have they ever called to fill stations of any considerable responsibility? When have we seen a Representative on this floor, from that section of our Union, who was not a slaveholder? Who but slaveholders are elected to their State Legislatures? Who but they are appointed to fill their executive and judicial offices? I appeal to gentlemen, whether the selection of a laboring man, however well educated, would not be considered an extraordinary event? For this I do not reproach my brethren of the South. They doubtless choose those to represent them in whom they most confide; and far be it from me to intimate that their confidence is ever misplaced. But my objection is to the introduction of a system which cannot but produce the effect of rendering labor disgraceful.

An argument has been urged by a gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BARBOUR) against the proposed amendment, connected with our revenues. He said that by prohibiting the further introduction of slaves into the proposed State, we should reduce the price and diminish the sales of our public lands. In my opinion, the effect would be precisely the reverse. True, it is, that lands for cultivation have sold higher in Alabama than in Illinois, but this is owing not to the rejection of slavery in the one and its admission into the other, but to the different staples they are capable of producing. The advanced price of cotton has created in market a demand for lands suited to its cultivation, and enhanced their value far beyond any former precedent. But, to test the truth of the position, we must ascertain the relative value of land in adjoining States, the one allowing and the other rejecting slavery, where the climate, soil, productions, and advantages of market are similar. Pennsylvania and Maryland furnish fair specimens of comparison in all these respects. But here the result is in direct opposition to the conjecture of the gentleman from Virginia. Land on the Pennsylvania side of the line, where the power of holding slaves does not exist, uniformly sells at a higher price than lands of equal quality on the Maryland side, where the power is in full exercise. It, therefore, is probable, that the further introduction of slavery into Missouri, far from increasing, would actually diminish the value of our public lands. But, should the fact be otherwise, I entreat gentlemen to consider whether it become the high character of an American Congress to barter the present happiness and future safety of unborn millions for a few pieces of pelf, for a few cents on an acre of land. For myself, I would no sooner contaminate the national Treasury with such ill-gotten gold, than I would tarnish the fame of our national ships by directing their employment in the African slave trade. But, whatever may be the influence of the subject in controversy upon the original price of land, it must be evident to all men of observation that its ultimate and permanent effects are very prejudicial to agricultural improvement. Farms in Maryland, notwithstanding the mildness of its climate compared with New York, I am informed, may be purchased at five or six dollars an acre, while lands by nature not more fertile nor more advantageously situated, in the last-mentioned State, sell at a rate ten times higher. Had not slavery been introduced into Maryland, her numerous and extensive old fields, which now appear to be worse than useless, would long since have supported a dense population of industrious freemen, and contributed largely to the strength and resources of the State. Who has travelled along the line which divides that State from Pennsylvania, and has not observed that no monuments are necessary to mark the boundary; that it is easily traced by following the dividing lines between farms highly cultivated and plantations laying open to the common and overrun with weeds; between stone barns and stone bridges on one side, and stalk cribs and no bridges on the other; between a neat, blooming, animated, rosy-cheeked peasantry on the one side, and a squalid, slow-motioned, black population on the other? Our vote this day will determine which of these descriptions will hereafter best suit the inhabitants of the new world beyond the Mississippi. I entreat gentlemen to pause, and solemnly consider how deeply are involved the destinies of future generations in the decision now to be made. If I agreed in opinion with the gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. COBB,) that this amendment does not present an insurmountable barrier against the further introduction of slavery; that Missouri, after becoming a State, may call a convention, and change this feature of her constitution—even then I should consider the amendment scarcely less important than if it were a fundamental and unalterable compact. On this subject we have experience, and the result has justified the best hopes of our country; while under the government of Congress, slavery was excluded from the Territories, now the States, north of the Ohio. Our power over their municipal regulations has since been withdrawn; they have taken the government into their own hands. But who has not seen the moral effect produced on the inhabitants by the ordinance of 1787? It is as permanent as the soil over which it was established. The exclusion of slavery from all these States is now more effectually insured by public sentiment than by their constitutional prohibitions. Require the government of Missouri to commence right, and the same moral effect will then be produced. No convention of the people will ever permit the future introduction of slaves. Let their political institutions be established in wisdom, and I shall confidently trust in the good sense of the people to direct them hereafter. But, be the event as it may, I at least shall have the satisfaction of reflecting that, if the misfortune of slavery shall be entailed upon this country, every thing in my power will have been done to prevent it.

Mr. Chairman, it was my intention to say something of the moral and political interests involved in this question. But, having already occupied more of your time than was my purpose when I rose to address you, and being admonished by the multiplicity of important bills which, during the few remaining days of the session, demand our attention, I forbear to discuss or even touch upon those parts of the subject. It, moreover, is the less necessary, because those views have often been presented to the public, and have doubtless been seriously considered by every member of this committee.

The facts and arguments to which I have drawn your attention, more particularly relate to our condition as a Federal Republic, and our duties to Missouri, arising from the relation in which she stands to the Union. While regretting that it has not been in my power to do more ample justice to this important subject, owing in part to the unexpected manner in which it was taken up, I cannot sit down without expressing an earnest hope that our present decision may be such as will promote the permanent union, stability, and security of our country.

Mr. FULLER, of Massachusetts, said, that, in the admission of new States into the Union, he considered that Congress had a discretionary power. By the 4th article and 3d section of the constitution, Congress are authorized to admit them; but nothing in that section, or in any part of the constitution, enjoins the admission as imperative under any circumstances. If it were otherwise, he would request gentlemen to point out what were the circumstances or conditions precedent, which being found to exist, Congress must admit the new State. All discretion would in such case be taken from Congress, Mr. F. said, and deliberation would be useless. The honorable Speaker (Mr. CLAY) has said, that Congress has no right to prescribe any condition whatever to the newly organized States, but must admit them by a simple act, leaving their sovereignty unrestricted. [Here the SPEAKER explained—he did not intend to be understood in so broad a sense as Mr. F. stated.] With the explanation of the honorable gentleman, Mr. F. said, I still think his ground as untenable as before. We certainly have a right, and our duty to the nation requires, that we should examine the actual state of things in the proposed State; and, above all, the constitution expressly makes a republican form of government in the several States, a fundamental principle, to be preserved under the sacred guarantee of the National Legislature. [Art. 4, sec. 4.] It clearly, therefore, is the duty of Congress, before admitting a new sister into the Union, to ascertain that her constitution or form of government is republican. Now, sir, the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York, (Mr. TALLMADGE,) merely requires that slavery shall be prohibited in Missouri. Does this imply any thing more than that its constitution shall be republican? The existence of slavery in any State, is so far a departure from republican principles. The Declaration of Independence, penned by the illustrious statesman then and at this time a citizen of a State which admits slavery, defines the principle on which our National and State constitutions are all professedly founded. The second paragraph of that instrument begins thus: "We hold these truths to be self-evident—that all men are created equal—that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights—that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." Since, then, it cannot be denied that slaves are men, it follows that they are in a purely republican government born free, and are entitled to liberty and the pursuit of happiness. [Mr. F. was here interrupted by several gentlemen, who thought it improper to question in debate the republican character of the slaveholding States, which had also a tendency, as one gentleman (Mr. COLSTON of Virginia) said, to deprive those States of the right to hold slaves as property, and he adverted to the probability that there might be slaves in the gallery listening to the debate.] Mr. F. assured the gentleman that nothing was further from his thoughts than to question on that floor the right of Virginia and other States which held slaves when the constitution was established, to continue to hold them. With that subject the National Legislature could not interfere, and ought not to attempt it. But, Mr. F. continued, if gentlemen will be patient, they will see that my remarks will neither derogate from the constitutional rights of the States, nor from a due respect to their several forms of government. Sir, it is my wish to allay not to excite local animosities; but I shall never refrain from advancing such arguments in debate as my duty requires, nor do I believe that the reading of our Declaration of Independence, or a discussion of republican principles on any occasion, can endanger the rights, or merit the disapprobation of any portion of the Union.

My reason, Mr. Chairman, for recurring to the Declaration of our Independence, was to draw from authority admitted in all parts of the Union a definition of the basis of republican government. If then, all men have equal rights, it can no more comport with the principles of a free Government to exclude men of a certain color from the enjoyment of "liberty and the pursuit of happiness," than to exclude those who have not attained a certain portion of wealth, or a certain stature of body; or to found the exclusion on any other capricious or accidental circumstance. Suppose Missouri, before her admission as a State, were to submit to us her constitution, by which no person could elect, or be elected to any office, unless he possessed a clear annual income of twenty thousand dollars; and suppose we had ascertained that only five, or a very small number of persons, had such an estate; would this be any thing more or less than a real aristocracy, under a form nominally republican? Election and representation, which some contend are the only essential principles of republics, would exist only in name—a shadow without substance, a body without a soul. But if all the other inhabitants were to be made slaves, and mere property of the favored few, the outrage on principle would be still more palpable. Yet, sir, it is demonstrable that the exclusion of the black population from all political freedom, and making them the property of the whites, is an equally palpable invasion of right and abandonment of principle. If we do this in the admission of new States, we violate the constitution, and we have not now the excuse which existed when our national constitution was established. Then, to effect a concert of interests, it was proper to make concessions. The States where slavery existed not only claimed the right to continue it, but it was manifest that a general emancipation of slaves could not be asked of them. Their political existence would have been in jeopardy; both masters and slaves must have been involved in the most fatal consequences.

To guard against such intolerable evils, it is provided in the constitution "that the migration or importation of such persons, as any of the existing States think proper to admit, shall not be prohibited till 1808." Art. 1, sec. 9. And it is provided elsewhere, that persons held to service by the laws of any State, shall be given up by other States to which they may have escaped, &c. Art. 4, sec. 2.

These provisions effectually recognized the right in the States, which, at the time of framing the constitution, held the blacks in slavery, to continue so to hold them, until they should think proper to meliorate their condition. The constitution is a compact among all the States then existing, by which certain principles of government are established for the whole and for each individual State. The predominant principle, in both respects, is, that all men are free, and have an equal right to liberty, and all other privileges; or, in other words, the predominant principle is republicanism, in its largest sense. But, then, the same compact contains certain exceptions. The States then holding slaves are permitted, from the necessity of the case, and for the sake of union, to exclude the republican principle so far, and only so far, as to retain their slaves in servitude, and also their progeny, as had been the usage, until they should think it proper or safe to conform to the pure principle by abolishing slavery. The compact contains on its face the general principle and the exceptions. But the attempt to extend slavery to the new States is in direct violation of the clause which guarantees a republican form of government to all the States. This clause, indeed, must be construed in connection with the exceptions before mentioned; but it cannot, without violence, be applied to any other States than those in which slavery was allowed at the formation of the constitution.

The honorable Speaker cites the first clause in the second section of the fourth article: "The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several States," which he thinks would be violated by the condition proposed in the constitution of Missouri. To keep slaves—to make one portion of the population the property of another, hardly deserves to be called a privilege, since what is gained by the masters must be lost by the slaves. But, independently of this consideration, I think the observations already offered to the committee, showing that holding the black population in servitude is an exception to the general principles of the constitution, and cannot be allowed to extend beyond the fair import of the terms by which that exception is provided, are a sufficient answer to the objection. The gentleman proceeds in the same train of reasoning, and asks, if Congress can require one condition, how many more can be required, and where these conditions will end? With regard to a republican constitution, Congress are obliged to require that condition, and that is enough for the present question; but I contend, further, that Congress has a right, at their discretion, to require any other reasonable condition. Several others were required of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Mississippi. The State of Louisiana, which was a part of the territory ceded to us at the same time with Missouri, was required to provide in her constitution for trials by jury, the writ of habeas corpus, the principles of civil and religious liberty, with several others peculiar to that State. These certainly are, none of them, more indispensable ingredients in a republican form of government, than the equality of privileges of all the population; yet these have not been denied to be reasonable, and warranted by the national constitution in the admission of new States. Nor need gentlemen apprehend that Congress will set no reasonable limits to the conditions of admission. In the exercise of their constitutional discretion on this subject, they are, as in all other cases, responsible to the people. Their power to levy direct taxes is not limited by the constitution. They may lay a tax of one million of dollars, or of a hundred millions, without violating the letter of the constitution; but if the latter enormous and unreasonable sum were levied, or even the former, without evident necessity, the people have the power in their own hands—a speedy corrective is found in the return of the elections. This remedy is so certain, that the representatives of the people can never lose sight of it; and consequently an abuse of their powers, to any considerable extent, can never be apprehended. The same reasoning applies to the exercise of all the powers intrusted to Congress, and the admission of new States into the Union is in no respect an exception.

One gentleman, however, has contended against the amendment, because it abridges the rights of the slaveholding States to transport their slaves to the new States for sale or otherwise. This argument is attempted to be enforced in various ways, and particularly by the clause in the constitution last cited. It admits, however, of a very clear answer, by recurring to the ninth section of article first, which provides, that "the migration or importation of such persons as any of the States then existing shall admit, shall not be prohibited by Congress till 1808." This clearly implies that the migration and importation may be prohibited after that year. The importation has been prohibited, but the migration has not hitherto been restrained; Congress, however, may restrain it when it may be judged expedient. It is, indeed, contended by some gentlemen, that migration is either synonymous with importation, or that it means something different from the transportation of slaves from one State to another. It certainly is not synonymous with importation, and would not have been used if it had been so. It cannot mean exportation, which is also a definite and precise term. It cannot mean the reception of free blacks from foreign countries, as is alleged by some, because no possible reason existed for regulating their admission by the constitution; no free blacks ever came from Africa, or any other country, to this; and to introduce the provision by the side of that for the importation of slaves would have been absurd in the highest degree. What alternative remains but to apply the term "migration" to the transportation of slaves from those States where they are admitted to be held, to other States? Such a provision might have in view a very natural object. The price of slaves might be affected so far by a sudden prohibition to transport slaves from State to State, that it was as reasonable to guard against that inconvenience, as against the sudden interdiction of the importation. Hitherto it has not been found necessary for Congress to prohibit migration or transportation from State to State. But now it becomes the right and duty of Congress to guard against the further extension of the intolerable evil and the crying enormity of slavery.

The expediency of this measure is very apparent. The opening of an extensive slave market will tempt the cupidity of those who otherwise perhaps might gradually emancipate their slaves. We have heard much, Mr. Chairman, of the Colonization Society; an institution which is the favorite of the humane gentlemen in the slaveholding States. They have long been lamenting the miseries of slavery, and earnestly seeking for a remedy compatible with their own safety and the happiness of their slaves. At last the great desideratum is found—a colony in Africa for the emancipated blacks. How will the generous intentions of these humane persons be frustrated, if the price of slaves is to be doubled by a new and boundless market! Instead of emancipation of the slaves, it is much to be feared that unprincipled wretches will be found kidnapping those who are already free, and transporting and selling the hapless victims into hopeless bondage. Sir, I really hope that Congress will not contribute to discountenance and render abortive the generous and philanthropic views of this most worthy and laudable society. Rather let us hope that the time is not very remote when the shores of Africa, which have so long been a scene of barbarous rapacity and savage cruelty, shall exhibit a race of free and enlightened people, the offspring indeed of cannibals or of slaves, but displaying the virtues of civilization and the energies of independent freemen. America may then hope to see the development of a germ, now scarcely visible, cherished and matured under the genial warmth of our country's protection, till the fruit shall appear in the regeneration and happiness of a boundless continent.

One argument still remains to be noticed. It is said that we are bound by the treaty of cession with France to admit the ceded territory into the Union, "as soon as possible." It is obvious that the President and Senate, the treaty-making power, cannot make a stipulation with any foreign nation in derogation of the constitutional powers and duties of this House, by making it imperative on us to admit the new territory according to the literal tenor of the phrase; but the additional words in the treaty, "according to the principles of the constitution," put it beyond all doubt that no such compulsory admission was intended, and that the republican principles of our constitution are to govern us in the admission of this, as well as all the new States, in the national family.

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR, of Virginia, said that, as he was decidedly opposed to the amendment which had been offered, he asked the indulgence of the House whilst he made some remarks in addition to those which had fallen from the Speaker, for the purpose of showing the impropriety of its adoption.
